LBJ Sets Welfare Study, Calls for Fresh Approach

Curbs on Dollar Flow Endorsed

Pres. Johnson's order curtailing private investment by U.S. corporations abroad to reduce the nation's balance of payments deficit has the "complete support and endorsement" of the AFL-CIO, Federation President George Meany declared.

It has long been the view of the AFL-CIO, Meany said in a statement, "that such regulation is essential." He pointed to a resolution adopted by the recent AFL-CIO convention which said:

"Until the balance of payments problem improves, there should be direct restrictions on U.S. investment in developed countries."

Meany voiced support also for the "thrust of the President's general recommendations" for other steps to strengthen the dollar and cut the payments deficit but said the federation would present its detailed views as each item is presented for "legislative or administrative action."

The President, in a New Year's Day statement on the balance of payments problem, proposed a seven-point program topped by his executive order curtailing U.S. corporate investment overseas.

Other Steps Asked

Other proposals include a contraction in bank lending to foreigners, curbs on tourist travel abroad, spurs to return foreign profits to the U.S., more financial aid for exporters, more purchase of defense goods and U.S. securities by American allies, reducing civilian government employment abroad and attracting more foreign visitors and investment.

The President stressed that the balance of payments problem is of "vital concern to the economic health and well-being of this nation and the free world." The nation, he noted, has had payments deficits for 17 of the last 18 years and for a time those deficits were needed to help the world "recover from the ravages of World War II."

The deficit, now estimated at between $3.5 to $4 billion for 1967, can no longer be tolerated, he said, and action is needed to bring the balance into equilibrium or close to it in 1968.

He stressed that on the domestic front "no business before the returning Congress will be more urgent" than enactment of the 10 percent surtax, proposed by the Administration last year.

He called also for restraint in wage-price decisions.

Signs Bill For OASDI Increases

Pres. Johnson called for a fresh approach to the nation's public welfare system and named a "commission of distinguished Americans" to explore "every plan, however unconventional, which could promise a constructive advance in meeting the income needs of all the American people."

The President announced the creation of a Commission on Income Maintenance Programs as he signed social security amendments which will raise benefits—but by a smaller amount than Johnson had sought—for 24 million persons eligible for Old Age, Survivors & Disability Insurance.

He said the higher benefits will lift one million persons on social security rolls "above the poverty line." In dollar terms, he declared, it is the biggest single increase ever enacted.

At the same time, the President expressed regret at the "severe restrictions" Congress imposed on public assistance in another section of the legislation.

Overall, Johnson said, "Franklin Roosevelt's vision of social insurance has stood the test of the changing times." But he added: "I wish I could say the same for our nation's welfare system."

Johnson said he has directed Health, Education & Welfare Sec. John W. Gardner "to work with state governments so that compassionate safeguards are established to protect deserving mothers and needy children."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a letter to the President, had termed the new restrictions on public assistance "indefensible." He

Half Pay After 20 Years:

Pension Gain Marks N.Y. Transit Accord

New York—More than 36,000 bus and transit workers stayed on the job past a Jan. 1 strike deadline here while Transport Workers Union negotiators tied up a contract package the union called "unparalleled" for its improvements.

The City Transit Authority waited until almost the last minute to make its first offer in 10 weeks of talks, the TWU reported. Negotiators "stopped the clock" after 37 hours of intensive negotiations and reached agreement two hours later, aided by a panel of three mediators named by Mayor John V. Lindsay.

Both sides had high praise for the mediation team of Vincent D. McDonald, Joseph E. O'Grady and Theodore W. Kheel.

TWU Pres. Matthew Guinan said contract ratification meetings will be held after final details are settled with operators of five private bus lines—Triboro Coach, Avenue B-East Broadway Lines, Jamaica Buses, Queens Transit and Steinway Transit, all employing TWU members.

No Fare Hike

Lindsay said he was informed Transit Authority fares can be kept "at the present level for the foreseeable future." TA Member John J. Gilhooley, representing management, called the settlement "fair and reasonable—one reasonably within the means of the Transit Authority."

The contract achieves a major union objective — retirement at half pay after 20 years of service, with a proviso that applicants for retirement must be at least 50. The latter point was the key to settlement. The authority said about half its employes are 20-year men.

The pension plan also provides "vesting" for employes who leave the bus lines and subways for another city job. The improvements take effect next July 1, if the state legislature approves. If approval is

Rail Clerks Win 13% Hike For 180,000

Chicago — The Railway Clerks have negotiated a two-year contract with the nation's railroads which will provide a big, four-step pay raise for 180,000 union members plus improved holiday and vacation benefits.

Pres. C. L. Dennis said the pay hike will average more than 13 percent—about 41.5 cents an hour.

The first step, a 2.5 percent increase, took effect Jan. 1.

The second step, six months later on July 1, 1968, will be 3.5 per cent. Starting not later than that date, a large portion of BRC members will share in a classifica-

'Taxpayer' Suits Threat To Federal Aid Concept

Federal aid to education and more than 50 other government programs would be endangered if the Supreme Court opens the door to "taxpayer suits" challenging the constitutionality of federal expenditures, the AFL-CIO warned.

The federation submitted a brief to the Supreme Court in a case involving a claim that the limited federal assistance given to church-operated schools in poor neighborhoods violates the constitutional separation of church and state.

A federal district court in New York dismissed the suit, citing a long-standing Supreme Court precedent that an individual must show a greater degree of damage than the expenditure of a portion of his taxes in order to compel the courts to rule on the constitutionality of a government action.

The decision was appealed to the Supreme Court and the AFL-CIO joined the government in urging that the appeal be rejected.

Labor's interest in the case, the AFL-CIO brief declared, stems from its historic advocacy of "maximum educational opportunity for all children."

The major 1965 breakthrough in federal aid to education was achieved, the federation noted, only through a carefully-balanced compromise which permitted a small portion of federal funds to be used to provide books for use in both public and private schools serving large numbers of poor children.

If the Supreme Court should permit the suit to be filed and the constitutional challenge is then up-

Medicare Rate Rises $1 For Doctor Bill Coverage

The 18 million elderly Americans now paying $3 a month for the voluntary medical insurance part of the medicare program—Part B—will pay $4, effective Apr. 1, the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare announced.

The largest single item going into the increase is higher doctor fees, which have gone up sharply since the medicare program began and are expected to rise still further.

The government will match the $4 premium, just as it has paid half the cost of the present program, so the insurance remains an outstanding bargain.

Part of the increased cost will also go to pay for added benefits provided in the medicare provisions of the new social security amendments. There will be fewer exclusions under the new law. For example, the insurance will pay the full charge for X-ray and pathology services to patients in hospitals and cover more physical therapy services.

The new rates anticipate an increase of about 5 percent a year in physician fees on top of the rise that has already taken place.

Orders 18 Workers Rehired:

New Court Ruling Hits J. P. Stevens

New York, N. Y.—J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., was hit with another court ruling here in the big textile chain's running battle to block its employes from exercising their rights to union representation.

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ordered Stevens to rehire and give lost pay to 17 workers it fired four years ago for joining the Textile Workers Union of America, and one employe fired for testifying at a National Labor Relations Board hearing. The violations occurred during an organizing campaign by the TWUA in cooperation with the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

The court order followed close on the heels of a previous order finding Stevens guilty of illegally firing 71 other workers in 20 Carolina plants of the company, a big government contractor. The Supreme Court refused to review a July 7 decision by judges of the same circuit and the company sent back-to-work notices to 69 of the victims. One had died, and one could not be located.

Stevens has not announced whether it will appeal the latest setback to the Supreme Court. TWUA Pres. William Pollock urged it to carry out the ruling "in good faith instead of delaying justice through another appeal."

Pollock called the decision a "major victory" for all Stevens workers and an equally significant victory for all other textile workers whose desire for union organization, he said, "has been frustrated by cynical and wholesale" law violations "in so many southern textile plants."

Unanimous Decision

The appeals court, in a unanimous decision by Judges J. Joseph Smith, J. Edward Lumbard and Wilfred Feinberg, ordered enforcement of an NLRB ruling last March holding Stevens officials and supervisors in North and South Carolina plants guilty of:

- Firing employes for their union activity.
- Punishing union supporters by not letting them work overtime.
- Otherwise interfering with, coercing and restraining employes in the exercise of their right to organize.

The NLRB ruling was that Stevens had denied its workers their rights "by making at least 30 threats of reprisal and promises of benefit to employes; by engaging in four acts of surveillance; by demanding on two occasions that employes remove union insignia; by posting threatening notices on its bulletin boards, and by discriminating against union adherents" in enforcement of a no-solicitation rule.

The board found Stevens' "extensive unfair labor practices and illegal conduct" such that unusual remedies are needed to "disabuse the employes of the effects of the company's flagrant conduct" and to drive home to employes the message that Stevens is "required to cease and desist from interfering with their rights."

The appeals court upheld the NLRB order that Stevens must stop threatening, spying on, penalizing or discharging employes for union activity; that it must reinstate all fired employes and make them whole for loss of pay or overtime; and that it must carry out these unusual remedies:

- For a one-year period give union representatives "reasonable access" to all plant bulletin boards and places where notices to employes are "customarily posted."
- Read the board's order to all its employes by departments and by shifts at meetings called during working time.
- Mail a copy of the NLRB notice to all employes in Stevens' Carolina plants, and post copies signed by a company representative. The notices affirm in detail that Stevens will obey the law and stop its illegal activities.

Modifications Made

The judges deleted a requirement that Stevens provide TWUA with a list of the names and addresses of all its employes within a year. Also they granted a company request that Stevens representatives need not personally read the NLRB order at employe meetings but specified that an NLRB representative may do so instead.

The judges called the NLRB remedies for Stevens' illegal conduct "unquestionably proper."

Six plants—at Rock Hill and Greenville, S. C., and Roanoke Rapids, N. C., were involved in the board order.

Findings have been made against Stevens in two other cases of what the union called "wholesale flagrant practices." Stevens filed an appeal in one and took no action in the other.

Meany Says Progress Gains 'Brick-by-Brick'

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called on union members to make great dreams of a better world come true through step-by-step progress "by men willing to work, to sacrifice, to struggle."

Eloquence is no substitute for action, Meany said, and the goal of abolishing poverty will not be achieved "by a congressional declaration of good intentions."

It will require, he stressed, "the combined effect of a vast number of undertakings, involving public works, tax policies, housing, education, social security, public assistance, medical care, unemployment compensation, wage-hour statutes and many more."

In an article inaugurating a new publication of the Seafarers, Meany stressed the need to build towards ultimate goals "brick after brick after brick."

There is no way "to leap from a dream to its realization without a great deal of hard work in between," Meany said.

"Keeping precinct card files, ringing doorbells, baby-sitting for voting mothers on Election Day may be uninspiring drudgery to some who believe that a proper platform for their eloquence would be more than enough," he said. "It would be easier, but it wouldn't win elections."

Writing on "The World We Want," Meany declared: "In setting our sights on that world, let none of our dreams be small ones. . . . But let us ever be aware that great gains are an accumulation of smaller ones, just as an army's triumph is won by its platoons, its companies and its battalions."

The first issue of International, to be published monthly by the SIU for all its members, included special articles by directors of eight AFL-CIO staff departments and a year-end progress report on the constituent parts of the SIU.

While various branches of the SIU have long had their own publications, International is the first publication written for the entire membership.

Toy Workers Help Needy Children

New York—Thousands of underprivileged and crippled children here had a brighter Christmas thanks to the efforts of Toy & Novelty Workers Local 223. The union, celebrating its thirtieth anniversary, handed out dolls and toys to more than 15,000 youngsters in time for Christmas.

For the better part of a day, children thronged Town Hall to receive everything from life-sized walking dolls to plastic play bikes, games, baseball bats and stuffed animals.

Harry O. Damino, manager of Local 223 and president of the international union, said the program was more than four months in the planning.

denied, union members will get additional money equivalent to the pension costs.

Other provisions:

Wages are raised 5 percent now for all workers, with an additional 6 percent advance due July 1, 1969.

On-duty employes are covered by a $50,000 life insurance benefit for those killed by assault or robbery.

Health and welfare benefits were improved, and it was agreed that retirees will continue to get the single-payment bonus of $500 the union won after a 1966 strike.

"Swing" runs for conductors were eliminated to reduce employes' waiting or transportation costs. Vacations were equalized for workers on MABSTOA, the Manhattan and Bronx subsidiary of the city authority, to bring them to the level of TA workers—four weeks after five years, 5 after 25. Wages of private-line workers will be brought up to the TWU level by July 1969.

Similar contract benefits were won for 1,700 employes of TA lines in Queens and Staten Island. They were represented in joint bargaining by the Transit Union.

Blind Workers Strike Low-Wage Workshop

St. Louis—Blind strikers at the Lighthouse for the Blind have learned to depend on their only friend in need—Machinists Local 1345, and strike benefits of $40 a week.

The workers, 55 in all, report they were forced to strike shortly after voting to affiliate with the IAM eight months ago. Lighthouse directors refused to hear their grievances, and have declined to meet with union representatives since the strike began.

Lighthouse employes are trapped in a no-man's land of labor-management relations, the union notes. The National Labor Relations Board has declined to order an election, asserting the Lighthouse is a "sheltered workshop" and exempt from wage-hour laws. The workers also are denied protection of the Minimum Wage Act and even the Workmen's Compensation Act.

"They are not clients or wards of the Lighthouse," a spokesman said. "They are performing as regular employes, and much of their work is competitive with products of other companies."

Some workers got straight-time pay of 75 and 90 cents an hour. Others were on "incentive" pay and got less.

A previous effort to win fair wages ended when the workers came back to their jobs after a nine-day strike in 1962. Management promised to meet with a grievance committee and a safety committee and rehire all strikers, but the worker chairman was refused his job and no meetings ever were held, the union says.

This time the Lighthouse "blackballed" five strike leaders and has hired a dozen other handicapped persons as strikebreakers, the union charges.

tion and inequity fund, financed by a 5-cents-an-hour contribution by management.

In the second year of the contract, wages will be increased 2 percent on Jan. 1, 1969, and an additional 3 percent six months later.

A provision giving workers pay for holidays that fall on their days off will mean an average of $68 a year more to each employe, Dennis said. The vacation clause was modified to provide a two-week vacation after two years, compared with the present five-year requirement.

The union agreed to a no-strike clause during the two-year contract term.

Job Protection Pact

In another development, six rail shopcraft unions negotiated a strong job protection agreement protecting more than 10,000 workers against any adverse effect from the planned merger of four northwestern railroads.

The unions, affiliates of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept., won a guarantee of lifetime jobs for members employed on Great Northern, Northern Pacific, Burlington, and the Spokane, Portland & Seattle railroads.

Provisions of the agreement were described by both union and management spokesmen as going substantially beyond the conditions usually prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission to protect employes when railroads merge.

Members of the Machinists, Carmen, Boilermakers, Sheet Metal Workers, Firemen & Oilers, and Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers may not be fired or furloughed. Temporary layoffs are permitted only during emergencies such as snowstorms or floods.

If business falls off more than 5 percent—which the railroads do not anticipate—the pay guarantee would be reduced slightly but the job safeguards would be maintained.

Separation Pay

The agreement also provides for moving allowances where job locations are shifted and for separation allowances for older employes who choose to resign.

Any qualified employes who have been furloughed since Jan. 2, 1966, by any of the railroads will be recalled to service when the merger takes place and covered by the job protection agreement.

Similar, although not identical, job protection agreements had previously been negotiated with the four railroads by the Railway Clerks, Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, Locomotive Engineers and the Train Dispatchers.

The new company will be named the Great Northern Pacific & Burlington Lines.

NEW CONTRACT between the Railway Clerks and the nation's major railroads boosts wages 13 percent over two years and improves holiday and vacation benefits. At the Chicago signing ceremony, seated are Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway Clerks; J. P. Hiltz, Jr., chairman of the management National Railway Labor Conference, and Edward Davis, union attorney. Standing, Jack Fletcher, union industry relations director; J. W. Oram and M. E. Parks, management regional conference chairman, and H. E. Greer, research director.

3 Drug Firms Convicted On Price-Fixing Charge

New York—Three major names in drug manufacturing have been found guilty by a federal jury of conspiring to control the production and distribution of more than a billion dollars worth of antibiotics.

American Cyanamid, Bristol Myers and Charles Pfizer & Co. were convicted of violations of the Sherman Antitrust Act for price fixing activities between the years 1953 to 1961.

The companies, said the government, entered into an agreement in the mid-50s to produce and distribute certain antibiotics in a way that monopolized the market for the big manufacturers.

Pfizer and Cyanamid realized enormous profits on one antibiotic called "tetracycline," the government charged. It said the cost to the firms of manufacturing 100 capsules was $3.87, but the companies sold the same number to pharmacists for $30.60, and the cost to the consumer was $51.

Two other companies, Olin Mathieson and Upjohn, were named as co-conspirators in the proceedings but were not defendants in the case.

Maximum penalties on the charges are fines of $150,000 for each defendant. The convictions also open the door for civil suits that could be lodged against the drug companies by major purchasers to recover their losses. The Sherman Act provides for treble damages against firms guilty of monopolistic practices.

The pharmaceutical industry was also troubled from another quarter when Food & Drug Commissioner James L. Goddard warned that some 300 drugs marketed under about 1,600 different familiar brand names would be withdrawn from the market because they have not met government efficacy tests.

The drugs, which do not do the job they're advertised to do, include some old-time family "favorites," said Goddard.

SAG Welfare Plan Adds Disability Pay

Hollywood, Calif.—Members of the Screen Actors Guild will be eligible for a unique supplementary disability benefit of $150 a week for on-the-job injuries, starting with the eighth day.

The benefits, provided under the union-industry welfare plan, are in addition to state workmen's compensation payments. They will be provided for up to 52 weeks of disability.

Mobile Health Clinic Loaned To Farm Union

San Francisco — A 13-ton mobile health unit, which has rumbled through the Southeast from Florida to Mississippi for 10 years serving members of the Ladies' Garment Workers, will bring modern medical care to California farm workers.

The ILGWU has loaned its unit to the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee to help meet the need for health care in the California farm belt.

UFWOC Dir. Cesar Chavez said the union plans to utilize voluntary physicians and medical students as well as a full-time staff doctor and registered nurse to staff the unit and develop a comprehensive health care program. The union already has a small clinic in operation.

Chavez estimated that less than 1 percent of farm workers have ever had a full physical checkup and he said county hospitals show "no great interest" in the care of field workers.

The mobile unit provided more than 30,000 comprehensive physical examinations to garment workers during its southern tour of duty, turning up the need for medical attention in a large portion of the workers examined.

MOBILE HEALTH CLINIC, loaned by the Ladies' Garment Workers to the United Farm Workers Organization Committee, is accepted by UFWOC Dir. Cesar Chavez, left, who said it would be used "to bring the farm worker into the stream of 20th Century medical care." Presenting the 13-ton, $50,000 mobile unit are Cornelius Wall, manager of the ILGWU's San Francisco Joint Board, and Dr. Richard B. Heilman of the union's southeast region, where the unit has been in operation for more than 10 years.

Pharmacy Battle Won By Harrisburg Unions

Harrisburg, Pa.—Union members here will have their own pharmacy—after a nearly 16-month battle with an industry-dominated state regulatory agency.

Commonwealth Court Judge Carl B. Shelley denounced the State Board of Pharmacy for a "flagrant abuse" of its powers and ordered it to issue a permit to the Harrisburg Central Labor Council.

The council's Health & Welfare Committee had hired a pharmacist, remodeled quarters for the union pharmacy and put in a supply of drugs when the State Board of Pharmacy turned down the routine application for an operating permit.

The board never spelled out its objections, but Judge Shelley said in his opinion that it was obvious that the permit was denied because "a group of unions are sponsoring this pharmacy."

Another obvious factor, he suggested, was the belief that "this pharmacy will sell its merchandise at a lower price than other pharmacies."

Self-Interest Cited

He said the real issue in the case was whether the regulatory agency can base its decisions on "economic self-interest" of private pharmacy owners rather than on "the public health and safety."

He stressed that there was "nothing on the record" to justify the denial of the permit.

In a unique sidelight to the case, the Pennsylvania Justice Dept. declined to defend the action of the pharmacy board in court.

Deputy Atty. Gen. Charles W. Woods told the court that his department had recommended that a license be issued and declared: "I do not see how one more drug store—one more pharmacy dispensing drugs in Harrisburg—can be harmful to the public health."

An attorney for the private three-county Pharmaceutical Association in the Harrisburg area sought permission to represent the state regulatory agency but the court refused to permit it.

Earlier the Central Labor Council's Health & Welfare Committee had called on the governor to investigate the manner in which the state agency grants or withholds licenses for pharmacies and whether there is a conflict of interest on the part of members of the board.

The six-member board is composed of five pharmacists and the state Commissioner of Occupational Licenses, who voted to grant the permit.

AFL-CIO Merges 2 Midwest Regions

Consolidation of two AFL-CIO regions has been announced by Organization Dir. William L. Kircher.

Wisconsin, previously Region XII, has been added to Region XI, which covers Michigan. Headquarters of the new two-state Region XI will remain in Detroit. The Milwaukee office, previously Region XII headquarters, is being maintained as a sub-regional office.

Region XI Dir. John F. Schreier continues as director of the enlarged region. Frank Cronin, who had been assistant director in the Wisconsin region, is now assistant director of the merged operation.

Lucky Strike Is Struck by Tobacco Union

Richmond, Va. — More than 5,000 members of the Tobacco Workers took to the picket lines when contract talks with the American Tobacco Co. failed to dissolve a deadlock.

Members of three union locals struck at company plants in Richmond, Durham, N.C. and Louisville, Ky. At Reidsville, N.C., union members also are supporting the walkout.

Major issues in the strike are wages, work load, retirement benefits and a cost of living clause.

The union seeks a sizable increase to improve wages averaging $2.60 an hour. Management countered a request for a 50-cent raise in the first year of a three-year pact by offering 37 cents an hour over three years.

The walkout began when management refused to improve its wage offer, union bargainers said.

American Tobacco products include Lucky Strike, Pall Mall, Tareyton and Omar cigarettes; Five Brothers and Bull Durham tobaccos and Roi-Tan, La Corona and Antonio y Cleopatra cigars.

The Doctor-Bill Gouge

NEARLY 18 MILLION AMERICANS will have their medical insurance costs increased by 33⅓ percent on April 1, 1968, to take care of the unconscionable and unprecedented increase in doctors' fees over the past two years.

The hike to $4 per month for the voluntary medical insurance program under medicare means that those over 65 with limited incomes will have an annual out-of-pocket cost of nearly $100 a year before they get any reimbursement on their medical bills.

The single largest factor for the increase lies at the doorstep of the medical profession. The rapidly rising cost of medical care has been widely publicized. Not so widely known is that physicians' fees went up more than three times as much as the overall Consumer Price Index and the average weekly earnings of factory workers for the 12 months ending June 1967.

The higher fees are helping augment physicians' incomes, currently averaging $35,000 to $40,000 a year, and moving upward as they add to their income full fees from medicare and medicaid patients who previously were treated at reduced rates.

There is a great and obvious need for some control of fee schedules. The AFL-CIO has proposed that physicians abide by the "reasonable and customary fee" requirement of the medicare program; that doctors' fees be kept in line with the increase in the overall price index; that any major changes in the fee schedule should be reviewed by an advisory board with consumer representation as well as by the secretary of HEW.

Whatever the method, the right of elderly Americans to comprehensive health care within their means must be protected and assured. There must be an end to physicians' fees set on a "whatever-the-traffic-will-bear" philosophy.

Stevens v. The Law

THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT has finally replaced J. P. Stevens as the law in southern textile mill towns, lifting the shroud of fear and reprisal that has enveloped union organizing campaigns.

The giant textile chain, which has defied the law to the point that the National Labor Relations Board had seemingly run out of remedies, finally bowed to the U.S. Supreme Court and sent out notices to 69 workers fired as long as four years ago telling them they would be rehired. These workers, fired in most cases for joining the union or aiding an organizing campaign, have in many instances been blacklisted in textile towns throughout the South.

Not yet completely clear is whether Stevens will go beyond complying with the finding of the court and put an end to the practices that have caused the NLRB to find it guilty of violating the law in four separate cases. Three of these cases are still in the courts.

In terms of a modern, 20th Century South, expanding and growing economically, Stevens would do well to fully accept modern day concepts of labor-management relations and the rights of workers to form unions and bargain collectively.

Headed Neo-Fascist Group:

Liberty Lobby Is New Outlet For Hate Peddler Allen Zoll

The following article on the Liberty Lobby is reprinted from Homefront, the publication of the Institute for American Democracy.

VETERAN HATE PEDDLER Allen Zoll is a rare bird on at least two counts. He is one of the few living radical right figures ever to head an organization listed as subversive by the United States attorney general, and at 72 he is emerging as a key leader in an organization currently showing more bounce than the Birch Society.

Zoll's old organization, "American Patriots, Inc.," was a neo-fascist group listed as subversive during the 1940s. And early this year, he was installed in the Washington office of Liberty Lobby.

Apparently, his comeback speech was at a Liberty Lobby presentation held in connection with the annual Birchist God, Family and Country Rally in Boston. An IAD observer was present, and Homefront became the first publication to take note of the fact that Allen Zoll was back in circulation.

In the late 1930s, Zoll worked for unity within the "Movement," organizing rallies featuring such radical right dignitaries as Joe Kamp, Merwin K. Hart, Elizabeth Dilling and John Eoghan Kelly. The latter was convicted in 1943 as an unregistered agent of Franco's Spain.

Now, Zoll has formed an alliance with the equally elusive Willis Carto, the former Bircher who founded Liberty Lobby. For Zoll, some of the faces are new, but the game is the same.

If Welch drops the ball, Liberty Lobby seems ready to scoop it up and run with it. At LL's 1967 national convention in Washington at the Shoreham the 300 delegates heard many friendly references to the Birch Society. And a good many super-patriots belong to both organizations.

The Birch Society and Liberty Lobby work for the same ends, but rely on different means. Whereas Welch holds the Birch "educational program" is more fundamental than partisan politics, Liberty Lobby frankly works to "Build a Party Within a Party," in the words of one LL manual, and the party it has in mind is spelled out as the GOP.

Both constantly call for a cessation of trade with Russia. While Welch is concentrating on his ill-conceived petition campaign, Liberty Lobby on two occasions has run comic strip advertisements in major newspapers, and members of Congress ruefully admit they do stimulate a barrage of mail.

Both organizations produce film and brochures and run a speakers bureau, but the Birch Society does far more in this area. While not even all the Birchers buy the JBS' $10-a-year American Opinion, LL's Liberty Letter, at $2-a-year, had shown 174,295 circulation on its post office statement last year, a figure well in excess of that of any other Far Right publication save Howard Kerschner's Christian Economics.

Each month's Liberty Letter carries a public list of organizational meetings to which subscribers are invited. The LL field staff is combing the nation, a few states at a time.

The Liberty Letter, briskly anti-labor, isolationist, has a hard-sell approach to ultra-right economics. It has been recommended to constituents by Congressmen James Utt (R-Calif.), Albert Watson (R-S.C.), and John Rarick (D-La.). Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) is one of the stars in the Liberty Lobby movie, "The Otepka Case."

MANY PROMINENT Birch members endorse Liberty Lobby. One of these is A. G. Heinsohn, Jr., a member of the Birch top council, and a source of funds for the radical right.

While Curtis Dall, FDR's ex-son-in-law, is LL's chairman, all observers agree the real leader is the mysterious Willis Carto.

Carto has a great affinity for anti-Semites. Kenneth Goff, long-time associate of Gerald L. K. Smith and the late Conde McGinley, was M.C. at LL's 1962 Washington rally. Carto has acquired American Mercury, merged it with Western Destiny and, in the process, attracted a stable of known anti-Semitic editors and writers.

In 1961, Zoll was on Billy James Hargis' staff, and the Christian Crusade bought Zoll's files. In 1962, Carto attended a top-policy conference called by Hargis in Washington in an apparent effort to bring a greater degree of unity to the radical right cause. Now Carto is on the move, and Zoll is with him.

Parade notes that Zoll "frequently beat Adolph Hitler's drums" before his American Patriots were listed as "subversive."

We'd like to think that time has mellowed the ancient anti-Semite, but both Carto and Zoll are acting like representatives of a cause whose time has come.

And to the right of the Birch Society domain, the land is even more frightening.

Zagoria Urges 'Equal Break':

Papers Tune Out Labor News, Give Business Top Coverage

The following is excerpted from an article "Equal Break for Labor News" by Sam Zagoria, a member of the National Labor Relations Board and a former reporter for the Washington Post, which appeared in the Fall 1967 issue of the Columbia Journalism Review.

IS THERE TODAY "a considerable amount of honest, impartial coverage of labor news" in the American daily press?

Starting with the word "considerable," I believe a fair answer is that there is not. Of course, there will be those who argue that there is not much labor news to start with, defining news by their own standards of controversy or violence.

But putting aside for a moment those who assay the police reporter's approach to news and appealing to those who sincerely believe that newspapers are better, let us examine the labor news that does appear.

Generally speaking, when such news is carried it focuses on labor in trouble—strikes, lockouts, picketing, personality disputes among union leaders. At the same time, business pages in the paper, day in and day out, carry column after column of good news—news of earnings reports, company expansions, mergers, personnel promotions, new contracts, or orders, for example. There may be a few negative items, but mostly the news is good news.

Relatively unreported are the decisions of the hundreds of thousands of employes to have a union represent them or not (usually in National Labor Relations Board secret ballot elections) or the agreement of thousands of employers and their employes on new contracts setting the shape and tempo of the third of their lives devoted to work. And this is only a part of the news which could be developed by a competent, interested labor editor.

Today, in the absence of trained labor reporters who have continuing contacts, background, and resulting perspective, labor news is frequently thrown in the lap of the police reporter, general assignment man, or the rewrite man, accompanied by the handouts of company or union or, sometimes, both. The result all too often is oversimplification, exacerbation, and a story unfair to the participants and certainly to the readers. John Q. Reader, for whose information millions are invested in newspaper plants and services, for whom hundreds are employed to seek out truth, is left with an impression that labor is always causing trouble or is always in trouble.

Why is there such a lop-sided lack of interest in labor news coverage as compared with business news coverage? In a period when specialists are many and growing in number on most newspaper staffs—education, science, politics, courts, municipal and state government, even international affairs and civil rights, why no labor specialist?

People in the labor movement have their suspicions—newspapers receive advertising revenue from stockbroker ads and almost none from unions; newspaper publishers are businessmen themselves and so are keenly interested in business news; newspaper publishers are also employers and are not eager to carry news giving unions recognition or credit.

Whatever the validity of these thoughts, it is interesting to recognize that many of the companies whose prosperity is so thoroughly reported in the business pages probably have unions; also that the presence of unions often raises income levels at the plants where they have contracts (and frequently at the ones nearby where they do not) and thus provides more of a response for the retail store ads appearing in the newspapers.

Even more important, I suggest, is that good labor reporting could point up problems before they reach the public dispute stage, the stage where the whole community (newspaper included) suffers. Early attention can do much to ease relationships, getting at them when they are chilling or even slushing, but not frozen. For example, efforts to organize hospital and nursing home personnel, apartment house staffs, government workers including teachers, welfare recipients, and police patrolmen, come as an utter shock to many opinion leaders.

BUT LABOR NEWS is not limited to hard news of labor unions, not by a long shot, for only a fifth of the nation's working men and women have joined unions. There is a lot going on in the world of work—involving almost 40 percent of the nation's total population—which could be reported more fully.

What's happening to pension programs in terms of benefits, eligibility age, or the new move toward portability?

How stable is the labor force in the community? Is the national trend to more jobs in a working lifetime reflected here? Are jobs moving from the central city to the suburbs? Are working wives increasing in number and how does this affect family relationships?

And there are the dynamic tensions in the labor movement—the continuing relationship of craft to industrial unions and the internal change of some unions into largely industrial unions; the growing emphasis on assembly line, continuous-flow processing, and the effect on work jurisdictions; the impact of civil rights on limited supply unions and the emotion-ridden impact of civil rights on seniority—a heart issue in unionism.

These are intended only as suggestive—teasers to tempt editors and publishers into rediscovering the world of work. I do not suggest that every newspaper should have a labor editor or labor reporter, although I know that the mere appointment could lead to more and better coverage, but at least that papers give as much attention as to advising readers on how to kill ants on oak trees, the closing stock prices on the Toronto exchange, or the horse racing results from half a dozen tracks. Working people, their work-day interests, concerns, and activities, should be mirrored in the papers, too.

Biemiller Reviews Session:

'67 Legislative Disappointments Laid to Conservative Coalition

REVIVAL of the conservative coalition in the House of Representatives last year halted new progressive legislation and even forced some retreats in appropriations for existing programs.

That's the AFL-CIO appraisal of the first session of the 90th Congress, given to reporters by Andrew J. Biemiller, director of the federation's Dept. of Legislation.

Biemiller, interviewed on Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Radio Network, said labor was forced on the defensive in 1967, recalling that the biggest fights were to save existing programs rather than shape new ones.

He said that "in terms of the general welfare," the social security welfare amendments were "one of the biggest disappointments" for labor. "We think that they set back the welfare system of the country by about 100 years," he said. He took sharp issue with the cutback of funds for aid to dependent children, which, he said, means that the states will now decide "whether they are going to sterilize mothers or starve children."

Biemiller said that despite official GOP claims to the contrary, there was a revival of the southern Democrat-Republican coalition in the House. "The Senate has saved this Congress from being the real throwback that the House leadership of both the southern Democrats and the Republicans would like it to be," he asserted, adding, "the Senate still has a working liberal majority."

JOB CREATION in both urban and rural areas, a major attack on housing problems, stronger education programs and additional civil rights legislation will be areas of major Capitol Hill battles in the second session that opens Jan. 15, Biemiller said.

The AFL-CIO "will be in there fighting to pass the soundest legislation that we can," he declared.

He was questioned by Kenneth Crawford, contributing editor and columnist for Newsweek magazine, and Neil MacNeil, chief congressional correspondent for Time magazine.

TUCKED AWAY in America's obscure byways are millions of men, women and children who live in shamefully poor conditions, who are generally neglected by national social and economic legislation, who rarely raise a rumpus against their condition and, yet, who represent the breeding ground for much of the restlessness and disorders of our central cities.

They are the rural poor and their further neglect can only bring future tragedy for the nation.

Their plight has been analyzed by the National Commission on Rural Poverty which has sounded a warning to the nation that must not be neglected.

The rural poor are by no means all Negroes. There are nearly 14 million of them of whom some 11 million are white and the rest non-white. They don't always live on farms. Instead, they live in villages, small towns or in the open country.

While every state in the union and nearly every county of the country have their share, the heaviest concentrations are in the South and on Indian reservations. Hunger and even nutritional starvation have been found in some rural areas; no jobs is a perennial problem as whole regions have lost their economic base to changing technological conditions; education is often pitiably inadequate; health services are frequently non-existent.

"In desperation," says the commission's report, "people have been migrating from rural poverty areas frequently to wind up in urban ghettos. Yet migration from farms continues at a high rate—about 850,000 a year. In addition to this, there is a heavy migration of nonfarm residents from rural America to the cities."

The plight of the core cities, notably the Negro ghettos is widely known. Many of our programs are designed to solve core city problems. Too frequently, the report points out, relatively little has been done to meet the problems of the rural areas which year after year continue to pour their desperate and poorly equipped natives into the cities only to compound already tragic poverty and desperation.

What can be done? The report calls for a four point program: (1) Jobs. (2) Medical care. (3) Decent housing. (4) Education.

The commission offers a number of reasons why the American people should put such a program into effect. Not the least is that simple justice demands action.

IT IS NOW a long way to the hot days of July and August in the core cities. Yet, already, there is an undercurrent of foreboding among officials as to what next summer will bring. They have the warnings of past summers and the pattern of disorder and violence that has developed in recent years. They have threats of new disorders to come. The President's special committee that is to report on last summer's riots has sounded a note of urgency in announcing that it plans to turn in its final report before the winter is out.

In the light of these facts whatever can be done now to help in solving the problems of rural poverty, in giving the desperate, both white and Negro, in the rural regions hope for the future, can make an enormous contribution to easing next summer's tensions and explosions.

High on the list of solutions is full employment, jobs that provide a decent living and an end of discrimination of all kinds against rural people, including racial discrimination against non-whites.

Specifically the commission has recommended that the government stand "ready to provide jobs, at the national minimum wage or better, to every person willing and able to work." This is a bold proposal, but it is one that gets at the heart of the matter.

It is not too soon to begin thinking and acting about the problem of rural poverty. With time rushing by as it does and next summer approaching with its inevitable civic crisis, the problem of rural poverty should take the highest priority in the second session of the 90th Congress.

REVIVAL of the conservative coalition in the House of Representatives led to the disappointing record of the first session of the 90th Congress, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller (center) told Kenneth Crawford (left) of Newsweek magazine and Neil MacNeil of Time magazine on Labor News Conference. The public affairs interview is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on Mutual radio.

How to Buy:

Rise in Part B Medicare Cost Laid to Fee-Jumping Doctors

By Sidney Margolius

THE DOCTORS who raised fees with the advent of medicare have got in their licks. As a result of the hikes, the cost of Part B of medicare is being raised to $4 a month from the present $3.

Part B is the voluntary section of medicare which pays most of an older person's doctor bills (80 percent after the first $50 of total annual bills). Unlike Part A, which automatically provides hospital insurance for people 65 or older with no extra fee, those who also want Part B must pay a monthly charge deducted from their social security checks.

It had been expected that the Part B fee would be increased to $3.50. About 27 cents of the $1 rise finally found necessary is due to increased doctor fees.

When doctors started to raise fees in 1966 for older people especially, many claimed that they were merely eliminating a special cut rate they previously gave moderate-income older patients. They felt the raises now were justified with medicare helping to pay the bills.

The doctors' increases, however, wiped out some of the anticipated benefits of the Part B medical insurance. This has been especially true in the case of doctors who refuse to take an "assignment," which means that they collect from the government and accept what is considered to be a "fair and reasonable" charge.

But only about 50 percent of doctors accept such assignments. (The choice is up to the doctor.) The others insist that the patient himself collect from the government. Thus, many elderly patients have found that they must pay the difference between the charge the insurance carrier representing the government considers reasonable and what the doctor actually charges. Too, the patient gets back just 80 percent of the "reasonable" charge in any case.

For example, for an operation with a "fair and reasonable" price tag of $300, for which the doctor charged $400, the patient would have to pay the "deductible" of 20 percent of the $300, plus the extra $100, or a total of $160.

Even for an office visit, if the doctor charged $15, as specialists often do, but the insurance carrier considered the charge should be $12, the patient would have to pay $5.40 of the $15 bill.

Recent rises in medical fees have hit younger families as well as the oldsters. In general, doctor fees have risen 13 percent in a little less than two years.

These hikes, together with increased charges for hospitalization and other health services, have caused a growing crisis in health-care expenses. On the average, you now have to pay about 15 percent more than two years ago for such care.

Actually, medicare has aided younger families to some extent. Several Blue Cross plans have reported that the fact they no longer need to insure older people, who require most hospital care, has kept rates from rising even more.

Even at the new $4 rate, Part B is still a good value and safeguard, especially for any older person who expects to have over $98 of medical bills a year. Besides paying for most of an elderly patient's doctor bills, Part B also pays for additional home nursing visits, diagnostic tests, prosthetic devices and a number of other medical expenses.

One change in medicare provisions just enacted by Congress in the latest revision of the social security law may be of some help to older people who have the Part B doctor-bill insurance. The patient no longer will need a receipted bill from the doctor to collect from the government. Either an itemized or receipted bill will do. This change will solve the problem of laying out the money beforehand.

Despite '68 Prospects:

Consumers Cautious Over Price Trends

PROSPECTS ARE THAT 1968 will be a good year, but there is no prospect of a boom in the consumer sector of the economy even if there should be no tax increase.

This evaluation emerges from the latest quarterly survey by Survey Research Center of the University of Michigan's Institute for Social Research.

Consumer sentiment deteriorated during the last quarter of 1967, according to the SRC findings. Primarily because consumers believe that inflationary price increases are in the making, business prospects were viewed in November 1967 with less optimism than in August.

The SRC surveys have been conducted regularly since 1951. They explore consumer expectations and buying intentions, and also explore the reasons for changes in attitudes.

From November 1965 to November 1966, the index of consumer sentiment declined steadily and substantially. Some 60 percent of the 1966 decline was recovered during the first nine months of 1967, but about 40 percent of that recovery was lost from August to November 1967.

Surveys in the first three quarters of 1967 revealed only moderate improvement in consumer sentiment and willingness to buy.

"During the last few months inflationary expectations have become more pronounced," the report reveals. "In November 1967 more respondents than earlier this year reported having heard unfavorable news, including frequent mention of price increases. Because of worry about the expected trend of prices, many consumers feel that they will have to spend more on necessities and therefore must postpone some discretionary expenditures."

THE ECONOMISTS emphasize, however, that a decline in the SRC index in one quarter must be confirmed over longer periods before a downward trend becomes certain. They also point out that the current level of the index is higher than its low point a year ago.

A substantial portion of consumers remains optimistic, the report states. "These people are aware of the prevailing good times, think they will continue, especially in view of the increase in government expenditures, and are impressed by the rising trend of incomes and purchasing power. The war in Viet Nam, although contributing to uncertainty, is viewed by the great majority of consumers as a stimulant to the domestic economy."

The outlook for construction of one-family houses and for automobiles appears somewhat more favorable than a year ago, the report adds. As of November, mortgage funds were more readily available and expressed intentions to buy cars were higher than a year earlier.

On the whole, consumers think that the increase in the prices of 1968 model cars does not matter a great deal; the majority say they are willing to pay extra money for safety features.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Lines in Defense of Introverts By a (Hah!) 'Shy, Ingoing' Type

By Jane Goodsell

EVERY TIME somebody mentions The Happy Outgoing Personality (and somebody almost always does) I feel apologetic because I don't have one. I'm the shy, ingoing type.

I was born that way. When I was a child, I hid behind my mother's skirts and refused to answer the nice ladies who asked me how old I was now. I stared at my shoes when nice gentlemen chucked me under the chin and suggested playfully that the cat had my tongue.

Then I grew up and began reading books on how to develop a happy, outgoing personality, how to become popular in ten easy steps, how to be a sparkling conversationalist and how to turn my personality minuses into plus factors.

So what happened? Not very much. I'm still shy. After years of effort to turn myself into an exuberant, vivacious, bubbling extrovert, the cat's still got my tongue.

And just between you and me, I've decided to let him keep it. I'm giving up the struggle to wriggle out of my shell, cast off my inhibitions, loosen up and let myself go. I'm not going to read any more advice on how to turn myself into somebody else. I'm going to stay just as shy and tongue-tied as I am. I'm going to settle down and make myself comfortable right here in my shell. Why not? It's nice and peaceful and quiet. And I'm happy.

Well, anyway, I could be happy if I didn't have the uneasy feeling that I'm a social misfit and ought to be ashamed of myself. Ever since they invented The Happy Outgoing Personality, life has been rough sledding for us introverts. We're treated like social problems, and viewed as maladjusted unfortunates who aren't getting enough fun out of life.

SOMEBODY'S ALWAYS prodding us to let down our hair, kick up our heels and let ourselves go! Wake up and live! Get into group activities! Don't be a wet blanket! Sign up for the volleyball team! Get on a committee! Join the three-legged race! Make a speech! Get out on the dance floor and do the Boogaloo! Stop worrying! Don't be so self-conscious! Develop your personality! Be magnetic! Compelling! Vibrant! Popular!

It wasn't always thus. Time was when ingoing personalities were treated with tolerance and understanding. They even enjoyed a certain prestige, based on the theory that still waters run deep, and goodness only knew what deep, profound thoughts might be going through their heads.

But no more. Today, an ingoing personality is considered a psychological defect. Quiet children who'd rather cut out paper dolls or curl up with "Treasure Island" than play kick-the-can with their peer group, are hustled off to psychiatrists to have their personalities overhauled.

Enough's enough. I think it's time somebody spoke up in defense of introverts, and there's a lot to be said for us. Our big trouble is that we're misunderstood.

Winn-Dixie Threats Draw Contempt Fine

Jacksonville, Fla.—Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc., the South's leading grocery chain, has been fined $10,000 for criminal contempt of the federal courts. John Blackburn, superintendent of the chain's perishable-goods warehouse here, was fined $500 on the same charge.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals found Winn-Dixie guilty of intentionally violating two court decrees aimed at thwarting its interference with its employes' right to organize. Company lawyers did not indicate whether they will appeal the penalties, which are among the heaviest ever imposed in labor law cases.

In another action, Trial Examiner Sydney S. Asher, Jr., recommended that Winn-Dixie be ordered to pay $36,476 to six employes fired in 1963 when the company closed a cheese-processing operation at the Jacksonville warehouse because the six—all women—were members of Meat Cutters Local 433.

Winn-Dixie was identified by union witnesses at recent hearings of a Senate Labor subcommittee as "viciously anti-union."

A union officer said the contempt fines may help to "civilize" Winn-Dixie's labor relations and bring changes in a 20-year-old policy that kept unions out of all company locations until 1967.

Company Pres. A. D. Davis was announced as co-chairman of the Citizens Committee to preserve Taft-Hartley when the group was formed in 1965 to lobby against repeal of Section 14(b) of the law, which permits states to ban the union shop.

Local 433 won bargaining rights last year for 200 employes at Jacksonville and the unaffiliated Teamsters recently organized the chain's New Orleans warehouse.

Not Above the Law

"The fines demonstrate that Winn-Dixie is not above the law," said Sec.-Treas. Robert Ackerman of Local 433. "The $10,000 penalty is meaningless to a firm with nearly $1 billion in sales a year and more than 700 stores, but the stigma of criminal contempt cannot be laughed off."

Winn-Dixie was charged with contempt by the National Labor Relations Board for refusing to abide by orders enforced by the 5th Circuit in 1963 and 1965. Appeals judges ordered company officials to stand trial and returned a guilty verdict.

Appeals Judges Griffin B. Bell, Irving L. Goldberg and James P. Coleman ruled that the NLRB proved beyond a reasonable doubt that Winn-Dixie and Blackburn "knowingly, wilfully and intentionally" committed criminal contempt of the court.

The court cited "coercive and threatening" questioning of an employe as to union activities in the warehouse—questioning conducted by a supervisor answerable to Blackburn, and Blackburn's posting of a petition to decertify the union. The latter action, the court noted, violated the specific language of a 1963 court order. Winn-Dixie was held responsible for both violations.

Auto Workers Ratify Pacts At GM, Deere

Detroit—The Auto Workers ratified new contracts with General Motors Corp. and Deere & Co., then went back to the bargaining table seeking a settlement with American Motors Corp.

The vote to ratify new national terms covering 380,000 GM employes was by a 5-1 margin among production workers, 7-2 among the skilled trades. The union urged all GM locals to intensify their efforts to settle local issues. It directed locals which have not settled by Jan. 9 to submit a list of unresolved issues along with a request for strike sanction, if that step seems necessary.

The new national pact assures first-year wage hikes of 20 cents an hour for production workers, 50 cents for skilled workers, with additional increases in 1969 and 1970, plus major gains in pensions, layoff and disability pay and other fringe benefits.

Deere & Co. employes voted to end a 39-day strike against the farm implement firm. They ratified a three-year settlement providing wage hikes of 17.5 - 37 cents an hour retroactive to Oct. 16; additional 3 percent boosts in 1968 and 1969; an income security plan and other gains. The pact represents the first "master" contract ever won at the Moline, Ill., firm, the union said.

Still unsettled is the AMC contract, pacts with four other farm equipment firms, and a strike of 5,500 UAW members that started in November against the Detroit Tooling Association, representing tool and die shop employers.

New Standards Outlined On Car Safety, Exhausts

Two government agencies proposed new motor vehicle safety standards and control of air pollution by autos and trucks to take effect in 1969-70.

HEW Sec. John W. Gardner proposed tighter federal standards to control air pollution by motor vehicles effective with the 1970 model year, the standards to replace the regulations governing 1968 models.

The proposed standards, published in the Federal Register and open to comment for 30 days, would lower by about one-third the 1968 level of allowable automotive exhaust pollutants.

A typical automobile uncontrolled on pollution effect gives off 9.7 grams of hydrocarbons and 71 grams of carbon monoxide per vehicle mile, contributing to the air pollution problems. Under the standards for the 1970 models, the limit would be 2.2 grams of hydrocarbons and 23 grams of carbon monoxide.

The Dept. of Transportation published 12 new federal auto safety standards in the Federal Register, eight of which would take effect after Dec. 31, 1968, and four after Dec. 31, 1969.

The proposals apply to such equipment as protective head rests, door locks, hood latches, ornamental exterior protrusions, windshield wiping and washing systems, windshield defrosting and defogging systems, concealed headlights and theft protection systems.

Anti-Poverty Trainees Rally Support to OEO

Boston, Mass.—Are trade unionists really concerned about the poor—concerned enough to take specific action to add their support to the anti-poverty program in their communities?

Julius Bernstein, secretary of the Massachusetts AFL-CIO Human Rights Committee and state representative of the Jewish Labor Committee, proved in a recent survey that union members really do care and are willing to act.

When the fate of anti-poverty legislation and the budget of the Office of Economic Opportunity was being determined by Congress recently, Bernstein wrote the 111 unionists participating in the OEO Trade Union Training Program for New England. He stressed the need for continuing the OEO and suggested that the trainees contact their congressmen and urge them to support the anti-poverty bill.

In a follow-up on his memo, Bernstein learned that at least 59 of the 111 trainees took some action. "This," he said, "is the highest participation I have ever heard of in a situation such as this."

All 59 trainees wrote to at least one senator or representative. Thirty-one local unions took similar action, as well as 25 central labor bodies.

Some trainees arranged for other local unions to write to their representatives, while three got their own international union regional council to take action. Two central labor bodies urged action on the part of all affiliated locals.

Letters Helped

Two trainees wrote letters to newspapers and a few had friends contact their congressmen. Some succeeded in getting town and county officials to support the legislation, while others urged their state legislators to appeal to Congress.

Among other organizations that some of the trainees approached for support in the effort were the NAACP, the Urban League, Senior Citizens groups, CORE, local welfare departments, religious and political groups.

In one area, the trainees helped the local Community Action program collect more than 5,000 signatures supporting the anti-poverty legislation. Some 2,300 letters were written as a result of action taken by another CAP with the cooperation of still other trainees.

"The 'spirit of concern' was even more obvious in some of the letters the trainees have written to me," stated Bernstein in summarizing his survey. Among the comments:

"I just pray to God that the rest of the states and counties will do the same as we are doing in trying to help the poor."

"If I can be of further help let me know."

"Many thanks for making it possible for me to make my opinions known."

Job Training Demonstrated In IUOE Movie

The skills of members of the Operating Engineers have kept pace with the increased complexity of the construction machinery they handle—and a new 23-minute color movie shows how it has been done.

The film, released by the IUOE's national training program, stresses particularly how the union is working today to prepare disadvantaged youngsters for good-paying construction jobs and expand the skills of present members.

It looks at the 340,000-member union—and traces through a turn-of-the-century flashback and historic still pictures the conditions which the union had to overcome.

Two federal programs in which the union is actively participating are dealt with in detail—retraining conducted by local unions under the Manpower Development & Training Act and the special training program conducted for Job Corps youngsters, leading to employment in the construction industry.

The picture was filmed in Tennessee, New York, Connecticut and Washington, D.C. It was produced in cooperation with the U.S. Forest Service and the Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training under a grant from the Labor Dept. and the Office of Economic Opportunity.

Background music is supplied by the U.S. Navy Band's Sea Chanters and Tommy Makem and the Tarriers.

'Taxpayer' Suits Threat To Federal Aid Concept

held, it "would probably destroy the entire program of federal aid," the AFL-CIO stressed.

Its brief noted that congressional testimony indicated that numerous other federal programs, including housing and health projects, involve nonprofit, private organizations related to religious groups.

Furthermore, the federation said, it is hard to see how the courts could permit taxpayer suits charging violation of the First Amendment without also permitting indiscriminate challenges based on other sections of the constitution.

The brief cited the long history of Supreme Court reluctance to interfere with the powers of the legislative and judicial branches, dating back to 1793 when the court told George Washington that it could not render advisory opinions to the chief executive.

"To permit taxpayers' suits," the brief cautioned, "would mean that every action of the legislative and executive branches of the government would be subject to judicial review. It would involve a greater intrusion of the judiciary into the other branches of government than the advisory role rejected by the Supreme Court in Washington's day; for the courts would render opinions not merely at the behest of the President but of any taxpayer."

Included with the brief was the text of the AFL-CIO convention resolution opposing a Senate-passed bill permitting any citizen to challenge, under the First Amendment, nine major education, health and anti-poverty programs.

The convention termed the legislation, now pending in the House, "a back-door attack" on these programs. It acknowledged that there are "sincere supporters" of such legislation but expressed the view that "their sincerity is being exploited by others with baser motives.'

Hazardous Farm Jobs Banned for Youths

A new Labor Dept. ban on hazardous work by hired farm workers under the age of 16 went into effect Jan. 1. Among the prohibited jobs are driving buses or large tractors, operating power saws and working on high ladders.

Youngsters under 16 make up one-fourth of the total farm labor force — and the Labor Dept. said increased mechanization and use of chemicals has made farm work among the most hazardous occupations.

Medicine Costs Go Up Sharply As Age Rises

Americans over 65 spent about five times more for prescribed medicines in a 12-month period than did younger persons in the 15-24 age bracket, the government reported.

In a study conducted by the Public Health Service the cost for medicines for the 65 - and - over group showed up as $41.40, compared to $8.10 for the younger group. The largest part of the cost for older persons went for medicines for treatment for high blood pressure and heart conditions.

Wilbur J. Cohen, under secretary of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, said the study for the year ended June 1965 showed that women over 65 spent more than men in the same age group—$46.70 compared to $34.70.

For non - prescribed medicines, largest amounts spent were for aspirin and its compounds and vitamins.

Welfare Study Aims For Fresh Approach

said they "penalize the poorest of the poor for their poverty."

Among the provisions strongly opposed by labor, religious and social service groups are a tight ceiling on the number of children who can be helped under the program of aid to families with dependent children and a free hand to states to purge from the assistance rolls mothers who are unable to work or take work training.

Meany urged the President to press in the new session of Congress for "swift and decisive action to remedy the evils that have been done to the principle and practice of public assistance."

He also termed the benefit increase—13 percent for most persons—"flagrantly inadequate" and said the rise in the minimum benefit from $44 to $55 a month was in "shocking contrast" to the $70 minimum sought by the Administration.

Johnson named Ben W. Heineman, board chairman of the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad, to head the Commission on Income Maintenance.

He appointed two AFL-CIO vice presidents to the commission — David Sullivan, president of the Building Service Employes and A. Philip Randolph, president of the Sleeping Car Porters and a noted civil rights leader.

Johnson completed the signing of bills passed in the final days of the session and noted that Congress "was not as productive as I had urged it to be" but at any rate had not turned the clock back by repealing Great Society programs.

The new social security benefits are effective in February and will be reflected in benefit checks mailed out in early March.

Following are key provisions:

BENEFITS: An across-the-board increase of 13 percent to all beneficiaries under the old age, survivors and disability insurance program. The minimum benefit under these programs is raised to $55 for an individual and $82.50 for an elderly couple. Persons retiring in the future will also receive higher benefits, with the ceiling rising gradually to $323 for a retired couple and a survivor's benefit of up to $434.40 for a widow with two or more dependent children.

The special benefit paid to persons 72 and over who had not met social security work requirements goes up from $35 to $40 for a single person and from $52.50 to $60 a month for a couple. Graduated cash benefits are provided for disabled widows and widowers between 50 and 62 years of age.

TAXES: The tax rate for 1968 remains 4.4 percent of covered wages paid by workers and employers. For persons making under $6,600 a year, there will be no change in payroll deductions. The taxable wage base is increased to $7,800 a year, effective immediately, so persons making that amount or more will be paying $53 a year more in social security taxes than they did in 1967.

The taxable wage base will remain at $7,800 but the tax rate will gradually rise in future years—at close to the same rate it was scheduled to rise under the old law. In 1969, the tax rate goes up to 4.8 percent—but under the old law it had been scheduled to go up to 4.9 percent. The rate includes both the basic social security and the medicare taxes.

EARNINGS: The amount that a retired worker or survivor may earn without losing part of his old age benefits is raised to $140 a month or $1,680 a year — up from the previous $1,500 a year or $125 a month. As at present, there is no earnings limit for persons over 72. For others, the bill provides a $1 reduction in benefits for each $2 of earnings between $1.680 and $2,880 and $1 for each $1 of earnings over that.

MEDICARE: A patient whose doctor refuses to bill the medicare program directly can now be reimbursed on the basis of an itemized bill from the doctor without having to pay the bill first. Another new feature gives each person a "lifetime reserve" of 60 days of added hospital coverage to be used whenever the 90-day hospitalization allowed for each "spell of illness" is exhausted. However the patient would pay $20 a day for each day of the "reserve" coverage.

MEDICAID: Limits are imposed on federal grants to states which have set up programs to provide free medical care for the "medically needy," regardless of age. The effect will be to force some states with liberal programs such as New York to set stricter income limitations on families who can be helped.

3 Named Advisers On Employment

Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz has announced appointment of three new labor members to the 26-member Federal Advisory Council on Employment Security, which makes recommendations to him for resolving employment and unemployment problems.

The new labor members on the tripartite council are: AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman, Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Pres. Max Greenberg and Plasterers & Cement Masons Pres. Edward J. Leonard.

Okun to Head LBJ Advisers On Economy

Arthur M. Okun, a member of the President's Council of Economic Advisers for the past three years, has been named chairman to succeed Gardner Ackley who has been appointed U.S. ambassador to Italy.

Okun has been primarily responsible for the council's review and projections of business conditions and economic forecasts and is an expert on international monetary matters.

He will be the seventh chairman of the council set up by the Employment Act of 1946 to analyze economic developments, and recommend policies to promote "maximum employment, production and purchasing power."

The President also appointed Dr. Merton J. Peck, chairman of the Yale department of economics, to the council to fill the vacancy left by Gardner when he is confirmed for the ambassadorial post. Peck is known as a specialist in the economics of transportation, technological change and defense.

The third member of the council is James Duesenberry.

As chairman Okun will direct a council staff of 45, including 16 economists, who help the President prepare his annual economic message as well as the council's economic report.

Okun, 39, was director of graduate studies in economics at Yale University before joining the council as a staff economist in 1961. He was appointed to the council in November 1964.

4 U.S. Unions To Help Train Latin Seamen

Lima, Peru—Four U.S. maritime unions will cooperate with the regional office of the Intl. Transport Workers' Federation here in a pioneering program to train and upgrade Latin American seamen and licensed officers.

AFL-CIO Inter-American Rep. Andrew C. McLellan helped develop the program which involves training facilities of the National Maritime Union, Seafarers, Marine Engineers Beneficial Association and the Masters, Mates & Pilots.

In announcing the new program, the ITF expressed the hope that it will lead to establishment of "a maritime training school in every Latin American country engaged in maritime activities."

Students selected will have some experience with teaching methods, the ITF said, and will be expected to pass on their new skills to other workers when they return to their countries.

As a first step, six seamen from various countries will be selected by the ITF for from 5 to 12 weeks of training at the Maritime Union's modern school for unlicensed seamen in New York City. In addition, the Brotherhood of Marine Officers, an NMU affiliate, has agreed to finance the training of an additional six Latin Americans at the officers' level.

Details of similar programs are being worked out with the other cooperating sea unions.

The basic courses will cover the training needed for upgrading from ordinary to able bodied seamen as well as specialized training in marine skills.

A by-product of the program is expected to be development of training manuals in Spanish to further extend the reach of the program.

1968 Contract Talks Will Affect 4 Million

Contracts covering 4 million workers will expire or be reopened in 1968, many in key industries, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Another 4.6 million workers will get wage increases this year under agreements negotiated in 1967 and before, the bureau said.

Due to expire in the year ahead are contracts between unions and managements in basic steel, aluminum and metal fabricating, aerospace, men's apparel, construction, and the Atlantic and Gulf Coast docks.

Nearly 500,000 telephone workers will be affected by agreements to be reopened in 1968, the report noted.

BLS said that bargaining in aerospace and basic steel will dominate negotiations in manufacturing industries, and that significant negotiations also are scheduled for union members in shipbuilding, leather and leather products, and the glass industry.

More workers are eligible for cost-of-living escalator adjustments in 1968 than in any year since 1962, but agreements for most of the workers involved have set limits on the size of the adjustment due, BLS reported.

About 2.8 million employes are covered by contracts expiring this year, and nearly 650,000 more will have to wait until 1969 or later for contract reopening.

Open-end contracts involving 550,000 railroad workers and coal miners can be reopened in 1968. Rail shopcraft unions already have served notice of wage increase requests on behalf of 275,000 craftsmen.

BLS said that contracts which expired in 1967 were still being renegotiated late in the year for 400,000 covered workers. An unknown number of them will receive deferred increases some time during the year. About 1.4 million other workers are covered by agreements not subject to negotiation in 1968.

The bureau gave this timetable of selected contracts due to expire this year:

Glass Bottle Blowers and three groups of firms employing 39,000 workers, January through March.

Steelworkers and two can companies, 28,300, January.

Auto Workers and Machinists for 192,700 members covered by eight major aerospace pacts, April-November.

Clothing Workers and Clothing Manufacturers Association, 100,000, May.

UAW, USWA and Aluminum Workers with Aluminum Co. of America for 31,000, May.

USWA and 332,400 employes of 10 major steel firms, July.

Martin Gets BAT Post On Equal Opportunity

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz has named Willis J. Martin special assistant for equal opportunity to the administrator of the Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training.

rate investment, the President said his order would cut the payments deficit by $1 billion below the 1967 level. This includes a moratorium on all new direct investment outflows to continental western Europe except Greece and limits on investment in other developed countries at a level of 65 percent of a company's average investment in 1965-66. This includes countries such as Canada, Britain and Australia. In less developed nations the limitation is to 110 percent of the 1965-66 average.

The President noted that the travel abroad component in the payments deficit exceeded $2 billion in 1967 and that to reduce this by $500 million "I am asking the American people to defer for the next two years all non-essential travel outside the Western Hemisphere." He said he would seek appropriate legislation in this area.

Meany Bids Congress Act To Cut 'Shocking' Backlog

Year in Review:

Job Gains Slowed To Standstill in '67

By Duane Emme

The nation's unemployment picture in 1967 was "virtually unchanged" in comparison with 1966. Total employment increased during the year, but not by as much as it did in any of the three previous years.

Those facts highlighted a "year in review" summary released by the Labor Dept. along with the December employment report that showed a two-tenths of 1 percent decline in the jobless rate to 3.7 percent, its lowest mark since last March.

Unemployment in December was 2.7 million, the report showed. After seasonal adjustment, the total was 100,000 below the November level and 450,000 below October.

Nonfarm payroll employment rose 200,000 above seasonal expectations to 67.1 million in December, with significant increases in construction, manufacturing and state and local government.

The year-end review said that unemployment averaged 2.9 million in 1967. The figure actually was about 100,000 above the 1966 average. But due to a large increase in the labor force, the average jobless rate—3.8 percent—was unchanged from the previous year.

The unemployment rate moved up gradually during most of 1967 from 3.7 percent in the first three months to 4.3 percent in October. But a sharp drop in November and the continued decline in December brought the rate back to its 1966 average.

Although the review did not deal with unemployment trends as to age, sex, marital status or race, Assistant Commissioner Harold Gold-

GM Strike Aid Plan Exposed

The Auto Workers' charge last fall that General Motors was masterminding "an industrywide conspiracy" aimed at denying the union its collective bargaining goals was reinforced this week by a story in the University of Michigan student newspaper.

The Michigan Daily story, written by editor Roger Rapoport, revealed that GM had drawn up a mutual aid pact calling on auto companies not struck by the UAW to provide financial assistance to the firm chosen by the union as its target company.

"That confirms what we charged Oct. 31," a UAW spokesman said. "We said Chrysler Corp. refused a proposal we made because it was 'locked into' a conspiracy with GM. We knew precisely what we were talking about." GM denied the charge at the time.

The pact, according to the Daily, was drafted as a high-priority item that received top-

Governor Urged to Spur Talks:

Copper Industry Hit On Bargaining Stall

Arizona Gov. Jack Williams was urged by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to use the power of his office to help settle the copper strike by getting industry leaders to "genuinely engage in good faith collective bargaining" or to accept a proposal for fact-finding.

The problem is to end the strike of 60,000 workers "fairly and quickly," Meany said in a letter to Williams. He observed, in answer to a previous message from the governor, that "unfortunately . . . there are important aspects of the copper controversy about which you are not informed." He added that "a few words about them might be helpful if you wish to effectively utilize your high office to help achieve a rapid and just settlement."

Tells Labor Speak Up On Issues

By David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called on the second session of the 90th Congress to act this year on a "shocking" backlog of unfinished business and unmet national needs.

He appealed to union members and their families to make their voices heard on Capitol Hill "stronger than ever" so that Congress will "do better" in this election year session than it did last year.

Voices Needed

"What the 90th Congress does in its second session will be determined, not by lobbyists or by official spokesmen," Meany said, "but by constituents who make their voices heard."

He warned that a program of jobs for the hard core unemployed, "so urgent in this time of urban crisis, can no longer be delayed."

Of equal urgency, he said, "is the need for a massive housing program for low and middle income citizens."

He asked further steps "now" to assure equal rights and equal opportunity—including open housing.

"Long overdue," Meany said, is congressional action on bills to give collective bargaining rights to farm workers and restore picketing rights to construction workers.

Improvements Urged

The pending higher education and vocational education bills must be "strengthened, not weakened," he declared.

"Above all," he said, "the people of America must insure that their legislators support their President and their armed services in Viet Nam and that our defense of freedom in Viet Nam is not used as a false excuse for halting progress at home."

Meany's comments were made in the preface to a new edition of the pamphlet, Labor Looks at Congress, a detailed review of the first session by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation to be published soon.

There was some "limited progress" in the first session, Meany noted, such as passage of a strong meat inspection bill. But "the price enacted by the conservative coalition for the survival of social progress was a drastic cut in the money

Job Bias Article Branded 'Dishonest'

An article in Fortune magazine charging that the great majority of AFL-CIO unions are waging a battle to maintain "white supremacy" in employment was denounced by the federation this week as a "dishonest, distorted attack" deliberately designed to divide the labor movement and the Negroes.

The article appeared in the January issue along with a dozen other pieces devoted to the urban crisis. A discussion of the role of business in Negro employment was called "A New Business for Business: Reclaiming Human Resources." The one on labor was headed "The Case Against the Unions."

The same emphasis was made in full-page advertisements placed by Fortune in major newspapers. The ads picked up the article's charges against unions, which were even wilder out of context.

Fortune sent the piece on unions to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and invited comments for publication in the February issue. Meany directed Donald Slaiman, head of the federation Dept. of Civil Rights, to write a response.

"To answer in detail the distortions, misrepresentations and downright misstatements of fact" in the article, signed by Thomas O'Hanlon, "would require as many words as he used in making them," Slaiman wrote. "I will note only a few examples as typical of the whole."

Slaiman began by exposing as fraudulent O'Hanlon's "glittering statistics on how many Negroes would be employed in the building trades if they were represented in proportion to population."

The figures were taken from a volume, "Employment, Race and Poverty," edited by Arthur Ross and Herbert Hill, covering the period 1959-64, Slaiman noted. He pointed out that O'Hanlon did not even read the figures correctly, and continued:

"Mr. O'Hanlon does even worse violence to the general thrust of the report he cites. He, and Fortune's newspaper advertisements, have conjured up a contrast between a supposed 'breakthrough' by Negroes in professional and technical occupations and a supposed stalemate, or worse, in the construction trades. The report itself, covering the years 1959-64, shows nothing of the sort. On the contrary, it asserts that:

"'Negroes made appreciable gains in skilled manual trades both in construction and in manufacturing. The number of Negro carpenters rose from 27,000 to 43,000, with

Hospital Hit on Move to Avoid NLRB Election

Oroville, Calif. — The Building Service Employes accused an Oroville hospital of "subterfuge" in trying to get out from under a recent National Labor Relations Board decision in November that asserted jurisdiction over private hospitals and nursing homes.

The union said the Medical Center Hospital there, operated by Butte Medical Properties, a group of doctors, has filed papers with the State of California to change its status from a private to a non-profit institution.

Ironically, the petition of BSEIU Local 22 of Sacramento for an election among nonprofessional employes at the Medical Center was the "test case" on which NLRB based its decision.

The board announced that it was assuming jurisdiction over private hospitals' grossing $250,000 or more annually and granted the petition. At the same time, it asserted jurisdiction over private nursing homes grossing $100,000 or more.

With the hospital's move to change its status, the NLRB held up issuing an order for an election at the Medical Center.

BSEIU and Local 22 both vowed to fight the move. A union spokesman said, "What the doctors are doing is merely shifting earnings, in the form of dividends and profits, into salaries for themselves. It's subterfuge."

BSEIU Pres. David Sullivan stressed that the NLRB decision was aimed at giving unions a greater chance to represent hospital and nursing home employes "who have been among the most underpaid and discriminated against workers in the nation."

He also pointed out that BSEIU already represents workers at hundreds of private, public and nonprofit hospitals and nursing and convalescent homes throughout the country.

Chicago, Gary Contracts Avert Teacher Walkouts

Chicago—Pay raises of $1,000 a year were won by Teachers Local 1 here for 23,204 school employes in a contract settlement that headed off a scheduled walkout.

The nearby Gary, Ind., Teachers Local 4 won its first contract in 30 years by announcing its intention to put a "no contract, no work" policy into effect for 2,100 school employes. The School Board agreed before the deadline, as in Chicago.

Elsewhere on the union teacher front, two leaders of a 1967 teachers' strike in Woodbridge, N. J., reported to the Middlesex County jail to begin serving contempt sentences, and Pres. Albert Shanker of Teachers Local 2, New York City, completed a 15-day sentence for refusing to end a strike of 49,000 teachers last September.

The AFT asked New Jersey Gov. Richard J. Hughes for clemency for National Rep. Joseph Cascella and Field Rep. Charles Richards of the New Jersey Federation of Teachers. Cascella must serve 90 days and Richards 30 days unless Hughes commutes their sentences, imposed after Woodbridge teachers refused to end their strike last January.

Chicago and Gary teachers were ready for a walkout when their contract disputes were settled.

2-Step Raise

The Chicago pact was negotiated during a six-hour session in the office of Mayor Richard J. Daley. It provides that teachers will get a $40 monthly raise now, plus $60 more in September.

They will be paid for spring vacation in addition to Christmas week. Chicago teachers won Christmas vacation pay for the first time last year in a settlement also reached with Daley's aid.

Yearly salary for a beginning teacher will rise from $6,150 to $6,970, with a $7,335 top in the next school year.

The union gained ground in educational reforms also. Six hundred more teacher aides will be hired to work in elementary schools. Teachers will be paid during special training for work in inner city schools. Elementary teachers will be given two preparation periods each week, and the School Board will sponsor a program for removing socially maladjusted children from regular classes. Class size will be reduced as funds permit.

The agreement also calls for joint study on certification of full-time-basis substitute teachers. The union and the Chicago labor movement agreed to support a request to the state legislature for further help if a proposed tax increase fails to provide full funding.

Gary Hike

In Gary, the School Board agreed to a 7 percent salary hike to give bachelor degree-holders a salary range of 6,500 to $10,300, with a top of $11,547 a year for those with a master's degree.

The new pact also guarantees teacher rights in assignments and transfers, assures support for teachers and legal assistance if needed in discipline cases, puts a limit on class sizes and the number of faculty meetings, and provides additional planning time for elementary teachers.

Seniority Shifts Ordered To Overcome Past Bias

Richmond, Va.—A federal district judge has ordered the Philip Morris Co. and Local 203 of the Tobacco Workers to modify their seniority agreement to provide greater job transfer rights for Negro employes.

Judge John D. Butzner, Jr., noted in his decision that previous patterns of racially segregated jobs have been largely abolished in recent years and hiring and promotion in all departments is done without regard to race.

However, he held that the departmental seniority system used at Philip Morris puts Negro workers at a disadvantage in transferring to higher-paying jobs in other departments which had been closed to them when they first went to work for the company.

There were two methods of interdepartmental transfers, the judge noted, one permitting a limited number of workers to carry their seniority with them and the other requiring transferees to start at the bottom of the departmental seniority list.

He noted also that there was no normal route of job progression to higher paying jobs.

To overcome what he said was the impact of past discriminatory practices, Butzner ordered that qualified employes in the lower-paying prefabrication department should be given preference for vacancies which arise in the higher-paying departments—with seniority in their new jobs dating from their company employment.

Butzner agreed in his decision that the legislative history of the Civil Rights Act is clear that Congress did not intend to upset the basic seniority principle of "last hired, first fired."

But he indicated that details of a departmental seniority system could be modified if necessary to assure equality of employment opportunity.

Credit Union Membership Up in Year

Membership in the nation's federal and state-chartered credit unions totaled 19 million persons as of Dec. 31, 1967, an increase of 1,365,000 over the year, the Health, Education & Welfare Dept. said.

Its Bureau of Federal Credit Unions also estimated that total resources of all credit unions, numbering about 23,000, were $12.8 billion at the year's end, up by $1.2 billion from Dec. 31, 1966.

Loans made by all credit unions increased nine percent to about 10 billion during the year, while members savings increased 11 percent to $11 billion.

The bureau, which administers federal credit unions, set their total at 12,250 as of Dec. 31, 1967 and estimated that there were 10,750 state-chartered credit unions in operation at that date.

Year in Review:

stein of the Bureau of Labor Statistics cited one discouraging aspect of 1967:

The rate of non-white unemployment — of which Negroes make up 92 percent of the total —was never less than double the white jobless rate, even though the percentage figures fluctuated month-by-month in each category.

Total employment in 1967 averaged 74.4 million, 1.5 million above 1966. This advance was 300,000 less than the rise between 1965 and 1966. It also was the smallest growth for a single year since 1963.

Nonfarm payroll employment, averaging 66.1 million, was up 2.1 million from the 1966 average. The increase was 1.1 million less than in 1966 and 400,000 less than in 1965 but otherwise larger than in any single year since 1951.

Almost all of the 1967 rise, the report showed, was in the service-producing sectors of the economy —with government employment up 750,000 and trade and miscellaneous services both increasing by 500,000.

Manufacturing Jobs

Manufacturing employment averaged 19.3 million last year, an increase of only 150,000, compared to a 1.1 million jump between 1965 and 1966. Durable goods manufacturing employment rose by only 75,000 compared to 850,000 the year before.

Hourly earnings for workers on nonfarm payrolls averaged $2.67—up 12 cents over the 1966 average. But real hourly earnings (allowing for increased living costs) rose only 4 cents, the Labor Dept. said.

The workweek for manufacturing production workers averaged 40.6 hours in 1967, below the averages for 1966 (41.3 hours) and 1965 (41.2 hours) but about on par with the averages in most other years since World War II.

The department said that a reduction in manufacturing overtime —from an average of 3.9 hours in 1966 to 3.4 in 1967—accounted for most of the drop in weekly hours.

The civilian labor force averaged 77.3 million over the year, 1.6 million higher than the 1966 average. The increase was 260,000 more than it was between 1965 and 1966.

All of this over-the-year increase, the report revealed, took place among adults—about 600,000 men and 1 million women—while the teenage labor force remained at its year-earlier level.

But the department also pointed out that almost one-third of the jump in the civilian labor force—approximately 500,000—occurred among young adults, in the 20-24 age group.

Wide Range

As for the December job picture, the department said the decline in unemployment "was widespread."

The jobless rate for adult men was 2.2 percent, down from 2.4 percent. The rate for adult women was 4.1 percent, about the same as in November. The teenage rate was 12.8 percent compared to 14 percent in the previous month.

The unemployment rates for both white and nonwhite workers continued declines that began in November. The nonwhite rate of 6.9 percent was still more than double the white rate, 3.3 percent.

Total unemployment, at 75.3 million, was 100,000 above November levels, although a decline is normal between November and December.

The department said farm employment which usually drops by more than 500,000 in December, decreased by only 200,000 because workers were still harvesting due to earlier delays from unseasonally wet weather.

The main increases in nonfarm jobs, seasonally adjusted, were about 50,000 in each of three categories—construction, manufacturing and government. The December job totals in each category were: Construction, 3.3 million; manufacturing 19.4 million, and government, 11.8 million.

Roy Reuther Dies, Led UAW Political Action

Detroit—Roy L. Reuther, national director of the Auto Workers citizenship-legislative department and administrative assistant to UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther, died at Metropolitan Hospital here at 58 after a brief illness. He collapsed at home, where he was recuperating after hospitalization for a heart ailment.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany sent a message of condolence to his widow and two sons, and said in a similar message to Walter Reuther that his brother Roy was "not only a valued colleague and a fine trade unionist, he was a warm and understanding friend."

Inspired Others

Meany added: "Roy had special qualities as a man that outweighed even his great abilities. His cheerful optimism was contagious; he inspired as well as administered."

Meany said he had asked COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan to represent the AFL-CIO and COPE at the funeral. Barkan and Roy Reuther had worked together on many political education campaigns, notably those of 1960 through 1964.

In 1962 and 1964, Reuther took leave of his position to become national director of the AFL-CIO's voter registration and get-out-the-vote campaign. In 1960 he had taken similar leave to become deputy director of the National Voters' Registration Committee, a part of the John F. Kennedy for President campaign organization.

Born in Wheeling, W. Va., in 1909, Reuther got a job in the electrical trade and joined his first union in 1927—the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. He moved to Detroit in 1932, attended Wayne State University, later taught at Brookwood Labor College and was city supervisor of workers' education in Flint, Mich.

He was hired in 1936 at the Chevrolet gear and axle plant in Detroit. When the UAW began organizing General Motors plants in Flint, he became assistant organizing director for the union and played a leading role in the drive that ended in GM recognizing the UAW as bargaining agent in 1937.

He served as first president of the Greater Flint CIO Council, now the AFL-CIO Council; worked for the War Production Board in Washington and Los Angeles, and served in World War II with the Army Engineers. He returned to the UAW in 1946 and was appointed to his final post in 1949.

on the picket lines in 23 states since July 15. They reduced their original proposals and agreed to lay their case before a fact-finding commission but three of the four industry leaders have refused to change the one offer they made in June or to accept fact-finding.

Meany told Williams "it is my judgment that you particularly are in a strategic position to effectively help bring this unfortunate strike to an end." He urged the governor to help get copper management to bargain in good faith or "if this does not avail, you might urge them in good conscience to plead their case, as the unions would plead theirs" in fact-finding.

"Then let the pitiless glare of national publicity reveal to the entire nation where justice in this controversy truly lies," Meany suggested.

Two Meetings

Federal mediators have succeeded in getting two of the 11 struck copper, zinc and lead firms to meet with the unions in recent months. Talks with Kennecott Copper Corp. Dec. 28 at Salt Lake City broke off when management held to its single offer of a 35-cent wage increase over a three-year period and refused to consider a company-wide settlement of other issues.

A union committee met Dec. 28 and 29 with Phelps Dodge Corp. at Douglas, Ariz., and again Jan. 8. No recent meetings have been held with the Anaconda Co. and American Smelting & Refining Co., other members of the Big Four, or with seven smaller producers—American Metal Climax, Inc., Cerro Corp., Hecla Mining Co., Inspiration Consolidated Copper Co., Magma Copper Co., Miami Copper Co. and White Pine Copper Co.

Other developments:

- The strike support fund to which other unions have contributed in response to an appeal by Meany passed the $700,000 mark.
- The Steelworkers notified the chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission that they are "most vehemently" opposed to AEC's proposed cooperation with Kennecott in a $13 million project. The program, known as SLOOP, seeks to develop a system of mining copper ore by using nuclear explosive power. The government, USWA declared, must "demand that beneficiaries of its actions recognize standards of conduct in their relations with others."

Unions Oppose T-H

- Two Republican legislators—Sen. Wallace Bennett, Utah, and Rep. Glenn R. Davis, Wisconsin, called on Pres. Johnson to invoke a Taft-Hartley injunction to end the strike. The striking unions said an injunction would break the strike for 90 days but would "settle nothing" unless industry leaders agree to bargain collectively.

Meany's message to Williams responded to a letter from the governor asking "why copper miners in Arizona have to wait on the steelworkers of Pennsylvania to decide when work will be resumed."

Meany wrote that he supports "an honorable settlement of this dispute—not surrender by the workers" and that union proposals are "modest compared with settlements reached in recent months in far less profitable industries."

"What is more," he said, "it is not the unions that have sought" the strike. They voluntarily extended their old contracts beyond the expiration dates in a sincere effort to avoid it but "unfortunately the companies refused six months ago to bargain in good faith and they have not been willing to engage in meaningful bargaining even to this day."

The restoration of local bargaining which Williams urged is "precisely the kind of bargaining which has caused copper wages to lag so far behind," Meany said. He called it "a dirty game which the companies have played to their great advantage with a loaded deck" for many years.

The managers of the copper industry "shout that the 26 unions . . . joined together to seek some measure of bargaining equity" are "trying to impose industry-wide bargaining." Meany declared "this just is not the truth."

"Your letter states that because the Steelworkers' national headquarters happens to be in Pennsylvania, this makes it an alien institution that is unconcerned about Arizona. Quite the contrary, the overwhelming majority of the copper workers of Arizona themselves democratically decided to affiliate" with USWA and thereafter, by a vote of 95.2 percent, "they freely decided to engage themselves in this strike."

'Outside' Companies

Meany noted that company headquarters are located "in many places, even overseas;" that they sell their products anywhere and distribute their "ample profits" to stockholders everywhere. "I assume that these facts," Meany wrote, "have not caused you to call these companies un-American or un-Arizonian."

"As I have stated, the problem now is to end this strike fairly and quickly. In my judgment, this can be accomplished by a decision by the copper companies to begin to bargain in good faith," the AFL-CIO president concluded.

The striking unions besides the USWA are the Auto Workers, Boilermakers, Bricklayers, Carpenters, Chemical Workers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Iron Workers, Laborers, Locomotive Engineers, Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, Machinists, Molders, Office & Professional Employes, Office Employes Independent Union, Operating Engineers, Painters, Pattern Makers, Plumbers, Railroad Trainmen, Railway Carmen, Railway Conductors, Sheet Metal Workers, Switchmen and Teamsters.

L.A. Hearst Walkout Spreads As Chain Imports Strikebreakers

Los Angeles—A bitter strike-lockout at the Hearst-owned Los Angeles Herald-Examiner, the nation's largest afternoon daily, passed its 25th day with eight AFL-CIO unions pitted against a vast strikebreaking maneuver by the billion-dollar Hearst publishing chain.

The struggle intensified as the Herald-Examiner continued to publish with the aid of imported professional strikebreakers and Los Angeles pickets took their case to fellow employes in San Francisco, shutting down that city's two major dailies, the Hearst-owned Examiner and the independent Chronicle.

Mediation, which had failed twice since Newspaper Guild and Machinists union members left their Los Angeles jobs Dec. 15, broke down again Jan. 8 when Hearst management pressed demands to extend super-seniority to strikebreakers over striking and locked-out employes.

More than 2,000 Herald-Examiner employes were idled by the dispute, which centered on wages, automation and manning issues.

Boycott Started

Besides threatening to spread the fight nationwide in the Hearst chain, unions launched a consumer "don't buy" program aimed at 14 Hearst magazines and seven newspapers in Boston, Baltimore, Seattle, Albany, and San Antonio.

Typographical Union officials, whose Los Angeles Local 174 was locked out at the Herald-Examiner the first day of the strike, documented the presence of nearly 50 strikebreakers inside the plant from a nationally-known ITU "rat file."

Scores of other strikebreakers were being imported from northern California, Florida, Hawaii, Texas and other points, according to ITU leaders.

California AFL-CIO Executive Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts charged that Herald-Examiner importation of strikebreakers to take the jobs of its employes posed "a major threat to the trade union movement."

Pitts said the move "appears to be part of a deliberate attempt to end free collective bargaining at the newspaper. Use of professional strikebreakers in this instance again points out the need for legislation to end this dastardly practice in California."

The dispute erupted after 1,100 Guildsmen and 15 Machinists were unable to reach contract agreement with Hearst. Guild members had worked a month without contract.

Printers were without a contract for 11 months and ITU Mailers Local 9 and Web Pressmen Local 18 also had failed to reach agreement for up to nine months.

Other Victims

Other unions locked out were Paper Handlers Local 3 and Stereotypers Local 58.

Members of Building Service Employes Local 399 and Teamsters General Warehouse Local 598 refused to cross picket lines around the two-block downtown Hearst property and also were idled.

National attention focused on the dispute as pickets fanned out to the Los Angeles waterfront, to big commercial centers like Sears, Roebuck and other department stores—whose ads continued to appear in the struck Herald-Examiner—and were poised to hit Hearst newspapers around the country.

Nearly 1,000 tons of newsprint were tied up at the waterfront, when Teamster drivers refused to haul it.

The Hearst network of magazines slated for the "unfair" list included Cosmopolitan, Good Housekeeping and Popular Mechanics.

A wide segment of AFL-CIO labor rose promptly to the support of the embattled newspaper unions as the strikebreaking issue became clear.

While Herald-Examiner publication continued, the dispute nevertheless took its toll of the paper's production and profit.

Careful estimates indicated the paper, "flagship" of the Hearst chain, was down two-thirds in circulation and about the same in ad revenue. Normal daily circulation is 726,000.

Bigger Consumer Role Sought in Health Panel

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has urged greater consumer representation on the government's advisory panel for the medicare program.

The new social security amendments expand the membership of the Health Insurance Benefits Advisory Committee from 16 to 19, and additional vacancies are expected in the near future.

It is labor's "strong conviction" that the new appointments should strengthen consumer representation, Meany said in a letter to Health, Education & Welfare Sec. John W. Gardner.

Meany noted that only a few members of the present advisory group "can be regarded as in any way representing the consumer interest in the medicare program."

He said the scheduled one-third increase in the premiums for Part B of medicare—the voluntary medical insurance—has been brought about largely by "failure to regulate escalating physcians fees" which "demonstrates that too little consideration is currently being given to the needs and financial problems faced by the elderly, the consumers of medicare services for whom the program was presumably established."

Meany asked Gardner to strengthen the advisory group's consumer orientation "by appointing representatives of trade unions, senior citizens organizations and other bona fide consumer representatives."

Timber Export Blamed for Loss of Jobs

Sales of timber from government forests in the Northwest to Japan are forcing U.S. sawmills out of business and inflating prices, union and employer spokesmen charged.

Carpenters Treas. Peter Terzick called for a moratorium on the lumber exports, which he said have brought about a shortage that has forced 27 U.S. mills to close down, throwing more than 4,000 workers out of jobs.

An industry spokesman at the joint news conference said the price of raw timber in the area has been bid up to double its level of a few years ago.

Both Terzick and Mortimer B. Doyle, executive vice president of the National Forest Products Association, said they considered the sale of some 600 million board feet of timber from U.S. lands a violation of the National Forest Acts, which allows exports only of surplus timber.

They said government officials appeared reluctant to cut the imports because the $400 million in annual export sales helped ease the balance of payments problem.

A possible solution, the union and industry spokesmen suggested, is to restrict exports to finished logs.

Congressmen and senators from Oregon and Washington have expressed concern over the problem, Terzick said, and Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) has scheduled hearings, starting Jan. 16, of his Small Business subcommittee.

The Stakes In Congress

THE SECOND SESSION of the 90th Congress shapes up as a new round in the battle by liberal-progressive forces to stave off the continuing attack by the Dixiecrat-GOP coalition to roll back the gains of earlier years.

The success of the coalition was the key factor in the first session and its victory in the House on 37 of 51 rollcalls does not indicate a slackening of its efforts in the second session.

The fight must be pressed, however, mobilizing all possible resources, for the stakes are too high to allow the conservative coalition to have its way by default.

The record of the 90th Congress will be a key factor in the 1968 elections. That record must be established as clearly and firmly as possible so that the voters in November are aware of those who voted to push forward to meet the domestic and foreign problems of our times.

The Job Standstill

IN TERMS OF JOBS the economy marked time in 1967. There was no progress in terms of reducing unemployment, and total employment gains were the smallest since 1963.

The Labor Dept.'s year-end review of the employment situation discloses that the actual number of unemployed was up slightly from a year earlier and that the rate at 3.8 percent of the labor force was unchanged from 1966.

Non-farm payroll employment showed a smaller increase than either 1966 or 1965 with nearly all of the rise concentrated in government, trade and miscellaneous services.

Manufacturing employment remained practically unchanged, with an increase of 150,000 compared to 1.1 million in 1966.

Hourly earnings also reflected the state of the economy—up 12 cents, but only 4 cents over 1966 in terms of real purchasing power.

The 1967 workweek was below the 1966 and 1965 levels, adding further to the problems of earnings and purchasing power.

The no-progress year of 1967 brought to a standstill, then, a six-year trend in reduction of the unemployment rate. In 1961 the rate stood at 6.7 percent; two years later it was 5.7; in 1965 it dropped to 4.5 and the following year to 3.8.

The failure to improve on the 1966 performance stems primarily from the failure of Congress to adopt the necessary public policies and programs to assure continuing progress in reducing unemployment.

The second session of the 90th Congress will have the opportunity to redress this situation and vote up policies and programs that will give every American the opportunity of a decent job at a decent rate of pay. An unemployment rate stuck at 3.8 percent is not good enough.

Staggering Problems:

Population Spurt Adds Urgency To Planning for Year 2000

NOT LONG AGO the United States population passed the 200 million mark, yet already the experts are getting ready for the 300 million mark due to arrive about the year 2000.

What they foresee for our cities and for our very way of life is staggering, if not a little frightening.

"Communities of Tomorrow" is the name of a symposium in Washington sponsored by half a dozen cabinet officers whose departments deal with all the subjects of vital interest to our cities. What the cabinet members are trying to get at is shaping the future for 100 million more Americans.

Quite a job when you consider the problems that are all but overwhelming the current 200 million:

- Air and water pollution that are increasingly shocking and hazardous to health.
- Over-crowding into cities and their surrounding suburbs with core cities actually becoming asphalt wastes.
- Transportation systems that are literally disappearing before our very eyes. The famous "Twentieth Century, Limited" ran for the last time only recently.

Nor do you have to be an expert to appreciate the stench of the New Jersey turnpike near Newark with its oil refineries and open dumps, nor the billowing smoke of the steel complex of Gary-Hammond, nor the smelting towns of West Virginia. No longer is the smog confined to Los Angeles—some of our lesser industrial cities, notably Washington, have it, too.

And, in the midst of this pollution, more and more people are crowding. In Harlem, New York's sprawling Negro ghetto, there were 122,000 persons per square mile in 1960. If all the people in the United States were as densely crowded together as they are in Harlem, the entire U.S. population could live—if that's the right word—on Long Island, N.Y., a body of land roughly 150 miles long and 25 miles wide.

To compound the problems of over-crowding are the problems of poverty. That of the people in the inner core and decaying cities is notorious. What is not so obvious, because it is hidden where most of us never penetrate, is rural poverty, a poverty that afflicts not only great numbers of Negroes but also whites. Only a year ago the Office of Economic Opportunity estimated that of the total of 34,300,000 Americans living in poverty, 23,700,000 were white.

With slums and poverty is inevitable unemployment. Month after month we watch anxiously for the jobless rate as an index of the nation's economic health. If it lies with a 4 percent range, most American are relieved, although a 4 percent rate is scarcely satisfactory in a nation as rich as ours. Yet, the national rate is meaningless to those who live in the slums, urban or rural. Unemployment among young Negroes ranges from 18.4 percent in Washington, D. C. to 36 percent in Philadelphia.

THE STORY could be extended indefinitely into a wide variety of fields that concern us and our daily lives. Yet, any projection of the future into the year 2000 and its expected 300 million becomes even more shocking in the immensity of the problems that such a future holds.

Here are some of the things expected to happen if the present trend continues:

- 208 million Americans will be crowded into very large cities taking up only 3 percent of the land.
- 43 million will live in smaller cities on 1 percent of the land.
- 57 million rural people will live on 96 percent of the land.
- New York City will have become a super megalopolis stretching from Boston south to Washington, D. C., and contain a population of 56,000,000 people.

Jobs, health, transportation, housing, education, food . . . the problems facing vast agglomerations of people in crowded areas demand the closest attention from all of us.

We have learned by bitter experience that we cannot depend on the chances of individual interests and profits to build the kind of communities that should answer the needs of our people. Only thoughtful planning can do the job.

There are six basic cabinet posts which are deeply involved in the kind of planning that we need. They are the secretaries of Agriculture, Commerce, Labor, Health, Education & Welfare; Housing & Urban Development and Transportation. These six secretaries are now seeking to develop programs to meet the problems of the future. The degree of their success will determine what kind of lives Americans will lead not only today, but tomorrow. (PAI.)

COPE Stresses Issues:

Progress or Retreat at Stake In Crucial November Elections

The following is excerpted from the Jan. 8, 1968 issue of Memo from COPE, the publication of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

ALL OF A SUDDEN, it's election year 1968. The presidency, all 435 seats in the U.S. House, 34 seats in the Senate and the governorship in 22 states—all are up for grabs next Nov. 5. (See chart Page 6.)

The stakes, as ever, are high—for trade unions and their members perhaps higher than in any election in recent years. The one big question to be answered Nov. 5 will be: Progress or retreat?

The answer will be retreat if conservatives make substantial gains at the polls. The cost would be immense. No single new progressive program would stand a chance. No liberal program enacted in recent years would be safe.

To trade unions and their members specifically, the consequences of conservative victory would be shattering. Conservatives in Congress and their allies in the business community await only political victory to create legislative calamity for unions—to bring labor under anti-trust laws and prohibit industry-wide bargaining; to dismantle the NLRB and replace it with a so-called labor court; to outlaw coordinated multi-union bargaining; to impose a national open shop law on trade unions.

Just as the cost of conservative victory would be high, so would be the rewards of a liberal victory: New legislative breakthroughs like those made by the 89th Congress in the fields of health, education, welfare and civil rights.

The big battle, of course, will be for the presidency. Pres. Johnson goes into election year 1968 with the polls showing a decline of some 15-20 percent in his popularity from his 1964 peak when he defeated Sen. Goldwater. But he's rebounding and polls don't determine election results anyway. Twenty years ago, another liberal President—Harry Truman—was counted out by the polls but elected by the people.

IT'LL BE NIP-AND-TUCK for liberals to retain control of the U.S. Senate in the 1968 elections.

The present Senate make-up is 64 Democrats, 36 Republicans. Twenty-three Democratic seats are up for election, only 11 Republican seats.

In recent years a progressive bastion, the Senate will be under siege by conservatives this year.

Nine liberal Democratic senators face stiff contests. Eight of them won by less than 55 percent of the total vote six years ago. The ninth, Sen. Ernest Gruening (Alaska), won with 58.1 percent but will encounter a rough scrap this year.

In Idaho, Sen. Frank Church is the target of the state's strong ultra-conservative faction. Though a right-wing effort to have him recalled failed, it helped coalesce the forces opposing him. They're already at work to shake him loose. Church won with 54.7 percent of the vote in 1962.

Others who won squeakers six years ago and again face hard battles are: Sen. Abraham Ribicoff (Conn.) who won with 51.3 percent of the vote; Sen. Birch Bayh (Ind.), 50.3 percent; Sen. Joseph S. Clark (Penn.), 51.1 percent; Sen. George McGovern (S.D.), 50.1 percent; Sen. Warren Magnuson (Wash.), 52.1 percent; Sen. Gaylord Nelson (Wisc.), 52.6 percent.

In addition, Sen. Carl Hayden meets up with the comeback try of former Sen. Barry Goldwater in Arizona. Hayden, who won with 54.9 percent of the vote in 1962, may retire. But whether he or someone else runs against Goldwater, it will be at best a toss-up.

Three of the Republicans seeking re-election nipped in last time: Sen. Peter Dominick (Colo.), 53.6 percent; Sen. Bourke Hickenlooper (Iowa), 53.4 percent; Sen. Wallace Bennett (Utah), 52.4 percent.

Two GOP senators are retiring: Frank Carlson of Kansas, and Hickenlooper. In the latter state, liberal Democratic Gov. Harold Hughes has announced for the Senate seat being vacated by Hickenlooper.

THINGS BLEW APART in the House as soon as the results of 1966 elections were in. The net loss of 47 liberal seats was crippling. It reflected in the consideration of just about every major piece of social legislation to come before the 90th Congress. Few programs escaped without wounds.

While the 1966 elections left the President with a majority in the House, it was more apparent than real. The present balance of 247 Democrats to 187 Republicans—with one vacancy—simply does not provide a liberal majority.

Add anywhere from 60 to 90 Dixiecrat votes to an almost solid GOP vote on most issues and you come up with a conservative majority—in truth, the revival of the Dixiecrat-GOP coalition that ruled the roost in the House for almost 30 years before the 89th Congress interrupted its reign.

From the liberal point of view, there is both opportunity and potential trouble in the House elections this year.

About 30 incumbent liberals scraped by with 55 percent or less of the total vote in their districts in 1966. Many of them are survivors of the 1966 "slaughter of the innocents" which cut so deeply into the ranks of 89th Congress freshmen liberals. Now with two terms under their belts, a win in 1968 will entrench them solidly in their districts and help them move up the important committee ladders in the House.

Similarly, there are about 30 incumbent conservatives running whose grip on their districts is far from unshakable, winners by 55 percent or less of the vote in 1966. Among them are congressmen who have cast no or precious few "right" votes on the COPE scorecard.

Clerical Employment Lags:

Negro Job Ratio Found Higher In Unionized Construction Field

MORE NEGROES hold skilled jobs in construction than in most other industries, and apprenticeship opportunities in construction are widening, the AFL-CIO's director of civil rights said in a network radio interview.

Donald Slaiman pointed out that the latest government report on construction employment in larger firms with federal contracts shows that Negroes make up 16.6 percent of the blue collar work force—the most solidly unionized segment of the industry. But, he said, in the mostly unorganized white collar part of the industry, Negroes hold less than 1 percent of the jobs.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, Slaiman said that aside from "isolated cases of discrimination" in construction jobs, the main problem now is to "recruit, train, motivate and prep" minority group workers for apprenticeship programs, "and get them to come through the doors when the doors are open." The AFL-CIO produced public service program is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. EST, on the Mutual Radio Network.

Slaiman credited union-supported programs of the Workers Defense League and the Urban League that recruit and prepare apprentices, with bringing more minority group youngsters into the skilled trades.

In the last three years, such programs have brought "more than 1,000 Negro and Puerto Rican apprentices" into construction jobs in 16 cities, he said. He acknowledged that the number of recruits "is still small," but said that the two-pronged drive of "insuring non-discrimination, plus insuring that there will be qualified applicants," is producing significant results.

Slaiman said that with job requirements rising—"both educational background and actual mechanical skill—" there has to be a "massive effort among all parties, communities, employers and unions," to upgrade youngsters for the skilled trades and give them "meaningful work" while they build their capabilities.

Reporters questioning Slaiman were Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Alan Adams of Business Week magazine.

By Press Associates, Inc.

WHEN PRES. JOHNSON recently cracked down on the investment of private capital abroad, he did it basically to protect the dollar and the American gold supply.

But, there is another side of the picture that hasn't been talked about but is crucially important to American workers . . . jobs.

The President hopes to reduce the U.S. balance of payments deficit this year by approximately $3 billion dollars. Of this, at least $1 billion would come from a mandatory program that will restrain direct private investment abroad. Another $500 million would come from restraints on foreign lending by banks and other financial institutions. Still another $500 million would come from reform of inequitable tax systems abroad that attract American capital to leave our own shores and go elsewhere. Efforts are to be made in this direction through diplomatic channels.

The President also wants to save $500 million through a reduction in government expenditures abroad and a final $500 million through restraint on American tourist travel abroad with its terrific drain on dollars.

Either directly or indirectly these $3 billion that will be staying at home instead of going abroad, are going to help produce jobs for American workers.

The job significance of the export of American capital to foreign countries during the past few years has not been lost on the American labor movement. AFL-CIO conventions and meetings of its Executive Council have repeatedly pointed out the vast growth of this export of capital and the effect it has had on jobs at home.

In September 1967 the AFL-CIO Executive Council issued a statement pointing to the sharp rise in capital export that has been taking place, not merely to underdeveloped countries which need it, but to the developing countries of West Europe which don't need it. The statement noted that the estimated book-value of direct private investment in foreign countries skyrocketed from about $12 billion in 1950 to $49 billion in 1965, climbed another $8.7 billion in 1966 and was well on the way up in 1967.

These investments included new funds sent abroad as well as profits made abroad and ploughed back into plants and equipment owned abroad. The statement noted that these outflows were contributing substantially to America's balance of payments deficit.

But the council added:

"This skyrocketing rise in the export of U.S. private capital has cost American jobs, cut into American exports and added to imports."

IN CALLING for a stemming of the outflow of private capital and a buildup of the domestic economy, the AFL-CIO convention only last December, pointed out that the American economy is "still some distance from full employment, that unemployment is still much too high" and that the economy was not moving along fast enough to provide the jobs that are needed "particularly for the most disadvantaged job seekers among teenagers, Negroes and the unskilled."

How many jobs can be produced by the $3 billion that President Johnson wants to keep at home?

Theoretically, about 200,000 jobs could be created by a $3 billion domestic investment at roughly $15,000 a job. But it won't work out that high. The full $3 billion is highly unlikely to flow into immediate job-creating activities.

Economists figure that a more likely figure is between 50,000 and 100,000 jobs which is a lot less than 200,000, but is not to be sneezed at.

What is important is that the Johnson Administration has now faced up to the problem of the unregulated export of private American capital. This is a point that has long since been made by the AFL-CIO in the interest both of jobs and the national welfare. It is a significant step forward.

WORKERS DEFENSE LEAGUE and Urban League apprentice-recruitment programs in 16 cities have brought more than 1,000 minority group youngsters into construction jobs in the last three years, AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman (center) told Alan Adams (left) of Business Week magazine and Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers on Labor News Conference, heard Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on Mutual radio.

AFL-CIO Committee On Political Education

WASHINGTON D. C.

At Ohio Parley:

Rustin Cites Gains In Fighting Job Bias

Columbus, O.—A "great coalition" of labor and responsible civil rights organizations must work together to elect a Congress which recognizes the nation's problems, Bayard Rustin told participants in the Ohio AFL-CIO's two-day civil rights conference.

Rustin, who is executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, hit at "distortions" in the press about racial discrimination in unions and apprenticeship programs.

"There is not a single building trades union left whose leadership is not committed and dedicated to ending racial discrimination," Rustin declared.

But he warned that if every apprenticeship opening in the nation was filled by a Negro, "it still wouldn't cure just one-half of the unemployment problem in Harlem alone."

Rustin described the 90th Congress as "backward" and failing to produce programs that would prevent riots, rather than just control them.

Schools and Housing

Negroes, he said, "want adequate schools for their children; they want adequate medical care; they want adequate housing."

The government, he declared, must become the "employer of last resort" so that progress can keep pace with aspirations.

The conference, attended by 500 trade unionists from all parts of the state, also heard major addresses by Donald Slaiman, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights; New York Central Labor Council Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, and Ernest Green, director of the successful five-city apprenticeship tutoring program of the Workers Defense League.

Slaiman said Negroes have been hardest hit by the decline in semi-skilled jobs and the low pay of most service-type jobs.

He urged each delegate to return to his local union committed to an active role in pressing for programs to provide jobs at good wages for everyone and to battle discrimination wherever it occurs.

Van Arsdale stressed the goal of organizing the unorganized, declaring that "higher wages will play the greatest role in winning the war against poverty." The respect and understanding gained in organizing campaigns, he said, will help break down racial barriers.

Green spoke of the apprenticeship tutoring programs now under way in New York City, Westchester County, Buffalo, Newark and Cleveland in cooperation with local building trades unions.

"We have been successful in placing hundreds of Negro youths in these trade unions mainly because of the wonderful cooperation extended by the unions themselves," Green reported.

The formal speeches were just a part of the two-day conference.

Delegates met in more than a dozen workshops for candid discussion with guest speakers of discrimination problems in education, jobs, housing and other areas.

A local attorney who participated as a guest panelist commented after a session: "Never have I seen such interest and spirit. These people recognize that a problem exists and have the courage to do something about it."

level GM consideration. It obtained a copy of the document, dated July 5, 1967, which it said was drawn up in a hurry by GM's cost analysis section. The Daily published the text of the mutual aid pact, which was labeled as a plan for the "sharing of losses" of the struck company by the companies not struck.

According to the plan, the Daily said, the reimbursement would be equal to 40 percent of the production lost during the strike, provided the other companies could produce this much on overtime Saturday work.

If Ford or Chrysler were struck, then the two other "Big 3" firms would pay that company $500 for each unit it was unable to produce up to a number equal to 40 percent of normal production. In the case of Ford this meant the payment by the other two firms of $500 for 24,000 units weekly or $12 million. In the case of Chrysler, the other two firms would make up for a loss of 12,000 units or $6 million.

GM Formula

Since Ford and Chrysler together could not produce enough on Saturday overtime to equal 40 percent of GM's average production, a variation of the $500 per unit formula was proposed. The GM formula called for payment by Ford and Chrysler of $500 for each of the 18,000 units they could produce on a Saturday, or $9 million. Ford and Chrysler would then pay GM $200 each for an additional 25,000 units, or $5 million more for a total of $14 million.

"The advantages of this plan," according to the seven-page document published by the student paper, "are that each company's reimbursements from the other companies are approximately the same as the potential payments to the other companies if they were on strike."

The example used showed that if GM were on strike, GM's reimbursements from Ford ($9,333,000) would be approximately the same as GM's payments to Ford ($9,400,000), if it were struck.

The payments would have begun in the second week and continued for the duration of the strike.

The UAW blasted GM's negotiations role after Chrysler Corp. had rejected the union's offer extending that firm's contract and eliminating it from consideration as a strike target.

GM 'Dictation'

At that time the UAW charged that GM was ". . . dictating to the industry and that GM is the chief architect of a conspiracy that is interfering with free and independent collective bargaining between the UAW and other corporations."

The UAW eventually chose Ford as a strike target, winning its best contract in its history after a walkout of about two months.

GM Board Chairman James M. Roche refused to confirm or deny the existence of the plan. "Whatever it is, it is a confidential document and somebody stole it," Roche said.

Ford and Chrysler spokesmen denied knowledge of the document although Ford Vice Pres. Malcolm Denise had said earlier that "I wouldnt' kid you that we haven't looked into the mutual assistance plan in the rubber industry."

other construction craftsmen increasing from 94,000 to 123,000.'

"The actual figures in the report—not Fortune's interpretation of them—bear this out. In any event a report which terminates in 1964 is by definition out of date. The Civil Rights Act, with its fair employment section, was not law until late 1964—an act which the AFL-CIO strongly supported and has used with great effectiveness."

Another "deceptive generality" stressed in the article and the ads assert that "Negro factory hands earn 32 percent less than their white counterparts," allegedly because of union misdeeds, Slaiman went on.

On the contrary, he said, "the prime contributors to the 32 percent figure are low-wage, unorganized industries which AFL-CIO unions are trying hard to organize, almost always against the last ditch opposition of the employers. These industries employ a disproportionate number of Negroes at inordinately low wage scales."

Where unions are strong, racial wage differentials have "long since" been eliminated despite "intense employer opposition;" and unions are now using the federal law to force recalcitrant employers to abolish such differentials as remain, Slaiman pointed out.

Similarly, factory seniority systems—pictured by Fortune as an obstacle to Negro workers—are in fact "often minority workers' best protection" against exploitation by employers, Slaiman said, and many industrial unions, including the Steelworkers (singled out for criticism by O'Hanlon) are not only fighting to eliminate discrimination in ugrading but are conducting educational and training programs to make sure minority workers are adequately prepared to move up.

(It is typical of Fortune's approach that the corresponding piece on the role of business placed heavy stress on the educational poverty of jobless Negroes. In praising one company, this article noted that it had to drop nine out of 10 Negroes it recruited because the jobs required a fifth grade ability to read and cipher. There was no corresponding recognition that construction trades apprentices must have a high school education to master their trades, and only a few grudging words were devoted to the pre-apprenticeship training and minority-group recruitment by the unions.)

In his letter Slaiman took "personal exception" to O'Hanlon's words about the civil rights department:

"He asserted that complaints to the AFL-CIO produced no results. He charged we have never made a frontal attack on discrimination and segregation. These are untruths of staggering dimensions.

"The record shows that:

"1.—Hundreds of cases have been satisfactorily handled by this department and Mr. O'Hanlon could have examined the files on these cases when he was here, if he had asked. Obviously he wasn't interested in facts. . . .

"2.—No other organization—save the civil rights organizations—fought as hard as the AFL-CIO has fought and continues to fight for civil rights legislation, including granting cease-and-desist authority to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. And it is the AFL-CIO that continues the fight today for fair housing legislation, in the face of polls that report many union members as individuals are opposed to it.

Job Upgrading

"3.—We have launched, financed and established affirmative programs to upgrade minority workers and have promoted better public education, especially in America's ghettos.

"4.—In the area of apprenticeship, we have worked out programs in over 17 major U. S. cities to recruit and help prepare minority youngsters for entry into skilled trades. This is done in cooperation with the building trade councils and community-based organizations—among them the Urban League, Oportunities Industrialization Center and the Workers Defense League.

"Mr. O'Hanlon implied that our Civil Right Committee comprises white union leaders reluctant to move against themselves. In fact, this committee of 20 outstanding international union officers includes three militant and outspoken Negro trade union leaders.

"And he left the impression of a rift between the AFL-CIO and the dean of the Negro union leaders, A. Philip Randolph. On the contrary, Mr. Randolph has praised the progress made by the AFL-CIO and commended in most generous terms the efforts of Mr. Meany and of the Civil Rights Committee."

Slaiman emphasized that the AFL-CIO makes no claim that all trade union civil rights problems have been solved.

"No one in the AFL-CIO maintains that the civil rights record of unions is without fault or above criticism," he said. "We never object to an honest, objective appraisal of union problems or shortcomings in this or any field. But the O'Hanlon article is not criticism; it is a dishonest, distorted attack."

The O'Hanlon piece concluded by offering four "reforms": Abolition of hiring halls, on the charge that some of them discriminate; expulsion of unions where discrimination is practiced; decertification of unions that prevent "any member" from running for office, and "free entry"—not explained—into apprenticeship programs.

These so-called "reforms," Slaiman concluded, "are revealing indeed; for essentially they are not pro-Negro but anti-union, calculated to divide the labor movement and Negroes.

"To us this is not accidental. It is precisely this that Mr. O'Hanlon and "Black Power" advocates want. Such a division would be detrimental to unions, to Negroes and to America. And that we will not allow to happen."

Wirtz Shifts Labor Dept. Job Training

Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz has announced realignment and consolidation of job training programs within the Labor Dept.'s Manpower Administration.

The major change involves the shift of on-the-job training programs covering about 135,000 trainees from the Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training to a newly formed Bureau of Work Training programs.

This shift, Wirtz said, will permit BAT to "put its full effort on its traditional functions of promoting and developing private apprenticeship programs."

The new work training bureau also would accommodate "work incentive" training for welfare beneficiaries under social security amendments passed by Congress.

A third change, Wirtz said, will be to consolidate all staff functions of the various units of the Manpower Administration directly under the office of assistant manpower administrator.

Under a fourth change, regional offices of the Manpower Administration will be set up to help bring state employment agencies into the development of manpower programs.

Meany Asks Action:

Backlog of Key Bills Waits on Congress

provided to achieve it," he stressed. "Appropriations were inadequate in every case and pitiful in many. The obvious intent was to starve out programs which the conservatives could not, or did not dare, repeal."

A replay of the budget battle is obviously in store for the second session starting Jan. 15.

The broad outline of the Administration's 1968 program will be presented Jan. 17 at 9 p.m., EST, when Pres. Johnson delivers his State of the Union Message to Congress and a nationwide television audience.

Other messages in the weeks to come will spell out specific new legislative proposals. Among those anticipated are major programs on housing and hospital construction.

The Senate will plunge immediately into one of its most controversial legislative battles—on new civil rights legislation.

Shortly before adjournment, Majority Leader Mike Mansfield made the pending order of business in the new session a bill making it a federal crime to injure, intimidate or interfere with a person exercising specified civil rights, including among others voting, attending school, applying for a job, or making use of public accommodations.

The bill passed the House and in somewhat improved form was aproved by the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Strengthening Sought

Civil rights supporters hope to amend it on the Senate floor to add on other portions of the Administration's civil rights program —which had initially been broken up into several bills to speed action.

The other sections include an open housing proposal, strengthening of equal employment opportunity enforcement, and a bar on discrimination in selection of juries.

A southern filibuster is virtually certain, and two years ago similar legislation was killed when Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen joined with the Dixie bloc to prevent the two-thirds vote needed to limit debate.

Committee action is likely to dominate the House side of the Capitol during the early weeks of the session.

A bill of special importance to the AFL-CIO and the nation's farm workers will be the order of business when the Education and Labor Committee meets Jan. 23.

Building Trades System

The subcommittee-approved bill would end the exemption of farm workers from the National Labor Relations Act. It would provide for union recognition and bargaining rights under the same procedures used in the construction industry, where the work force is also temporary.

Meany testified for the bill at subcommittee hearings and a companion measure is being considered by the Senate Migratory Labor subcommittee.

Awaiting action by the House Rules Committee is a "truth-in-lending" bill similar to a Senate-passed measure. Supporters of a strong law plan to seek to strengthen it on the House floor to include disclosure of interest on department store revolving credit accounts.

As a follow-up to the meat inspection law enacted last year, union and consumer groups are planning a major push for strengthening poultry inspection. Eighty-seven percent of all poultry is already federally inspected, but there is virtually no state inspection of the remainder.

Election year logistics assure that the second session will be shorter than the 1967 session, which did not wind up until Dec. 15.

Both political parties hold their national conventions in August and there is a slim chance that Congress might wind up before then. More likely, however, is a recess during the convention period, reconvening in September. The demands of political campaigning will build heavy pressure for final adjournment before October.

SHEEPSKIN SCROLL spells out in three languages—English, Hebrew and Arabic—labor's strong stand against Middle East aggression aimed at Israel. The text is AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's statement issued last June during the Middle East crisis. The scroll was presented to Meany by Amos Eiran, labor attache to the Israeli embassy. It is the gift of Yerucham Meshel, chairman of the trade union department of Histadrut, Israel's federation of labor.

Shopping Center Picketing Ban Termed Threat to Free Speech

Peaceful picketing is a form of free speech and state trespass laws should not be allowed to bar it at shopping centers, the AFL-CIO told the Supreme Court.

The federation, in a friend-of-the-court brief, urged reversal of a Pennsylvania state court order banning picketing of Logan Valley Plaza, Inc., and Weis Markets, Inc., by Local 590 of the Meat Cutters, Pittsburgh.

The questions presented in the Pittsburgh case "are of great importance to the continued vitality of the right to picket," the AFL-CIO declared in the brief. It described picketing as "one of the handful of basic rights that employes have at their disposal during a labor dispute."

The questions at issue, the brief said, are whether a state may use its trespass laws to prohibit peaceful picketing which takes place on a public thoroughfare inside a privately-owned shopping center without violating the 1st and 14th amendments to the U.S. Constitution.

The employers argued that picketing with signs, as opposed to handbilling, does not enjoy the full protection of the 1st amendment. The AFL-CIO disagreed. It said a state on its own, or at the behest of a private citizen, cannot under the constitution close a public thoroughfare to either peaceful picketing or handbilling on the ground that the owner has the "unfettered discretion" to control informational activity "because of his property rights."

The brief related that the owners of the Weis supermarket used a state law to prevent the union from using informational pickets to tell the public that the market was non-union and paid inferior wages. Thus the courts utilized a no-trespassing law to create a "cordon sanitaire" around the market and to immunize the employer from picketing and handbilling on roads open to the public.

Allowing the states to close streets at their discretion would effectively curtail free speech, said the brief, which declared that property rights must in appropriate instances give way to our "profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust and wide open," as the high court declared in a 1964 case—New York Times v. Sullivan.

A parallel brief by the Retail Clerks related that a "substantial portion of retail sales take place at shopping centers" whose percentage of the total market is increasing.

Thus the decision, if upheld, could have a "crippling" effect on AFL-CIO affiliates "since it insulates an employer on a shopping center from effective peaceful picketing during a primary labor dispute involving him."

Unions Helped to Test Vaccine Against Mumps

Philadelphia, Pa.—More than 1,000 children of union members here participated in tests that led to development of the nation's first live virus vaccine against mumps.

The Philadelphia AFL-CIO and its affiliated unions helped organize the testing program carried out here by the John F. Kennedy Memorial Hospital.

The story came to light when the U.S. Public Health Service announced that it has licensed Merck, Sharp & Dohme, a West Point, Pa., pharmaceutical firm, to distribute the vaccine.

The vaccine was approved by PHS on the basis of an 18-month study of its safety and potency made at the National Institutes of Health, and the tests conducted here and in other cities.

The government recommends the vaccine primarily for children approaching puberty, for adolescents and adults, especially males, if they have not had mumps.

The vaccine will not be recommended for routine use in younger children until more information becomes available in the duration of its protective immunity, PHS said.

Administrator W. Clark Woodrow of the John F. Kennedy Hospital said that organized labor "assumed a leading role in tests carried out by our medical center."

"When we were ready to give the vaccine," he reported, "we contacted the council and individual AFL-CIO unions in Philadelphia and they furnished the children," more than 1,000 in number.

He cited the State, County & Municipal Employes, Meat Cutters, Painters and Building Service Employes among unions that participated extensively in the program.

The tests conducted here, combined with those in other cities, showed that 95 percent of all persons given the vaccine developed antibodies against mumps, PHS reported.

Woodrow said that it "was natural" for the hospital to turn to unions for assistance in testing since many labor leaders are on its board and a number of Philadelphia unions have medical plans that tie in with its services.

The hospital, built in 1963, was known as AFL-CIO Hospital until its name was changed in 1966. Labor leaders helped form the nonprofit corporation which owns it and unions bought bonds to help build it.

Schultze Leaves Top Budget Post

Charles L. Schultze is resigning as director of the Bureau of the Budget and his chief assistant will move into the top spot.

Schultze, 43, became director in 1965 after three years as assistant director. He will return to teaching at the University of Maryland and research with the Brookings Institution.

His letter of resignation stressed his firm support for Pres. Johnson's fiscal policies and the need for a tax increase to sustain the nation's prosperity.

Charles J. Zwick, the assistant budget director, will succeed Schultze. Zwick, 41, served with the Rand Corporation in California and has taught at Harvard and the University of Connecticut.

Tutoring Plan Opens Apprenticeship Doors

"We can now point to the youngsters who have made it and say to others, 'This shows you can do it, too.' "

Those who have "made it," Ernest Green told newsmen, include 175 Negro and Puerto Rican youths who were placed as apprentices in New York construction trades during 1967.

Green is director of the apprenticeship tutoring program of the Workers Defense League and the A. Philip Randolph Foundation, which demonstrated that:

- Disadvantaged youngsters can be prepared to compete on equal terms for apprenticeship openings leading to well-paid skills and a union journeyman's card.
- Building trades unions welcome and will cooperate with programs which do not result in lowering of a craft's necessary standards of qualification.

With financial support from the Labor Dept. and the Ford Foundation, the pioneering program has been expanded to other cities and a high school recruitment drive is under way with a goal of doubling the placement of qualified minority group youngsters in apprenticeship openings.

The program has had strong support from the AFL-CIO and from Pres. Peter J. Brennan of the New York Building Trades Council. Graduates of the special tutoring classes have won apprenticeship slots in 15 construction crafts.

A recent apprenticeship examination given by Local 28 of the Sheet Metal Workers and administered by the Stevens Institute pointed up the effectiveness of the tuturing program.

Thirty-two of the 380 youngsters who took the exam had been attending the special tutoring classes.

Eighteen of them were among the top 60 who received apprenticeship appointments.

Labor Backs Johnson Call For Action on Jobs, Cities

Union Plan Seeks Rail 'Harmony'

Railroad labor has called on the nation's railroads to join in creating a top level union-management committee to help build "a new era of harmony and cooperation" in the industry.

The appeal was issued by the Railway Labor Executives' Association, made up of 23 rail unions. It was announced by RLEA Chairman G. E. Leighty at a Washington, D.C., press conference.

Leighty said he had previously discussed the proposal with Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, who "received it with considerable encouragement."

J. P. Hiltz Jr., management's chief negotiator, said he "wholeheartedly" subscribed to RLEA's plan but indicated a decision on it should come from the Association of American Railroads.

AAR Pres. Thomas M. Goodfellow said he agreed "with the concept of the labor-management committee" as outlined by RLEA and promised "this matter will be given priority attention."

The unions said the goal of the new joint committee should be the adoption of "new attitudes and new policies." Specifically, they cited five new policies that need to be developed:

- Faster negotiations. The AFL-CIO Purchases Adjacent Property

The AFL-CIO has signed a contract for the purchase of the land and building immediately to the north of the AFL-CIO building, Federation Pres. George Meany announced. The property, at corners of 16th and I Streets, Northwest, is now occupied by the Lafayette Hotel.

Meany said the property will ultimately be used to enlarge the AFL-CIO headquarters building, which was dedicated in 1956.

The present operators of the Lafayette Hotel, William C. and Thomas H. Pickford, will receive a 3.5 year lease to continue operation of the hotel, Meany said.

Sales price for the property, including all furnishings, amounted to $2,250,000.

The AFL-CIO was represented in the sale by the law firm of Woll and Mayer and the seller by the law firm of Riley, Johns and Zimmerman.

AMERICA HAS THE RESOURCES to provide jobs, housing, health care and opportunity for its people while fighting aggression abroad, Pres. Johnson told Congress and the nation in his State of the Union Message. He proposed legislation to accomplish this.

Trainmen Win Ruling:

High Court Upholds Separate Rail Talks

The Railroad Trainmen have won a final court victory establishing the union's right to bargain with individual railroads over the size of train crews.

A group of railroads had refused to bargain separately on the issue, insisting on national negotiations through a management association representing all major railroads.

A federal appellate court last fall upheld the union's position and its decision became final when the Supreme Court refused to review the case.

The present composition of train and yard crews is based on a compulsory arbitration award which expired two years ago. The Trainmen's effort to negotiate a change on a railroad-by-railroad basis was blocked when a federal district judge granted a no-strike injunction sought by rail management and handed down a ruling that the issue must be negotiated nationally.

He was reversed by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. The appellate court noted that crew consist agreements have frequently been negotiated with individual railroads. It said only "a strong showing of continuous collective bargaining on a national scale" could justify an insistence on industrywide bargaining.

In their unsuccessful appeal to the Supreme Court, three railroads contended that the apellate court's ruling would enable the union to strike the railroads one by one and "whipsaw" the carriers into settlement.

The other side of the coin, from the union standpoint, was the fact that Congress has demonstrated that it will not permit a strike to

LBJ Puts Emphasis On Unmet Needs

By David L. Perlman

Pres. Johnson called on Congress to "act now" to create jobs for the hard-core unemployed, to rebuild America's cities and improve the health, housing, safety and educational opportunities of its people.

The President said the nation has the resources and strength to do all this without abandoning its commitment in Viet Nam. And, he affirmed, the American people "have the will to meet the trials these times impose."

Johnson's State of the Union Message was "realistic" and "hard-hitting," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

Meany said the AFL-CIO is "especially pleased with the President's proposals to increase funds for job training; to help those who live in slums through an extensive housing program and a billion-dollar model city program; for increased funds for the poverty program; and his child health program for the nation's poor. We are delighted, as well, to see the continued effort to help the nation's consumers."

Meany reiterated labor's full support of the President's "quest for peace with honor in Viet Nam."

The President spoke to a Congress which last year rebuffed or cut back many of the domestic programs he advanced and which ignored his request for a tax increase. The President stressed that a tax hike is more urgently needed than ever.

He also spoke beyond Congress to a nationwide television audience —the constituents of the assembled congressmen and senators.

The President spoke with pride—but briefly—of the prosperity and abundance in the nation, of "higher paychecks" and "humming factories," of the "hundreds and thou-

'67 Gains Hit 5.6% in Key Pacts

Union-negotiated benefit increases averaged 5.6 percent in major contract settlements last year, nearly one-fourth higher than the 4.5 percent median increase in 1966 settlements, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

All measures of change were higher than those recorded for key settlements in 1966, the Labor Dept. agency said. It gave the number of covered workers as 4.5 million last year, 3.4 million in the preceding year.

Survey Highlights

The BLS survey of major 1967 collective bargaining agreements, those covering 1,000 or more workers, showed that:

- The median increase in wages and benefits was 5.6 percent when actual timing of changes was taken into account. (This estimate was based on settlements affecting 5,000 workers or more.)

- Excluding fringe benefits and considering only wage changes scheduled to go into effect during the entire life of the contracts, straight-time hourly wages were increased by 5 percent annually, compared with 3.9 percent in settlements a year earlier.

- Considering first-year changes only, the median first-year wage rate increase was 5.7 percent of straight-time hourly pay, compared with 4.8 percent for 1966.

BLS said the median increase for manufacturing — 6.5 percent — reflected the auto industry settlements providing larger wage boosts in the first contract year than in the second or third years. It compared with 4.2 percent for 1966; the median increase for non-manufacturing was 5 percent in both years, BLS observed.

The biggest 1967 settlements brought major gains for 675,000 Auto Workers and more than 400,000 truckers.

Besides the UAW contracts,

Labor March Protests Hearst Strikebreakers

Los Angeles—More than 2,000 trade unionists touched off the biggest labor demonstration in a generation on the West Coast Jan. 12 protesting the free flow of strikebreakers and their use by the Hearst-owned Los Angeles Herald-Examiner.

Representatives of 60 AFL-CIO internationals staged a two-mile march from the strikebound Hearst property through the commercial heart of the nation's third largest city and on to City Hall.

The march spotlighted a five-week strike-lockout at the Herald-Examiner, where 2,000 member of eight AFL-CIO newspaper unions are idle.

Marchers chanted demands for local ordinances to outlaw use of professional strikebreakers.

Hearst management has published the Herald-Examiner, largest afternoon daily in the U.S., with help of about 200 imported professional strikebreakers since Newspaper Guild and Machinists union members walked out last Dec. 15 in a contract dispute. Printers, Pressmen, Mailers and others were subsequently locked

Rail Unions Ask New Era In Bargaining

RLEA charged managements had in the past resorted to legislation and court actions to stall collective bargaining.

- Better implementation of agreements. Individual railroads have been trying to "chip away" at national agreements as soon as they are negotiated, the unions said.
- Prompt and reasonable handling of grievances. "In this industry," RLEA pointed out, "many employe grievances remain unsettled for long periods of time."
- The publicizing of railroads' "confidence" in employes to offset past "featherbedding" charges against workers. Such charges have demoralized workers and "harmed the public's image of railroading," RLEA said.
- Greater cooperation by unions and management "on legislation and other matters of mutual benefit." For example, RLEA noted, both sides should be pressing to improve railroad safety.

"These five policies, if implemented," would bring a new era to labor-management relations in the railroad industry—an era of productive, uninterrupted and profitable service," the RLEA suggested.

"Let us make 1968 a year of cooperation, not of strife, in this industry," the statement concluded.

PAUL L. PHILLIPS

HARRY D. SAYRE

UPP's Phillips Resigns, Sayre Named President

Albany, N.Y.—Paul L. Phillips has resigned as president of the Papermakers & Paperworkers for reasons of health after a stern warning from his doctors. He has been succeeded by Harry D. Sayre, who has been executive vice president of the union.

Phillips became president of the former Paper Makers in 1948 and in 1957, when it merged with the former CIO Paperworkers, headed the combined organization. Sayre was president of the CIO affiliate at the time of the merger—the first to take place between former AFL and CIO unions.

Both worked in close cooperation to cement the former rival organizations into a single strong union.

Phillips, 63, helped organize the Intl. Paper Co. mill at Camden, Ark., in 1932 and became first president of the new local. He joined the international union staff in 1937 and was elected a vice president in 1942. He was elected an AFL-CIO vice president at the federation's 1957 convention and has been re-elected at each succeeding convention.

Phillips is retiring as UPP president under the union's regular pension program.

Sayre, 53, has been a union officer since 1939, when he worked at the American Coating Mills in Elkhart, Ind. He became president of the Paperworkers in 1947, after having served as secretary-treasurer.

Phillips told the union's executive board that he had been told by his physicians that it is "vitally necessary" that he cut down on his workload. He said he decided to resign because the duties and responsibilities of the presidency would not permit this.

He told the board he was "firmly convinced the future welfare of the membership will best be served by this change." He pledged to Sayre and the UPP membership "my fullest cooperation and loyalty in strengthening and building" the union.

Separate Programs Linked:

Rail Welfare Plan Covers 1.5 Million

More than 1.5 million railroad employes and their dependents will receive improved benefits, effective Mar. 1, under a new health-welfare plan agreed to by rail unions and the nation's railroads.

Chairman G. E. Leighty of the Railway Labor Executives' Association, head of a joint union committee that negotiated the plan, termed it the largest private insurance policy in the world.

The two-year plan, negotiated with the National Railway Labor Conference, representing nearly all railroad managements, replaces five separate national health-welfare plans.

Payments into the plan, entirely paid for by employers, will amount to $33.90 a month per employe, Leighty said. Under present plans, railroads pay $25.72 for each non-operating employe and $27.90 for each operating employe.

Negotiators estimated the annual cost of the plan at $220 million. However, Leighty noted that $50 million of that amount will come from funds already set aside by the carriers.

He described the new plan's benefits as a "substantial improvement" over those provided in the individual plans.

NRLC Chairman J. P. Hiltz Jr. said the plan would "contribute appreciably to the stability, security and welfare" of railroad employes.

Improved Benefits

Major provisions include:

Life insurance of $6,000 per employe plus an additional $4,000 for accidental death, $10,000 major medical insurance, full cost of semi-private hospital room for up to 180 days a year, $1,000 a year for additional hospital costs, and payment of doctors' fees for hospital, home and office calls.

Other provisions cover maternity care, protection for disabled children and students who are dependents, maintenance of a $2,000 life insurance policy for a retired employe and on-duty injury benefits.

Unions signing the agreement for coverage under the new plan were the Machinists, Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, Sheet Metal Workers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Railway Carmen, Firemen & Oilers, Maintenance of Way Employes, Railway Clerks, Transportation-Communication Employes, Signalmen, Hotel & Restaurant Employes (for dining car workers), Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, Railroad Trainmen, Conductors & Brakemen, Locomotive Engineers, and Switchmen.

A rail management spokesman said a number of other unions are expected to be brought under the plan soon.

Serving with Leighty on the unions' negotiating committee were Presidents C. L. Dennis, Clerks; H. C. Crotty, Waymen; Clyde Lane, Conductors & Brakemen; Neil P. Speirs, Switchmen; and Michael Fox, AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept., and Assistant Pres. M. W. Hampton of the Firemen & Enginemen.

Farm Union Protest Upheld In Texas Vote

Rio Grande City, Tex. — The United Farm Workers Organizing Committee won a favorable ruling from a National Labor Relations Board examiner in the union's long effort to win bargaining rights for shed workers of Starr Produce Co.

Trial Examiner David S. Davidson ruled that management unfairly influenced a tie-vote election last Apr. 13 by firing one worker because of his union activities and threatening to fire others. The vote was 14-14 with three challenged ballots.

Davidson recommended that the NLRB order one of the challenged ballots to be counted and to certify UFWOC if it has a majority. In the event that a revised tally of ballots does not give a majority for the union, Davidson advised that the election be set aside because of company interference and a new vote be set during Starr's peak season for vegetables or fruit.

Local Issues Disputes Close Two GM Plants

Detroit—The Auto Workers struck two key plants in the General Motors chain and issued a statement charging GM management with deliberately blocking some contract settlements on local issues.

Authorized strikes of 8,800 workers were called at GM's central foundry in Defiance, O., and its Chevrolet gray iron foundry in Saginaw, Mich., when contract talks brought no settlements. Shutdowns lasting more than a few days could hobble production at all other GM plants along with those of American Motors, Kelsey-Hayes and other purchasers of GM parts, the UAW was told.

UAW Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock accused top management of discouraging local settlements in an effort to reduce its new-car inventories because sales are lagging. At Saginaw, he noted, local management answered a flat "no" to every union proposal.

"That isn't bargaining," Woodcock said. "It's the attitude of a stubborn high-handed royalty which expects its servants to beg for a bone."

Since the UAW settled with GM last month on national contract issues, 81 local settlements have been negotiated out of 168.

Elsewhere on the UAW bargaining scene, union negotiators came to terms with Chrysler Corp. on local issues after a five-day strike at the Newark, Del., assembly plant; signed a new contract for plants of Eaton, Yale & Towne, Inc.; resumed bargaining with AMC and set a new target date for settlement with Chrysler Canada.

A contract covering 11,000 UAW members at Chrysler plants in Windsor, Etobicoke and Ajax, Ont. has been extended to Jan. 24 and may not be extended again unless an improved agreement is reached, the union warned.

Talks Continue

Canadian UAW Dir. George Burt said separate union teams are negotiating with all three big auto firms. General Motors offered terms similar to those accepted by U.S. locals, but some qualifying "strings" were attached. Ford offered nothing, the UAW reported. The union represents 23,000 workers at GM plants and 11,000 at Ford of Canada.

Federal mediation was invoked, unsuccessfully, at all three firms. Contracts had expiration dates of Oct. 31 at GM, Nov. 15 at Chrysler and Dec. 1 at Ford. All were extended until the union settled with the Big 3 in the U.S.

In a settlement with 51 shops represented by the Detroit Tooling Association, the UAW won raises of 60 cents an hour for skilled workers this year, and an additional 35 cents in the next two years; three more paid holidays for a total of 11; settlement pay of $50 for each man and other improvements. Some 5,500 toolmakers had been on strike since Nov. 20.

Teachers Make Staff Appointments

Appointment of four new members of the administrative staff of the American Federation of Teachers was announced by AFT Pres. Charles Cogen. These staff members were named to fill vacancies created when the union moved its headquarters from Chicago to Washington:

Research Dir. Robert Bhaerman, formerly of the Pennsylvania State Dept. of Public Instruction; Civil Rights Dir. Leonard Lewis, from the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare; Publicity Dir. Al Loewenthal, formerly of the Rutgers Labor & Management Relations Institute and the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Dir. Richard A. Hixson of the new department of colleges.

AFL-CIO Supreme Court Brief Links Band Leader Case to Pay Standards

The U.S. Supreme Court was urged to reverse a 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals decision that the Musicians cannot enforce minimum pay scales for band leaders accepting club dates.

In a friend-of-the-court brief, the federation said that union pay regulations in this area, as in others where musicians perform, "are the direct minimum response . . . compatible with maintaining wage standards for employe members."

In many instances, the brief continued, other unions must take similar action to "eliminate wage competition among all those who perform the same job in the same industry."

Thus, it warned, the appeals court decision "strikes a blow to the jugular not only of the Musicians but many other unions as well."

The case involves a challenge brought by several band leaders against the regulations of the AFM and its Local 802 in New York. It is one of several attacks they have made on the union in courts and before the National Labor Relations Board.

The appeals court sustained most points of a decision by a New York District Court dismissing an anti-trust suit brought by the leaders.

The appellate court said in effect that leaders act as employes in steady engagement work and in television and recording fields. It also upheld the union's requirement of membership for the leaders.

But it decided by a 2-1 margin that the union could not require leaders performing at weddings, parties and other "single engagements" to charge minimum rates. In this instance, it held the leaders to be employers.

The appeals court interpreted a U.S. Supreme Court decision—Meat Cutters v. Jewel Tea — to find that requiring minimum pay for club dates violated the Sherman anti-trust law.

Jewel Tea Case

Actually, the high court in Jewel Tea ruled that unions did not violate anti-trust laws in setting marketing hours through collective bargaining contracts with employers.

But the appeals court said that because the setting of pay scales for club dates was a "unilateral" union action, it was not entitled to anti-trust exemption. It construed the minimum pay regulations to be "prices."

Terming the appeals court decision "clearly erroneous," the AFL-CIO brief cited other cases in which the Supreme Court has decided that unions are exempt from anti-trust laws when they use "economic weapons in their self-interest."

The federation stressed that "under the tests proposed in Jewel Tea," as well as those prescribed in other Supreme Court decisions, union actions are exempt from anti-trust coverage when they are taken to protect members' wages and job conditions.

It noted that the lower court had conceded that the protesting band leaders are in job and wage competition with employe-musicians in accepting club dates.

The brief said that "all those who perform musical services in the club date field, which includes the leader, the sub-leader and sidemen, are . . . in direct job and wage competition with each other."

Public Relations Drive:

AFL-CIO Task Force to Rally Support for Copper Strikers

Formation of a special public relations task force was announced by the AFL-CIO to reinforce and coordinate the efforts of the Steelworkers and 21 other affiliated unions to broaden public support of the strike by 60,000 copper workers.

As strikers marched in 23 states and continued their efforts to get management to the bargaining table, company back-to-work efforts fizzled in Baltimore, Md., and Los Angeles.

In Butte, Mont., the Anaconda Co., responding to a month-old union offer, called for "immediate unconditional resumption" of negotiations, but then set a precondition that it would not negotiate on a company-wide basis.

The unions agreed to meet Jan. 23 without any strings.

The publicists' group was formed at a meeting in AFL-CIO headquarters called by Dir. Albert J. Zack of the federation's Dept. of Public Relations and USWA Public Relations Dir. Raymond W. Pasnick. Zack described the new undertaking as another step in implementing all-out AFL-CIO union support for the strike, pledged by the federation convention last month.

"The Steelworkers and the other unions have been doing a sound and very effective job to the limits of their resources," Zack said. "Yet the fact remains that this is the longest large strike, and the largest long strike, that has failed to win widespread public attention outside the affected areas."

As the strike entered its seventh month, Zack said "we are convinced that if public interest in the issues can be aroused, there will be an overwhelming wave of public support for the strikers which will force the industry—one of the richest in the nation, and a major beneficiary of direct and indirect federal subsidies—to bargain realistically with the unions and negotiate contracts that will give these long-exploited workers a fair measure of economic equity."

Seven on Committee

Besides Zack and Pasnick, the task force members are Marie Downey, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Baker Morten, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Dir. Henry Santiestevan of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. information center; Dir. Saul Miller of the federation's Dept. of Publications, and Sec.-Treas. Kenneth Fiester of the Intl. Labor Press Association, which comprises the nation's major trade union publications.

The task force will operate out of AFL-CIO headquarters and will be fully coordinated with USWA's Pittsburgh and Chicago offices, where interunion public relations has been centered. Zack said additional help, including manpower, will be drawn from affiliated unions not directly involved in the strike.

Meanwhile, donations to the AFL-CIO copper strike support fund, now more than $700,000, continued to come in and union committees renewed their efforts to get copper's struck Big Four, and seven smaller suppliers of copper, zinc and lead, to engage in meaningful collective bargaining.

In Baltimore, the American Smelting & Refining Co. sent letters to 850 workers Jan. 10 threatening that they would be "permanently replaced" unless they reported for work Jan. 15. Nearly 300 union members reported to the plant picket lines early that day but no strikebreakers appeared, though one man had sneaked in earlier, the pickets were told.

Also on hand were 35 to 40 Baltimore police and company guards, while inside the plant company foremen waited vainly for returnees.

A. J. Kleff, Jr., plant manager, told newsmen he was disappointed at the lack of "reasonable response" to the back-to-work attempt.

Joining members of USWA Locals 625 and 5877 at the gates were Pres. Charles Della of the Maryland AFL-CIO, Pres. Dominick Fornaro of the Baltimore AFL-CIO, Maryland COPE Dir. Peck Windsor, and three officers of USWA Local 365 at the AS&R plant in Perth Amboy, N.J.

Another back-to-work attempt failed in Los Angeles, according to Pres. Robert Hawkins of USWA Local 700, when 100 AS&R strikers rejected a company order to return Jan. 11. No one attempted to cross the picket line, Hawkins said.

Refinery Struck

Members of USWA Local 5977 voted unanimously to authorize a strike at the Baltimore refinery of the Kennecott Corp., where the contract expires Jan. 20. Recent bargaining sessions there have brought no progress, the union said.

The other member of industry's Big Four, in addition to Anaconda, Kennecott, and American Smelting, is the Phelps Dodge Corp. Also struck are American Metal Climax, Inc., Cerro Corp., Hecla Mining Co., Inspiration Consolidated Copper Co., Magma Copper Co., Miami Copper Co. and White Pine Copper Co.

The striking unions beside the USWA are the Auto Workers, Boilermakers, Bricklayers, Carpenters, Chemical Workers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Iron Workers, Laborers, Locomotive Engineers, Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, Machinists, Molders, Office & Professional Employes, Office Employes Independent Union, Operating Engineers, Painters, Pattern Makers, Plumbers, Railroad Trainmen, Railway Carmen, Railway Conductors, Sheet Metal Workers, Switchmen and Teamsters.

Strike Time Ratio Shows Rise in '67

Less than a third of 1 percent of work time was lost because of strikes last year, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

At .30 percent, the ratio was higher than in any year since 1959, principally because of the effect of a few large strikes and some long ones, the report noted. BLS said that at 4,475 the number of stoppages beginning in 1967 was only about 2 percent higher than in 1966.

The agency listed 29 stoppages in 1967 involving 10,000 workers or more, and accounting for half the total of 41 million mandays lost and more than half the 2.9 million workers affected by stoppages.

BACK-TO-WORK CALL at struck Baltimore plant of American Smelting & Refining Co. produced a 300-man picket line but no takers of company offer to break six-month strike of copper workers. Snow and below-freezing temperatures failed to dampen spirits of strikers in Steelworkers Locals 625 and 5877. Pickets include Local 625 Pres. Jim Tarrant, center foreground, and to his right, Maryland AFL-CIO Pres. Charles A. Della.

CHILDREN of 60,000 copper strikers were remembered at Christmas parties in the 23 states where employes of major copper, lead and zinc firms have been on the picket line since July 15. Two of the parties are pictured: top, members of Steelworkers Local 837 in Carteret, N.J., pass out toys donated by the Dolls, Toys & Playthings Workers; below, VISTA volunteers Ricki Mancebo and Patricia Clark help serve children of strikers at Morenci and Clifton, Ariz.

FTC Urged to Probe Kennecott Merger Plan

The Steelworkers urged the Federal Trade Commission to hold a full-scale public hearing on the proposed merger of Kennecott Copper Corp with Peabody Coal Corp. to "disclose and evaluate" possible adverse effects.

USWA Pres. I. W. Abel said the merger proposal is of "grave concern" to the union and raises questions of "public policy on labor-management relationships which should be subjected to public hearing to determine the depth of the concern."

Abel, in a letter to FTC Chairman Paul Rand Dixon, said "the merger of a giant copper company and a giant coal company conjures up possibilities of financial manipulations, with the vitality of the communities and the lives of its residents as pawns in corporate power moves."

Threatens Communities

Mining communities, "unlike other industrial areas as a rule are completely dependent for their social and economic life upon the decisions of the mining coporations," Abel said. But "if these corporations become even more removed from the life of these communities through conglomerate mergers, it is doubtful that their security and stability will be taken into consideration when economic conglomerate mining decisions are being made in corporation headquarters far removed from the communities."

Questions involving industry-wide, company-wide or even coalition bargaining "pale into insignificance" in the face of conglomerate bargaining, Abel said. He added that if conglomerate merging of large corporations results in a "substantive change in the corporate system, it may well be that our labor policy will have to be revised."

Abel noted a current dispute over the application of present antitrust laws to conglomerate merging. The proposed Kennecott-Peabody merger "presents an excellent basis for a test case to obtain a definitive ruling from our courts," he said.

On conventional grounds, the USWA president declared, "there is sufficient evidence to indicate that the merger" is forbidden by current law as applied to "vertical" mergers like the one proposed.

He said Assistant U.S. Atty. Gen. Donald Turner, in charge of the antitrust division of the Justice Dept., recently indicated that new legislation may be needed to cope with new kinds of mergers. But Abel proposed that the "applicability of existing laws to conglomerate mergers should be tested in the courts" before a final determination of whether new legislation is necessary.

He expressed concern about the "extensive international structure" of Kennecott and its "influence upon the world market and the domestic price system." Further merging, he said, would only "add to this anti-competitive power."

'67 Contract Gains Averaged 5.6%

BLS cited a "significant" fourth quarter development—the award by a Presidential arbitration panel of wage hikes and vacation improvements for 137,000 members of six AFL-CIO shopcraft unions.

Settlements in manufacturing reached earlier in 1967 included those in the rubber industry, women's apparel, meatpacking and other food production, metalworking and petroleum refining.

Early settlements in nonmanufacturing included telephones and railroads, trucking and building construction.

TWU Achieves Pennsy Pact For 15,000

Philadelphia — The Transport Workers have reached a "best agreement ever" for some 15,000 members on the Pennsylvania Railroad, according to TWU Pres. Matthew Guinan.

The settlement, concluded in negotiations here, was submitted to the members for ratification, after being approved 36-4 by the presidents of TWU's locals on the railroad.

Voting by the locals is expected to be completed over the next two weeks.

The union said the agreement provides an 11 percent across-the-board wage increase for its shopmen members, with 6 percent retroactive to Jan. 1, 1967, and 5 percent to be effective July 1, 1968.

In addition, mechanics and stationary engineers will receive an extra 20 cents an hour skill pay to be granted in four five-cent increments, effective last April 1, last Oct. 1, April 1, 1968, and Oct. 1, 1968.

TWU Vice Pres. Eugene Attreed, who heads the union's rail membership, estimated that the increases will range from 41 to 61 cents an hour on wages currently averaging between $3.10 and $3.19 an hour.

The agreement also includes a three-week vacation for employes with 10 years seniority. This is down from 15 years under TWU's previous agreement. The pact may be reopened Sept. 1, 1968.

Arkansas Labor Joins Jury Bias Challenge

Helena, Ark.—All wage earners, white as well as Negroes, are being discriminated against in the selection of Phillips County jurors, the Arkansas State AFL-CIO charged in federal court.

The state labor federation and eight members of two affiliated unions filed as intervenors in a suit aimed at ending alleged discrimination against Negroes by the commissioners who draw up the jury list for the Phillips County Circuit Court.

The State AFL-CIO asked that its complaint be joined to a suit filed on behalf of a group of Negro residents of the county.

It charged that there has been "a deliberate and systematic exclusion, steeped in custom, practice and usage," of ordinary workers from the county juror list.

The AFL-CIO complaint asked that all current jury lists be scrapped and a new list be drawn up that will be "truly representative" of the population of the county, including wage-earners.

All eight individuals named in the AFL-CIO motion to intervene are lifelong or longtime residents and taxpayers of Phillips County but have never been called for jury duty.

State AFL-CIO Pres. J. Bill Becker said the suit was filed as a challenge to the so-called "blue ribbon" method of selecting jurors. He said random selection, representative of all segments of the population, is the only fair and non-discriminatory method.

Despite New Votes:

High Court Upholds L-G Election Suits

The secretary of labor's power to upset union elections that he finds in violation of the Landrum-Griffin Act has been significantly broadened by two related Supreme Court decisions.

In both cases new elections had been held by the unions involved while the secretary of labor's suits to void the original elections were pending in court. No union members had challenged the procedure or results of the second elections.

Two federal appellate courts ruled that the new, unchallenged elections made the Landrum-Griffin suits "moot"—a legal term meaning of academic interest only—and dismissed the cases. The government appealed.

Despite the appellate decisions and a brief supporting them submitted by the AFL-CIO, the Supreme Court ruled 8-0 in both cases that the election challenges were still alive. It said that if the lower courts find the original complaint justified, the secretary of labor may disregard the second election and order a new vote under government supervision.

The Supreme Court decisions, written by Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., cited two chief reasons for ignoring the intervening unchallenged elections.

To assume that it would serve "no practical purpose" to continue the cases, Brennan wrote, "fails to consider the incumbents' possible influence on the new election."

And as to the failure of any member to complain about the second election, Brennan said that Congress in passing the Landrum-Griffin Act "emphatically asserted a vital public interest in assuring free and democratic union elections that transcends the narrower interest" of complaining members.

The cases returned to the trial court for consideration of the secretary of labor's suits on the merits involve 1963 elections held by Local 153 of the Glass Bottle Blowers at Washington, Pa., and Local 125 of the Laborers at Youngstown, O.

In the Local 153 case, the Labor Dept. contended that a requirement that candidates for office have attended 75 percent of union meetings over a two-year period was unduly restrictive. In the Laborers case, the government claimed that some members who were behind on their dues were permitted to vote in violation of the union's constitution.

The AFL-CIO had stressed in its brief that the legislative history of the Landrum-Griffin Act indicates that Congress recognized that "government intervention in internal union affairs should be kept to the minimum."

An issue in the Laborers case was whether the Labor Dept. had the power to seek a new election for all union offices, even though the complaint filed with it only dealt with a runoff election for business agent.

The Supreme Court held that it did, declaring that Congress had given the secretary of labor "broad investigative powers" in the "public interest."

Backpay Order Held Binding on New Owner

Cincinnati, O.—The 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals here has upheld a National Labor Relations Board order directing a company to assume its predecessor's backpay obligation if the latter fails to pay laid-off employes and to bargain with the employes' union.

The case involves Makela Welding, Inc., as predecessor and Kemp Welding, Inc., as successor. Makela was a metal fabricating firm in Baraga, Mich., on the Upper Peninsula, whose general manager bought the business in 1965 and operated it as Kemp Welding.

Before the sale, the general manager handled hiring, firing, work scheduling and bidding on jobs for Makela and owned 10 percent of the business. When the employes asked for a wage increase and then called a strike he fired 18 of them July 10, 1965. Twelve days later he terminated 29 others with a notice that the assets of Makela had been sold to Kemp Welding.

The court noted that Kemp began business by hiring former Makela employes and paying them higher rates. When the Auto Workers asked for recognition and bargaining, Kemp refused. The company disputed the union's claim of a majority and claimed also that authorization cards signed by employes while they worked for Makela were not binding on Kemp.

The NLRB held Makela guilty of illegal refusal to bargain with the UAW, firing employes and threatening reprisals. It found Kemp in violation for refusing to bargain, raising wages without bargaining, and quizzing job applicants about their union sympathies.

The 6th Circuit said the board was right on all counts, including the duty of the successor to assume the backpay, but it modified the duration of the backpay period.

The court pointed out that Kemp's business operation is essentially the same as Makela's. Kemp uses Makela's former plant and equipment and fills orders for Makela's principal customer. Kemp has assumed Makela's accounts receivable, and hired the majority of the predecessor firm's employes.

Although the sale of Makela resulted in a substantially complete change of ownership and the NLRB correctly ruled that the sale was bona fide, the court concluded that, on the facts in this one case, "the purposes of the Act will best be served by enforcing the order of the board" on backpay liability if Makela does not pay the lost wages.

Chicago Labor Gets Last UHF Channel

Chicago — The Chicago AFL-CIO, which owns and operates radio station WCFL, has been granted a construction permit for WCFL-TV to operate on channel 38 of the ultra high frequency television band.

The Federal Communication Commission's board of review ruled 2-1 in favor of the application.

Labor March Protests Hearst Strikebreakers

out or refused to cross picket lines.

In San Francisco, an echo of the dispute kept both Hearst's afternoon Examiner and the independent morning Chronicle shut down as result of a strike by ITU Mailers Local 18.

Wages, automation and manning were the major issues in both cities.

One AFL-CIO drive in support of striking and locked-out members ranged to over 700 central labor councils urging a "do not patronize" campaign against Hearst newspapers and 14 magazines, including Cosmopolitan, Good Housekeeping and Popular Mechanics.

The newspaper unions also launched a vast mail campaign asking the public to send cards or letters to congressmen and senators demanding an anti-trust investigation of the billion-dollar chain.

"This hush-hush family-owned corporate giant should be brought to the table of public scrutiny," the appeal said.

At midweek, state and federal mediators resumed negotiations.

Los Angeles County AFL-CIO delegates authorized an early "summit conference" of union leaders in the area to mobilize an intensive effort on strikebreaker legislation.

Sigmund Arywitz, county AFL-CIO executive secretary, said the Hearst use of strikebreakers posed the "greatest challenge in history" to the growing Los Angeles labor movement.

"This fight is the responsibility of the entire labor movement," he declared. "We must show Hearst that, powerful as he may be, he is not powerful enough to lick the labor movement of Los Angeles."

Robert J. Rupert, chief ANG negotiator in Los Angeles, told federation delegates the "Hearst-forced strike" had been planned a year ahead by management.

"All we are seeking to do in Los Angeles is catch up on wages and conditions now in effect not only in major cities but in smaller, neighboring cities," Rupert said.

ANG members struck when Hearst management refused to match a $34 per week wage hike granted over a 30-month period at the smaller Long Beach Independent-Press Telegram. Hearst offered $13 a week for two years.

2,000 DEMONSTRATORS representing 60 international unions joined striking newspaper union members to protest the use of professional strikebreakers by Hearst's Los Angeles Herald-Examiner. The march took place Jan. 12 and covered a two-mile route from the newspaper building to Los Angeles City Hall.

420,000 Affected:

CWA Sets Goals For Bell Reopening

The Communications Workers have made a "substantial general wage increase" for 420,000 workers their major goal in a nine-month series of negotiations that get under way Feb. 10 with the Bell Telephone system's Western Electric Co.

The union's 67-member wage policy committee directed CWA negotiators to seek a wage increase tied to rising profits and increasing productivity. The committee also called for replacement of "merit wage" systems with an "acceptable" wage plan, tightening up of wage differentials within bargaining units, establishment of new job titles with upgraded workers getting at least $10 a week above present top craft rates.

Other goals include a 10 percent night differential for any work between 6 p.m. and 7 a.m., time-and-a-half pay for Saturday work, double time for Sundays and holidays in addition to holiday pay; all overtime at double time, weekly salaries for all hourly rated workers, and no lowering of present contract standards in any area.

All issues involving wages are reopenable this year under master contracts reached in 1966 and 1967 with Bell System companies. The contracts still have 18 months to run, subject to the right to strike.

Free to Strike

CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne said the union would be free to strike Western Electric after Mar. 6 if no wage settlement is reached, and other Bell companies at varying dates thereafter. Besides Bell, the union has scheduled contract talks this year with the General Telephone system, Western Union, Intl. Telephone & Telegraph Corp., airlines, radio stations and others.

Beirne told newsmen the committee had not set a specific wage increase figure but that many local unions have asked for a $20 increase, and one wanted $65 a week to eliminate all inequities.

"Our demands stem from the knowledge we have that profits are at an all-time high, living costs are still rising, workers in other industries have been given substantial increases," Beirne declared.

Beirne said CWA's approach "fully recognizes our responsibilities as citizens" and is in tune with the economic philosophy that seeks to raise the workers' buying power.

The CWA committee said in a report that it has been 18 months since the union's last general wage increase. Since that time, agreements have been reached in three major areas: the Rubber Workers won wage hikes of 44.2 cents an hour over three years, the railroad shopcraft unions held out for 48.14 cents over a two-year period, the Auto Workers' settlement averaged 58.5 cents an hour for three years in wages alone.

'Best' Economics

These three settlements, the committee stated, are "the reasonable basis for opening negotiations in our industry and they reflect the best kind of economics . . ."

The committee noted new income records for Bell companies were announced Dec. 21, with net profits set at $2 billion. For the most recent three-month period, profits rose 7.5 percent. Last Jan. 7, a company spokesman predicted an increase in revenues for 1968—all testifying to the system's ability to "close the wage gap without any price increase," according to CWA.

The CWA executive board was directed to arrange for studies updating the Nathan report on telephone industry wages to provide for a "definite upward revision" of current weekly wage rates. The report, made for use in 1965 CWA negotiations by Robert R. Nathan Associates, Inc., led to a union proposal for four U.S. wage zones in place of the 106 "going rates" that once fragmented wages in the Bell system, CWA said.

1,000 Delegates to N.Y. Assembly Reflect Rising Consumer Strength

New York City—The increasing strength of consumers and their determination to secure honesty in the market-place were reflected in the turnout of more than 1,000 delegates to the second New York Consumer Assembly here.

They represented 59 trade union, cooperative and consumer group sponsors, as against 45 sponsoring organizations at the first assembly.

And they directed numerous questions to speakers at panel sessions covering money and credit, the housing shortage, insurance frauds, high food prices, and the soaring cost of medical care.

At the end of the one-day meeting, delegates adopted a resolution organizing the assembly on a permanent basis and affiliating it with the national Consumer Federation of America formed in Washington last year.

Harold Ostroff, chairman of the assembly and executive vice president of the United Housing Foundation, said the action will help give consumers "the strong voice they have so badly needed."

Ostroff also participated in the panel session on housing to explain the work of UHF, formed by unions and other groups to promote the development of cooperative housing for low and middle income families.

Dir. Boris Shishkin of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee served as chairman of that panel which included Simeon Golar, a member of the New York Housing Authority, and Edward Rutledge, executive director of the National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing.

Ralph Nader, author and safety critic, keynoted the meeting by calling for strong consumer self-protection and greater government activity in the consumer field. He emphasized the need for a strong federal truth-in-lending law that would include disclosure of revolving credit charges and for legislation to regulate practices of the insurance industry.

Jacob Clayman, administrative director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., was the major speaker at a luncheon session held in connection with the assembly.

Clayman, who is president of the CFA with which the New York group has affiliated, catalogued many of the present consumer complaints, such as high medical costs, concealed pricing schemes and hidden interest rates.

Strong consumer organizations are a prerequisite to eliminating "horrors" that plague American buyers, he said. Such organizations can "stimulate legislation and spread practical and meaningful consumer education," he suggested.

Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City Central Labor Council served as chairman of the luncheon, which honored consumer expert Sidney Margolius.

Margolius, a newspaper columnist and author of several books in the consumer field, was presented a plaque by the assembly for "distinguished service and dedication to the consumer movement."

Other speakers at the assembly included Assistant Sec. of Agriculture George L. Mehern; William S. Greenwalt, northeast regional legal services director of the Office of Economic Opportunity; New York City Health Commissioner Edward O'Rourke; New York Attorney Gen. Louis J. Lefkowitz and James Gollin, author of a book on insurance practices, "Pay Now—Die Later."

"AUTHOR, LECTURER and champion of consumer causes" was the description of Sidney Margolius (right) on a plaque presented to him by the New York Consumer Assembly. Making the presentation at a luncheon in New York City is Harold Ostroff, assembly chairman.

N.Y. Taxi Hike Cleared After 1-Day Stoppage

New York—The City Council approved an agreement between taxi fleet owners and the Lindsay Administration which will raise the cost of an average ride by about 25 cents and give taxi drivers an additional $15 a week and higher commissions.

Councilmen voted for the raise after 29,000 members of Taxi Drivers Local 3036 staged a one-day "protest demonstration" over the delay in effectuating the contract agreement approved by union members Nov. 27.

Contract improvements take effect when Mayor John V. Lindsay (R) signs the measure raising the cost of the average 2.4-mile ride from $1.05 to an estimated $1.32, starting probably on Jan. 22.

Under the agreed-on formula, taxi riders will pay the new meter rate of 45 cents for the first sixth of a mile instead of 35 cents for the first fifth. Each additional third of a mile will cost 10 cents instead of the present 5 cents for each additional fifth of a mile. The waiting-time charge will be 5 cents for each 60 seconds instead of the present 90 seconds.

The contract agreement reached by the drivers is the second since the AFL-CIO chartered the formerly unorganized drivers and garage workers. It will give drivers a $15 boost in the weekly pay plus commission increases of 1 percent a year over a three-year period, raising weekly commission rates to 50 percent of meter revenue from the present 47 percent.

The 50 percent rate will go only to full-time drivers of 10 years' service, with the last three at the same garage. Inside workers will get a 5 percent hike in each year of the three-year contract term.

Negotiations over the new fares dragged on so long that union members threatened to stop work until agreement was reached. Instead they stayed off the streets one day—Jan. 16—with the full support of 5,000 independent cab owners. Hardly a single taxi moved on that day, New York newspapers reported. AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Michael Mann called it a "remarkable demonstration" of solidarity.

AFL-CIO Central Labor Council Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., led union negotiators. City Investigation Commissioner Arnold G. Fraiman, who represented Lindsay in the rate talks, estimated that fleet owners would get an additional $11 million in income before taxes and interest. An owner spokesman said the raise was too low, but that owners will wait six months or a year before deciding whether to ask for more.

Seafarers Aid Farm Workers Grape Boycott

New York City—The Seafarers furnished the hospitality for 50 members of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee who arrived here to press the union's boycott of Giumarra grapes.

In addition to providing food for the UFWOC members, SIU gave them lodging at dormitory facilities adjacent to its international headquarters in Brooklyn.

The workers, who came here by bus and car, held the first of a series of planned demonstrations at the Hunt's Point Produce Market in the Bronx.

The demonstrations here, like those in other cities, are designed to tell the public about UFWOC's dispute at Giumarra Vineyard Corp. and urge shoppers not to buy its products —"grown and packed by strikebreakers."

The California firm—one of the nation's largest grape growers—has been struck for many months because it refuses to grant a union election despite a "show of cards" by 95 percent of its workers, UFWOC points out.

The union's boycott has the full support of the AFL-CIO and many of its affiliates are assisting in the campaign. Support here is coming from the New York City Central Labor Council.

The union's New York demonstrations are headed by UFWOC Vice Pres. Delores Huerta and Fred Ross, UFWOC director of organization.

The Issues in Copper

AS THE COPPER STRIKE enters its seventh month two major factors have emerged:

The solidarity and unity of the 26 unions underscored by the support of the entire labor movement.

The absolute refusal of the companies to engage in genuine good faith collective bargaining or to present their case for public scrutiny to a fact-finding board.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany stated the case for the 60,000 striking copper workers succinctly and clearly in a recent letter to Gov. Jack Williams of Arizona. Meany wrote in part:

In the first place, it is noteworthy that the wage and fringe benefits of copper workers have lagged far behind those in related industries. Moreover, the settlement the unions seek is very reasonable. Their demands, indeed, are modest compared with settlements reached in recent months in far less profitable industries.

What is more, it is not the unions that have sought this unfortunate strike. In fact, they voluntarily extended their old contracts beyond their expiration dates in a sincere effort to avoid it. Unfortunately, the companies refused to bargain in good faith six months ago and they have not been willing to engage in meaningful bargaining even to this day.

Furthermore, the restoration of local bargaining which you so strongly urge is precisely the kind of bargaining which has caused copper wages to lag so far behind. Of course the companies want to perpetuate this kind of bargaining anarchy—which pits one group of workers against another at each mine, mill and smelter—because it pays off for the companies so well. For the workers, however, this kind of enforced local bargaining with many unions has been a dirty game which the companies have played to their great advantage with a loaded deck for too many years.

The managers of the copper industry shout that the 26 unions that now have joined together to seek some measure of bargaining equity for the copper workers are trying to impose industry-wide bargaining. This just is not the truth. But the unions are seeking to establish company-wide bargaining and thereby the achievement of equal pay for equal work.

The problem now is to end this strike fairly and quickly. And, in my judgment, this surely can be accomplished by a decision by the copper companies to begin to bargain in good faith.

What is more, the American people have the right to know all of the facts about this costly strike and to obtain an objective view about how it can be settled fairly. Towards this end, Senators Mansfield and Metcalf of Montana have urged the President to establish a copper fact-finding board. The President referred this question to the Secretaries of Commerce, Labor and Defense and they, in turn, have urged serious and immediate consideration of the proposal by both sides.

The unions immediately accepted the proposal and pledged their full cooperation. If you have not already heard, all of the copper companies have rejected it.

It is my judgment that you particularly are in a strategic position to effectively help bring this unfortunate strike to an end. In the first place, you might beneficially urge the copper companies to genuinely engage in good faith collective bargaining. If this does not avail, you might urge them in good conscience to plead their case, as the unions would plead theirs, before a special fact-finding commission. Then, let the pitiless glare of national publicity reveal to the entire nation where justice in this controversy truly lies.

Unbreakable

Congressional Quarterly Analysis:

GOP Freshman Congressmen Embrace Conservative Line

ON ISSUES that range from the anti-poverty program to foreign aid to the national debt limit, most Republican members of the House consistently take a position that differs from the majority of Republican senators.

The senators are far more likely than the representatives to side with the Administration.

A special Congressional Quarterly study comparing selected 1967 House and Senate roll-call votes on major domestic and foreign issues showed that GOP senators consistently held a more liberal position than their colleagues in the House.

Differences between House and Senate Republicans were clearly reflected in the 1967 voting records of their freshman GOP members who were first elected to Congress in 1966. Analysis of the voting records of the 59 new House members and the five new GOP senators on major issues showed a pronounced tendency toward more conservative positions among representatives and relatively more liberal positions among senators.

In the wake of widespread urban riots in the summer of 1967, 11 Republican governors recommended 80 proposals for dealing with problems of the cities. Although the governors emphasized the need for more effective state action, they also endorsed increased federal aid for cities. Their position was directly in opposition to the stands of most GOP House members but corresponded to the position of a majority of Republican senators. The governors represented not only urban states but also such rural states as South Dakota and New Mexico.

Similarly, a number of Republican mayors in October urged Congress to continue or expand the anti-poverty program. Among these mayors were John V. Lindsay of New York, James M. Hewgley of Tulsa, Okla., A. V. Sorensen of Omaha, Neb., and George C. Whitmer of Des Moines, Ia.

Examination of key roll-call votes cast in 1967 by freshman Republican senators and representatives shows the same division, on a small scale, that exists between GOP senators and representatives generally. Four of the five new GOP senators elected in 1966 consistently lined up with the moderate to liberal elements of their party in the Senate, while only nine of the 59 House GOP freshmen did so.

A special analysis shows little agreement between the 59 new Republican representatives and the majority of Republican senators (both freshmen and veterans) on key domestic and foreign issues in 1967. Compared with the votes of all Republican senators and with the votes of freshman Republican senators only, the stand of most freshman Republican representatives on each domestic issue covered by the study was more conservative.

The split between new Republican senators and representatives on foreign aid issues also was apparent. Only 14 of the 59 new representatives voted for the foreign assistance authorization bill, while four of the five new senators (all except Hansen) supported the legislation.

On the Inter-American Development Bank bill 26 of the 59 House freshmen voted for passage. In the Senate, however, all Republican freshmen except Hansen favored the measure.

A COMPUTATION of the average ages of the freshman Republican representatives in the House revealed a correlation between the age and political position. As of Jan. 1, 1967, the average age of the nine GOP members classified as liberals was 41.0 years. The average age of the 29 members in the middle group was 44.4 years, while the 21 members in the conservative group averaged 45.8 years. Among the five freshman GOP senators, Sen. Hansen, the most conservative, also was the oldest (54). The other four new senators were in their 40s.

Comparison between the positions of freshman and non-freshman House Republicans showed that on some issues the freshmen were likely to be less conservative than their GOP colleagues who had served longer in the House. On the vote to kill the Teacher Corps, for example, 34 percent of the freshman members favored recommittal, compared to 56 percent of the veteran Republicans who did so.

A similar pattern emerged from the vote on the Elementary & Secondary Education Act amendments, where 73 percent of the freshman Republicans favored the bill on final passage, compared to 46 percent of the more senior Republicans.

On the food stamp issue, 44 percent of the freshmen favored passage, compared to 31 percent of the veteran Republicans.

The freshman-veteran split was not significant, however, on the model cities vote or on the anti-poverty bill passage vote.

Avoids Partisan Ties:

Vietnamese Labor Survives Two Decades of Turbulence

By Gene Klare

The author, editor of the Oregon Labor Press, has been on a tour of Viet Nam and Southeast Asia reporting developments.

PROBABLY what's most significant about South Vietnamese labor unions is their existence.

The union movement in that tormented Southeast Asian country is only 20 years old. In that time the developing nation has suffered from almost constant warfare, and from the buffetings of political, religious and social turmoil.

Labor has survived primarily because its leaders strived to keep unions free from the rupturing influences of partisan alliances in the topsy-turvy political atmosphere.

They've also tried to remain aloof from the parochialism of religion in a nation that is about 80 percent Buddhist and 20 percent Catholic, each with its own strident factionalisms.

Labor leaders eschewed partisan political activity because the young union movement could have suffered irremediable damage had it aligned itself with any of the politicians whose fortunes have spun up and down like yo-yoes.

For the most part, the unions have questioned the motives of the politicians, regarding them as more interested in nurturing their own selfish interests than in the welfare of the country.

Another influence causing labor to be nonpolitical was that the first governmental permission for formation of unions forbade them from political involvement. Labor has sought to avoid subversive Communist domination on the left and government control on the right.

As a result, some of the government leaders who've passed through the revolving door of power in the past 20 years have accused unions of being Communistic. Conversely, the Communist element, the Viet Cong, has tried to brand labor as a lackey of the government.

While staunchly anti-Communist, the labor movement has studiously avoided being used as a tool of government. Not only do unions operate in government-controlled areas, but they also try to function in districts dominated by the Viet Cong, which is Communist North Viet Nam's puppet organization in the South.

Generally, labor can be categorized as loyal opposition. Its leaders are loyal to the effort to defeat the North Vietnamese and the Viet Cong—but this does not prevent unionists from criticizing policies and actions of the South's government.

Although labor avoided politics in the first two decades of its existence, this year it began to flex its muscles politically. Labor felt, after 20 years of building, that it was strong enough to do so and that the country's political climate was stable enough. Like labor in other countries, it realized that activity in the legislative halls, not just at the bargaining table, is required to achieve a better life for the workers.

Labor stayed out of the recent presidential race, but it did endorse candidates for the Senate and House. In the Senate elections, labor fared exceptionally well. In the House it did poorly.

Having survived two perilous decades, the Vietnamese labor movement is in a position, now that the nation has a popularly elected administration and legislature, to push for the economic, land, political and social reforms that are a prerequisite if a permanent democracy is to be established.

In this respect, the role facing labor in South Viet Nam is not unlike that played by American unions in the evolvement of the U.S. democracy and in the achievement, through collective bargaining and legislative action, of the high standard of living enjoyed by U.S. workers.

WHAT GIVES Vietnamese trade unions their potential for being a force for democratic reform is that they constitute the largest non-governmental mass membership organization in the country. In a nation Balkanized by religious, ethnic, provincial and other class barriers the trade union movement is a force for national unity.

In speaking of the South Vietnamese labor movement, the reference is to the CVT, the Vietnamese Confederation of Labor. Its initials come from the French designation, Confederation Vietnamienne du Travail.

There are an estimated 450,000 union members among South Viet Nam's some 16 million people—a population approximately the same as that of New York State. The work force totals 5.5 million. Of the organized workers the CVT claims 90 percent, with the remaining 10 percent split among five other labor confederations.

It is the CVT that the AFL-CIO recognizes as being the true representative of organized labor in South Viet Nam. The CVT, oldest, largest and most prestigious of the confederations, had its genesis in the formation in 1947 of the Society for the Protection of Rights of Workers, which came into being in the French colonial period as a stepchild of the French labor movement.

In 1937, France extended the mother country's labor laws to its overseas territories. But the laws applied only to French nationals; Vietnamese were not allowed to organize unions until the 1950's.

In 1952, labor unions for Vietnamese workers were permitted and at that time the Society for the Protection of Rights of Workers became the Vietnamese Confederation of Christian Labor. The word Christian was dropped in 1964.

Full legal status for unions came in 1956 with adoption of the Constitution of the Republic of Viet Nam, following the departure of the French and the division of Viet Nam into a North and a South. (PAI.)

Follow-up to Meat Bill:

Strong Poultry Inspection Law Urged to Protect Consumers

AMERICANS ANNUALLY buy and eat a billion pounds of poultry products which have been poorly inspected or not inspected at all, a union spokesman charged.

The strong standards of the federal poultry inspection law must be extended to all the poultry products sold for American tables, said Arnold Mayer, legislative representative for the Meat Cutters. Such a measure, he said, will be high on organized labor's legislative agenda this year.

"We have not heard of a single state program that is as effective as the federal inspection program," Mayer declared, pointing out that "only five states even claim to have . . . mandatory poultry inspection." He made the statements on Labor News Conference, a public affairs interview heard Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. EST on the Mutual Radio Network.

Mayer said that last year's successful drive by unions, consumer groups and others for stronger safeguards of cleanliness and wholesomeness on intrastate production of red meat helped alert more of the public to consumer problems.

"Congress is much more receptive to consumer legislation now than in the past," he said.

MAYER SAID the Meat Cutters union has a two-fold reason for pressing for better poultry inspection. "We feel we have a responsibility here, because we called the whole poultry problem to the attention of the Congress and the public back in the late 40's and early 50's, a call which led to the 1957 Poultry Inspection Act.

In addition, he noted, "a plant that is clean for consumers is also clean for workers," and reduces infections and illnesses "that affect workers when a plant is in bad condition or when diseased poultry is being processed."

Reporters questioning Mayer were Nick Kotz, Washington correspondent for the Des Moines Register and the Minneapolis Tribune, and Robert Walters, consumer affairs reporter for the Washington Evening Star.

By Press Associates, Inc.

THERE HAVE BEEN impressive advances in social security under amendments passed in 1965, 1966 and 1967. In a memorandum to Pres. Johnson, Sec. John W. Gardner of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, summed up the gains.

In the last 30 months, Gardner says, a total of 1,883,000 additional people were added to the beneficiary rolls. Here's the way this number is broken down:

- Benefits for widows, aged 60-61, 121,000.
- Benefits to people aged 72 and older with limited amounts of social security coverage, 124,000.
- Benefits under broadened definitions of child, 20,000.
- Benefits for children aged 18-21 and in school, 406,000.
- Benefits for disabled under broadened definitions, 60,000.
- Benefits for blind under liberalized requirements, 7,000.
- Benefits for certain people aged 72 and older with no work (or very little work) under social security, 730,000.
- Increased benefits for certain people aged 72 and older with no work (or very little work) under social security, 70,000.
- Benefits for disabled widows and widowers aged 50 and older, 65,000.
- Benefits for workers disabled before age 31, and their dependents, 100,000.
- Benefits for dependents of women workers on basis of liberalized eligibility requirements, 180,000.

This, of course, is only one part of the story.

Under medicare, hospital protection was extended to 19 million citizens and supplementary medical insurance to 17.6 million persons 65 years and older.

To date, they have received $3.1 billion for inpatient and outpatient hospital services covering 5.3 million hospital admissions. In addition, $1.18 billion has been expended for physicians' bills and other medical services, $275 million for 400,000 admissions to skilled nursing homes and $40 million for services rendered by the 250,000 home health care plans.

During the three-year period, cash benefits to aged persons, widows, orphans and the disabled were increased on the average of 23 percent—over 7 percent in 1965 and 16 percent in 1967.

THE TOTAL annual cash benefits in social security in 1967 were $21.4 billion or $1.4 billion more than in 1966.

Monthly benefits are now going to 23.6 million persons—some 800,000 more than a year ago at this time.

The social security rolls now consist of almost 16 million retired workers and their dependents, more than 5.5 million widows and orphans and more than 2 million disabled workers and their wives and children.

The statistics thus show that social security is not exclusively the province of the elderly.

The average value of benefits under social security increased 35 percent over the last three years. This includes cash benefits of 23 percent and 12 percent for medicare.

This is not a negative record. It is one of positive accomplishment. But much more needs to be written into the law before social security provides the full measure of security that most of us envision.

This year, 1968, offers another opportunity—both in Congress and at the ballot box.

EXTENSION of the federal poultry inspection law will be high on organized labor's legislative agenda this year, Arnold Mayer (center), legislative representative for the Meat Cutters, said on Labor News Conference. Questioning him on the AFL-CIO public service program, aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. EST on Mutual radio, were Robert Walters (left) of the Washington Evening Star and Nick Kotz of the Des Moines Register and the Minneapolis Tribune.

How to Buy:

Larger Size Found Best Value In Most—But Not All—Products

By Sidney Margolius

YOU DO SAVE by buying larger sizes. On the average you can save 18 percent by buying the large or medium size of a food product instead of the small, and 10 percent more by buying the extra large, a new survey by this department finds.

In fact, the potential savings on some products are 50 percent and more. The true cost of foods in some of the small packages can surprise you if you figure out the cost per pound. The most expensive example, of the 51 items checked, is dry cereals packed in individual servings. These 10-package assortments have a true cost of approximately 80 cents a pound compared to about 40 cents a pound for a standard dry cereal like corn flakes in an eight-ounce box.

The saving on large sizes of household cleaners is smaller. In several instances, the extra large containers even cost as much or a little more than the small or medium-size containers of the same brands.

In both foods and cleaners, the survey found the highest relative prices for small sizes are among some of the nationally-advertised brands. These often appear to be priced out of proportion to a normal differential between a small and a large package, indicating that the national-brand packers and stores are getting an extra margin of profit on the increasingly widely-sold small containers.

There is less price disparity between the small and larger sizes of retailers' own brands—the so-called "private brands." For example, the small size of an advertised brand of beans cost 17 per cent more than a retailer's own brand. But in the large sizes the cost difference drops to about 6 per cent.

● Even for small families, the small sizes do not pay. You could "waste" up to a third of some of the larger sizes and still save over the extra-high prices of small containers. The real money-saving trick, of course, is to buy the larger sizes and then plan meals to use the extra quantity in different ways.

● If you must buy a small size, make sure to get the retailers' own brand to avoid a disproportionately high overcharge (in most cases).

While the biggest savings are on the medium sizes over the small, large families can make additional worthwhile savings by buying extra-large containers. These are not available on all brands but are found more often on the private brands.

WITH ALL the publicity for several years about the difficulty of comparing costs per ounce, the problem is much the same. The new packaging law may help a little in that respect. It will require that the contents be stated in total ounces. Thus, a container that used to say "1 pint 12 ounces," now in addition will have to say, "28 ounces." Some packages, such as bread, already do this. This can help you divide a little faster while standing in the aisle.

If you take the trouble to do so, you will make some illuminating discoveries. For example, you will be able to see that Mr. Clean costs 2.6 cents an ounce in the small size; 2.46 in the medium size, and 2.48 in the large. Top Job costs 2.6 in the 15-ounce size; 2.32 in the 1 pint, 12-ounce size; 2.43 in the 1 quart, 8-ounce size.

Procter & Gamble doesn't care which you buy; they make both. But P&G might prefer you buy the very big size rather than the medium, since they charge more per ounce for the very big.

Do divide. You really only have to do it once in a while since prices do not change every day. You'll discover some other revealing facts. For example, Pledge furniture wax in a seven-ounce can for 79 cents comes to $1.80 a pint (16 ounces), which is almost the price of whiskey.

Also watch the soap pads, especially the S.O.S. four-pad box which comes to 3.4 cents a pad compared to a little over 2 cents for some of the private brands in boxes of 10 or more. (But A & P's own brand, at this pricing at least, cost more per pad in the 18-pad box than in the 10.)

TREASURY AWARDS for aid to the U.S. Savings Bonds program are presented by William J. Tullar (left), labor representative in the bonds division, to Albert J. Zack, AFL-CIO public relations director, and Kenneth Fiester, secretary-treasurer of the Intl. Labor Press Assn. The two collaborated in preparing bond promotional material for the labor press.

Pamphlet Discusses High Cost of Dying

THE HIGH COST of dying has become of increasing concern to many people—bereaved families, clergymen, labor welfare directors, doctors. Some have found a way to arrange for appropriate, dignified funerals at a moderate cost.

How this can be done is outlined in Funeral Costs and Death Benefits, a new Public Affairs Pamphlet by Sidney Margolius, a leading expert on consumer problems. In this pamphlet Margolius discusses the pricing system for funerals, suggests how to keep costs modest, and summarizes the financial benefits that may be available to meet the expenses.

Criticism of high costs, Margolius points out, does not necessarily mean that funeral directors are making excessive profits. It is, in many instances, criticism of needlessly elaborate services and materials. Further, labor unions and welfare organizations are disturbed to find that "funeral costs have marched upward in close relationship to death benefits provided by employers and unions"—often leaving little if anything for remaining medical bills and other emergency expenses faced by the family.

One basic fact that may be unfamiliar to many people is that "the price of the entire funeral varies with the type of casket chosen, and a more expensive casket may lead to a disproportionate increase in the cost of many other items furnished." And even for those who may prefer the costlier arrangements, there are ways of keeping costs down. Margolius outlines four basic types of group efforts in that direction.

But even with individual, rather than group, arrangements, advance planning can help ease the strain and the expense of a funeral. Margolius points out that "it is helpful to have an understanding with your family about the arrangements you wish," and offers specific suggestions and cautions.

THE FINAL PAGES of Funeral Costs and Death Benefits offer guidance on veterans' benefits, Social Security, and other benefits for which the survivors may be eligible. "A will and funeral instructions are essential to save your family expense and time in settling your estate, to make sure your property is distributed as you want," and to make known your wishes in regard to services, interment, cremation, etc.

Also, Margolius stresses, keep "tideover" money—at least four weeks' living expenses—available, or know a source from which it can be borrowed until insurance and Social Security checks arrive.

In summary, Margolius shows that there is more freedom of choice of funeral services and goods (and, consequently, costs) than many people realize. His pamphlet is a simple, helpful guide to a difficult problem all families have to face.

Funeral Costs and Death Benefits is available for 25 cents from the Public Affairs Committee, 381 Park Avenue South, New York, N.Y. 10016.

From Soup to Nonsense:

'We' Can't Help Confusing You But 'They' Are Really to Blame

By Jane Goodsell

THE MOST TROUBLESOME words in the English language are not unpronounceable ones like foliaceous and deipnosophist nor unprintable ones like . . . well, you know.

Oh, those words may create a bit of a situation now and then, but not often enough to be a real problem. The peskiest words — the ones that cause the most misunderstanding, puzzlement and chaos—are innocuous little pronouns. Like "you," "we," "us," "they" and "them." These are the real troublemakers.

Take "we," for instance. It's a simple-to-spell, easy-to-pronounce little word which causes a vast amount of confusion. A letter arrives from Cousin Esther, saying, "We are flying West and will arrive on Flight 427 at 6:15 on October 29 . . ." We? Who's "we?" Cousin Esther and her husband, George? It might just as likely include their children (how many kids do they have, anyway?),

The dictionary definition of "we" is of no help in explaining what you want to know: how much food should you fix for "we?" Will it be be possible to get "we" into one car? How many hotel rooms should you reserve for "we?"

"You" is another pronoun which is flung around with frivolous abandon. "You" may be either singular or plural, and it's often impossible to know when it's which. A few weeks ago a friend telephoned to ask, "Can you play bridge Monday night?" I said that Monday would be fine, and arrived on the appointed night with my husband who had muttered all the way about having to go out on Monday night. We were greeted by a flustered hostess who exclaimed, "Why, Jim!" and then, remembering her manners, said that she was delighted to see him and urged him to come in for coffee and cake. That is if he didn't mind being the only man at a hen party.

It was a perfectly natural mistake (how was I to know that "you" meant me and not both of us?) and I do wish the etiquette experts would tackle this problem instead of fussing about irrelevancies like how to introduce a grand duke. If they'd be willing to accept "youse" as the plural of "you," it would help a lot.

"THEY" IS ANOTHER enigma, shrouded in mystery. Who are "they" anyway? Nobody knows them personally, but "they" are constantly quoted as the ultimate authority on everything. If "they" say the price of coffee is going up, everyone starts hoarding it. If "they" say hot baths are injurious to health, nobody questions their judgment.

"They" are quoted more often than Shakespeare, and "they" wield more power and influence than the U.S. Senate. But "they" are more elusive than the CIA.

I think it's high time that we (and by that I mean me and youse) make "they" stand up and be counted.

Job Training Success Earns IUE New Grant

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers have been granted a second Labor Dept. contract to recruit disadvantaged persons for on-the-job training in the electrical manufacturing industry.

Announcing the new pact to be funded under the Manpower Development & Training Act, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz had high praise for the IUE's accomplishments under a previous contract, granted in 1966.

The latest contract allocates $137,238 to IUE to seek out and help train 1,200 unemployed and underemployed workers in six states: Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Indiana.

About 70 percent of the trainees will be recruited from jobless ranks, with the remainder being persons working in low-paying, irregular and unstable jobs.

Employers participating in the program will receive funds from a $520,000 allotment to reimburse them for the cost of training, mainly for wages of instructors.

The average cost per trainee will be $547, the Labor Dept. said. Trainees will be placed immediately in on-the-job settings, earning an average starting wage of $2.25 an hour. More than 40 IUE locals will take part in the program.

1,300 Trained

Under the first contract, IUE sought out 1,300 trainees for such diverse occupations as machinists, armature welders, drill press operators and lens makers for cameras and projectors.

The program was initially conducted in Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, New York, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Louis, Indianapolis, Boston, Newark, N.J., and Springfield, Mass.

Later the program was extended to include four IUE districts, extending from Maine to Mississippi.

Wirtz said IUE's "buddy system" for training—seeking out trainees on house-to-house drives and assigning a union member to help each trainee—"produced spectacular results in our efforts to help those most in need."

Noting that there was only a 4 percent dropout rate among those recruited, he said, "This extremely high rate of completion is especially commendable in view of the fact that the majority of persons being helped are from the ranks of the poor."

The Labor Dept. also pointed out that 80 percent of the trainees came from the disadvantaged jobless and more than 53 percent were Negroes.

It cited two examples of the first contract's "impressive progress in breaking down racial job barriers":

One company had never employed a Negro worker in its production occupations prior to the contract. In six months, it had 59 Negroes, all in jobs paying a minimum of $2.75 an hour.

A second firm, in the South, never had more than three or four Negroes employed at any time prior to the training program. It now has 76 Negro employes.

Railroad Pact Gives 6% Hike To Dispatchers

Chicago—Train dispatchers will receive pay increases of more than $75 a month under an agreement negotiated here between the nation's railroads and the Train Dispatchers Association, ATDA Pres. R. C. Coutts announced.

He said the agreement provides a 6 percent wage increase, retroactive to Jan. 1, 1967, another 4.3 percent boost, effective Jan. 1, 1968, and three weeks paid vacation to 10-year dispatchers. Formerly, this benefit went only to 15-year dispatchers.

Since the new vacation benefit is retroactive to Jan. 1, 1967, the extra week for those eligible last year will be granted as backpay, Coutts said.

The agreement was described by Coutts as "very significant in that it provides for a substantial correction in long-existing wage inequities" due train dispatchers in recognition of skills and responsibiltiies.

The agreement was made with the railroads' national negotiating committee, headed by John P. Hiltz, Jr., in bargaining sessions aided by Francis A. O'Neill, Jr., a member of the National Mediation Board.

The pact settles a dispute dating back to notices served by ATDA on Sept. 1, 1966. Under its terms, new wages notices may be served by the union on or after Mar. 1, 1968, to become effective July 1, 1968.

Church Leaders Back Fair Housing Test Case

Leaders of the Protestant and Roman Catholic faiths in the United States have urged the Supreme Court to outlaw racial discrimination in the sale of private homes by large housing developers.

The National Council of Churches filed a friend-of-the-court brief supporting the appeal of a St. Louis couple, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Lee Jones, who say they were denied the right to buy a home in a suburban subdivision because Jones is a Negro.

In Chicago, the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice announced that the conference and 24 Catholic bishops would file a similar brief in the case.

Other supporting briefs have been filed by the Justice Dept., the National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, and the American Jewish Congress.

The Jones appeal is the first open housing case to be heard by the Supreme Court. The couple argues that the right to buy a house without being subjected to racial discrimination is guaranteed by the 14th Amendment to the Constitution and also by an 1866 civil rights law giving freed slaves the same right as white persons to buy and sell property.

The 8th Circuit Court of Appeals, however, ruled that neither the Constitution nor the 1866 law offer any protection against discrimination in private housing transactions.

The Council of Churches brief said that such rulings "provide an open door for enclaves in our American society of vast quasi-municipalities built on the exploitation of racism and discrimination for profit."

The brief charged that the developers, "for no personal or social reason of their own, but in order to profit from racism . . . have openly decreed that their community shall be exploited for whites only."

The Catholic announcement listed among the bishops joining in the brief Patrick Cardinal O'Boyle of Washington, Lawrence Cardinal Sheehan of Baltimore, and Archbishop John J. Maguire, administrator of the Archdiocese of New York.

Besides citing constitutional safeguards, their brief refers to encyclicals of Pope John XXIII and Vatican Council documents in declaring the right to buy a home without encountering racial discrimination to be a moral and human right as well as a legal right.

Racial discrimination in housing, the brief declares, is a "badge of slavery" and as such is outlawed by the 13th Amendment.

"The great bulk of this discrimination in the United States," it asserts, "has had no other origin than an origin in the institution of slavery . . ."

Regional Director Heymanns Retires

Milwaukee—Charles Heymanns, veteran labor organizer, has retired after 35 years of service to Wisconsin unions.

Heymanns stepped down at 66 as director of AFL-CIO Region 12. The region was combined with Michigan to make the new Region 11, headed by Regional Dir. John F. Schreier, Detroit. Frank Cronin remains here as assistant director.

Heymanns went to work in 1922 at the Kohler Co. plant in Sheboygan, Wis. He helped organize the first union in 1933, was laid off soon afterwards, and played a major role in the first strike of the Auto Workers from 1934-41. He became an organizer for the former AFL in 1945.

Priority Urged For Upgrading Ghetto Schools

Columbus, O.—Quality, education for Negro youngsters can't wait on the breakdown of segregated housing patterns, AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis warned.

He stressed that the AFL-CIO has "never swerved" in its commitment to integrated schools and a breakdown of racial barriers in every area. At the same time, he urged, "we cannot, must not sacrifice" youngsters locked in ghetto schools. "They too must be exposed to quality education."

Davis, keynote speaker at the recent Ohio State AFL-CIO Conference on Civil Rights, said the exodus of affluent white families from the cities makes it essential that the federal government assume a larger share of the cost of education.

Those left behind in the cities "pay little in taxes because they earn little while their need is greater for the special services required to close the economic, education and cultural gaps," Davis said.

Distrust and difficulty in communication are major barriers to continued progress, Davis noted, both between the white and Negro communities and between an older and younger generation.

Unions, he urged, should gear their labor education and leadership training programs to encourage the participation of non-white and younger workers "to assure the viability of the trade union movement."

BSEIU Training Imparts Pride as Well as Skills

Custodial workers in the Washington, D. C. area are acquiring new skills and better paying jobs through a highly successful training program conducted by Building Service Employes Locals 82 and 536.

Furthermore, the graduates take on a sense of belonging—a "hold your head high" feeling, according to a Health, Education & Welfare Dept. report on the project which begins its second year in February.

Trainees in the project are disadvantaged, unemployed or underemployed workers, preferably heads of households. They receive $44 a week during training, plus $5 a week for each dependent, up to six.

The Manpower Development & Training project is financed with funds from the Labor Dept. and the U.S. Office of Education. To date, 256 persons have graduated from one of the project's 13-week courses.

The dropout rate for the courses has been "amazingly low" and the placement rate for graduates "amazingly high," HEW observed.

Its report, which included interviews with graduates, told how workers are trained in using the latest cleaning equipment and up-to-date building service techniques and learn to make repairs on faucets, pipes and electrical outlets.

Group Sessions

In addition, weekly lectures and group discussions are held on a wide range of subjects—consumer education, Negro history, foreign policy, proper work attitudes and work habits.

Trainees also take "field trips" to churches, schools and non-profit institutions where they get practical on-the-job experience.

Bulletin boards at the project's headquarters contain "thank-you" letters from many of the institutions where students have trained, HEW said, "and most of these organizations say their buildings have never been so clean."

Michael Nash, the project's director, attributed its success to the "feeling of professionalism" given to trainees. "We have upgraded a downgraded field—given pride to service occupations," he said.

FDA Sets Label Rules For Drugs, Cosmetics

The drug store should be less confusing for consumers after next July 1 when new government regulations covering labeling of drugs, cosmetics and medical devices go into effect.

The Food & Drug Administration, which last year issued its regulations on food labeling, has now published regulations for the drug and cosmetic field.

The FDA noting that food labeling regulations were allowed to go into effect without the delaying tactic of public hearings, expect the same kind of eventual acceptance from the drug and cosmetic industry.

Industry objections to proposed food packaging changes were extensive at first, but died down after discussions with FDA resulted in some compromises and allowances for peculiar problems of certain industries.

There are currently several individual applications for exemptions from specific regulations but no court cases are pending.

The latest regulations require over-the-counter drugs to be clearly labeled with not only the active ingredients in a product, but with information that shows what some of these ingredients are supposed to accomplish.

"Chemical names alone generally are not meaningful to the ordinary consumer," says FDA. Instead, consumers will be told if the ingredient is a "decongestant" or "pain reliever."

Required information, as in food labeling, must be stated in clear, easy-to-read type on the principal display panel of the package. The label must contain the name and place of business of the manufacturer, packer or distributor and companies that persist in packaging fractional quantities of products must state the fractions in the lowest terms.

Contents Rule

When stating the net contents of a package, the manufacturer will be required to give the strength of each drug in the package, for example: "100 tablets, 5 grains each."

Medical devices have to be descriptively and clearly labeled also so that adhesive tape, for example, will have to state the length of the contents along with the width of the tape.

Strictly prohibited are qualifying terms such as "giant pint" and full quart" along with all other terms which tend to exaggerate the contents or size of the package.

The new regulations are subject to industry objections for the next thirty days.

17,200 Given Construction Job Training

Federally financed training programs with union cooperation have given a start in construction employment to more than 17,200 persons, mostly unemployed, over the past five years, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz has announced.

Wirtz said more than $11.2 million was allocated for the programs, chiefly apprentice-entry, under the on-the-job training provisions of the Manpower Development & Training Act. Average cost per trainee over the period was $651, he reported.

He said the construction trades OJT program was concentrated in five major groups and that four AFL-CIO unions carried the brunt of the training: the Carpenters, Operating Engineers, Bricklayers and Laborers. Together they accounted for 94 percent of the OJT-MDTA construction training, the secretary's report showed.

Calogero Taibi Dies, SIU Research Chief

New York—Calogero (Charles) Taibi, 40, Seafarers' research director, died Jan. 4 at Doctors Hospital, Manhattan. He had also served as research director for the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. for the past year.

A specialist in labor economics and research, Taibi had formerly been executive director for State, County & Municipal Employes District Council 37 here and had also served as research and publications director for the Furniture Workers.

Grass-Roots Effort:

Vital Election Role Faces Local Labor

Champaign, Ill.—Labor's stake in the outcome of the 1968 election was a dominant theme of the 19th annual Illinois AFL-CIO central labor union conference here.

Some 140 union leaders attending the meeting at the University of Illinois heard speakers stress the need for electing liberals to Congress and the state's general assembly.

Stanton Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator of state and local central bodies, noted that the community labor units will play a vital role in the election, shouldering much of labor's grass-roots efforts to elect liberals and defeat reactionary candidates.

The election "will be a time of testing," he warned, noting that the U.S. Chamber of Commerce is already stepping up its drive to win passage of anti-labor legislation at state and federal levels and will go all-out if conservatives win the election.

Political action and education, Smith said, are among the primary responsibilities of central bodies along with securing progressive legislation and support of community programs.

Delegates to the conference were given a "preview" of a measure which the state federation will press in the general assembly to guarantee collective bargaining rights for public employes.

Lester Asher, chief counsel for the Illinois AFL-CIO, said representatives of public employe unions will meet soon to discuss the initial draft and propose changes they feel may be needed.

Martin Wagner, chairman of the Governor's Commission on Labor-Management Relations in Public Employment, said it is clear that if strikes by public employes are banned the government must provide fair procedures for settling disputes.

The general assembly turned down a bill to guarantee union rights for public employes at its 1967 session, and State AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Robert G. Gibson warned that passage of a new public employe bargaining bill, or any progressive measure, will require the election of a liberal general assembly.

In another area, Stanley L. Johnson, State AFL-CIO executive vice president, called on central bodies and unions to work for defeat of a call for a state constitutional convention that will be on the Nov. 5 ballot.

Opposition Explained

He said the federation is opposing the move because its chief supporters have already indicated they intend to write a narrow, rigid constitution with little or no regard for the rights of unions and workers.

Gus Tyler, assistant president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, spoke on the importance of educational programs directed toward younger workers in the labor movement, noting that particularly in the service trades and public employment, they make up an increasing percentage of the labor force.

"These young people will discover that unions can and will help them deal with their problems and the future of labor depends on what it does to 'teach the faith' to young members," Tyler said.

Lack of Progress Cited In Filling Housing Needs

Unions and their members "are in the forefront of the battles" being waged to bring adequate shelter to millions of poor American families who do not have it, an article in the 1967 Housing Year book observes.

Labor engages in these struggles, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan points out in the article, because it realizes that the nation's unmet housing needs are a major factor in the crisis facing our cities.

Concern over the failure of public and private housing to keep up with population requirements is stressed by Keenan, who is secretary of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. He is chairman of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee and serves on the board of directors of the National Housing Conference, publisher of the yearbook.

He notes that back in 1960, almost one out of every five dwellings in the U.S., or a total of 11.4 million dwelling units, was rated "dilapidated or deteriorated" and there is little evidence of any improvement in this situation.

The last careful estimate of the minimum need for new housing construction, made by the AFL-CIO and generally agreed upon by housing authorities, was set at 2.5 million units a year, Kennan says.

Yet, he adds, housing construction "has been limping" at only about 60 percent of this minimum need for several years and most new housing continues to be tailored for families and individuals with higher than average incomes.

Compounding the overall shortage of low-cost housing, he writes, are added problems of increasing obsolesence of existing housing, a shortage of community facilities, "suburban sprawl" and vast slums in the central city.

Not only are unions continuing to press federal and state governments for legislation "to build and rebuild America," they are "marshaling their own resources" to help the nation solve its housing problem, Keenan observes.

He cites programs whereby unions commit pension and welfare plan resources toward financing moderate and low-income housing and sponsor cooperative housing projects.

"A related fight which organized labor is waging," Keenan says, 'is the fight against discrimination in housing, a fight which it wages both in the legislative halls . . . and among the grass roots of the community."

Jobless Rates Hold In Major Centers

Nine of the nation's 150 major manpower areas have substantial unemployment—6 percent or more—this month, the Labor Dept. reported. The total is unchanged from December and also the same as it was in January 1967.

The only change reported by the department in all of its unemployment classifications between December and January was an increase of six in smaller areas having substantial joblessness.

Additions in this category are Butte and Anaconda, Mont., Columbia, La., North Adams, Mass., Lock Haven, Pa. and Carlsbad, N.M.

'The Hour Is Late':

City Coalition Asks Action by Congress

The Urban Coalition called on the new session of Congress to meet the "massive and urgent" needs of America's cities, warning that "the hour is late."

"No longer can this country tolerate the serious unemployment, housing deficiencies, educational disparities and urban decay," the coalition stressed.

Mayors, union and business leaders, clergymen and civil rights spokesmen formed the coalition last August in the wake of city rioting. Similar local coalitions have already been established in 27 cities. The co-chairmen of the national coalition are AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph and Andrew Heiskell, chairman of the board of Time, Inc.

The concern expressed by the national coalition was echoed at an eastern regional conference in New York, addressed by Mayor John V. Lindsay, AFL-CIO staff experts and local business leaders.

Declaring that the nation "has the capacity now to resolve its urban problems," the national coalition set as its legislative goals:

- Passage of open housing legislation.
- Steps to assure government-generated employment to every citizen able and willing to work but unable to find private employment.
- Passage of the Administration's proposed Safe Streets & Crime Control Act and Juvenile Delinquency Act amendments "so as to mount an efficient and effective attack on the root causes of violence, crime and delinquency coupled with the development of improved local law enforcement."
- A supplementary appropriation bill to provide full funding of anti-poverty programs.
- Expansion and adequate funds for programs for low and moderate income housing, model cities, mass transportation and community facilities.
- Repeal of "repressive" welfare program restrictions passed last year as part of the social security bill.

The coalition statement recognized that "these legislative aims are more easily stated than accomplished." But it stressed that "the nation can no longer ignore the intolerable conditions of life which cripple too many of our fellow citizens and induce the widespread discontent and disorder which have erupted year after year."

Worse Outbreaks

At the New York regional conference, Mayor Lindsay warned that unless "meaningful steps" are taken to meet urban problems, future outbreaks of rioting in the cities "can only be worse than those we have witnessed in the past."

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Ray Denison discussed the coalition's program in Congress and the importance of the 1968 elections. Julius Rothman, AFL-CIO coordinator of anti-poverty activities, Steelworkers Legislative Dir. Jack Sheehan, and Bayard Rustin, director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, were among the workshop participants.

James F. Oates, board chairman of the Equitable Life Assurance Society, called on the business community to demonstrate through financial investment its commitment to "cure the sickness" of the cities.

He said participation by all elements of the community "is what the urban coalition is all about."

FUNDS PROVIDED by the "impact" program of the AFL-CIO, which aids local projects of Latin American unions through the American Institute for Free Labor Development, helped complete construction of this consumer cooperative organized by a telephone company union in Belo Horizonte, Brazil. To date, 18 AIFLD projects in Brazil have been approved for "impact" funds.

Union Editor Is Sacramento Mayor

Sacramento, Calif. — The new major of California's capital city is the editor of its labor paper.

Richard Marriott, editor-manager of the Sacramento Valley Union Labor Bulletin, was the top vote getter in last November's municipal election. In accordance with tradition, he was selected as mayor by the city council.

tie up the nation's railroad transportation. Thus a union's economic power to back up its bargaining position is drastically weakened.

In other decisions affecting unions, the Supreme Court:

- Reversed a state court which had enjoined the Ladies' Garment Workers from picketing a manufacturer who had refused to go along with an agreement with the Florida Apparel Manufacturers' Association forbidding contracting of work to non-union shops.
- Ruled that the government exceeded its authority under a 1950 law designed to keep potential saboteurs off U.S. ships by an exhaustive inquiry into the political beliefs of an applicant for seamen's papers. In effect the decision scrapped the Coast Guard screening procedure for maritime licenses.
- Agreed to rule on whether a union was guilty of an unfair labor practice for expelling a member who brought an NLRB charge against the union without first exhausting internal union remedies. An appellate court had upheld the union, but the NLRB appealed to the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court also approved merger of the Pennsylvania and New York Central Railroads into the largest private rail system in the world. Rail unions have already negotiated a strong job security agreement to protect workers against loss of jobs or wages following merger.

Borden Heads Network Of Apprentice Centers

H. Robert Borden, who set up the first Apprenticeship Information Center for the U.S. Employment Service, has been named national director of the network of information centers created over the past four years.

Borden, a member of the Machinists, headed the pilot Washington, D.C., program which provided counseling and information to youngsters, schools and community organizations.

Job Training Plans Set by Labor Dept.

The Dept. of Labor announced plans to move 114,000 Americans off welfare rolls into training programs and jobs in the next 18 months under the Work Incentive Program authorized by the 1967 amendments to the Social Security Act.

The program, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz said, will be administered by the department's Manpower Administration through its Bureau of Work-Training Programs, the agency that operates the Neighborhood Youth Corps and other anti-poverty and manpower development programs.

Wirtz estimated that the Labor Dept. will have 32,000 men, women and out-of-school youths over 16 into training or jobs by June 30, the end of this fiscal year. In the 1969 fiscal year, an additional 82,000 could start training, he said.

Under present legislation the Labor Dept. will move about 757,000 welfare recipients into gainful employment by the end of fiscal 1972 at an investment of $841 million.

"This investment will pay great dividends in the future," Wirtz declared. "Not only will the cost of welfare be greatly decreased, the former recipients will become productive workers and taxpayers."

Welfare Families

Some 27 percent of the 1.2 million young persons enrolled in the Neighborhood Youth Corps in the past three years have been from welfare families, the Corps has reported.

Wirtz announced that the Labor Dept. will call on a variety of federal, state and local agencies to provide manpower services under the WIP program, including the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare and State Employment Service offices.

Local welfare agencies will be asked to refer clients to the program. They will be oriented, interviewed, tested and counseled for two to four weeks by the local manpower agency, which will place in available jobs those ready and able to work.

The remainder, Wirtz said, will be moved into work internship or work-experience programs, such as the Neighborhood Youth Corps or New Careers, or into institutional training or on-the-job programs authorized by the Manpower Development and Training Act of 1962.

During the latter period, trainees who need it will be given basic and remedial education. Then they may be placed in a permanent job at any time they are judged by the local manpower agency to be ready for employment.

The first aim of the program is to move WIP enrollees into regular employment or on-the-job training. As an incentive, the enrollee will be permitted to keep a sum equal to the amount of his welfare grant plus $30 and plus a third of the remainder of his wages. The remaining two thirds of his wages will be deducted from the welfare payment, the Labor Dept. said.

The department gave second priority to institutional or work-experience training, with trainees permitted to retain their public assistance grants, plus up to $30 a month as an incentive during training.

Third priority is for the Labor Dept. to enter into agreements with public agencies or private nonprofit organizations for special work projects to employ those found unsuitable for other training, and those for whom jobs in the regular economy cannot be found. Income under the latter program must equal at least the amount of the trainee's assistance grant, plus 20 percent of wages with the balance put into a fund to reimburse employers for a portion of their payroll costs.

Teachers' Pay Called 'Shockingly Inadequate'

Teacher salaries in U.S. public schools are "shockingly inadequate," according to a new pamphlet, Goals for Teachers' Salaries in Our Public Schools, issued by the Conference on Economic Progress.

The study, prepared by Economist Leon H. Keyserling, uses the Moderate Standard of Living Budget developed by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics for autumn of 1966 as a standard for comparison to reach these conclusions:

- The minimum salary for teachers in the 10 largest cities averaged $5,460 for the school year 1966-67. This was 41.9 percent below the $9,404 BLS estimated as the income needed by a four-person family for moderate living in metropolitan areas (50,000 population or more).
- In nonmetropolitan areas the BLS budget as of last February stood at $8,391 for a four-person family, with the teachers' minimum salary for U.S. public schools at large $5,362, or 36.1 percent below the stated requirement.

The study noted that when the increases won by striking New York City union teachers last September take full effect Mar. 1, 1969, the minimum salary will be $6,750, the mean or average salary $10,750, and the maximum $13,900. The minimum, Keyserling said, will still be 28.2 percent below the metropolitan area budget for a four-person family as of February 1967, without allowing for the "likelihood of a considerable increase" in living costs.

Of the plight of teachers in general, the economist said "teachers are the human element in what we pay for directly when we pay for education. These teachers are too few, are inadequately paid, and bear the strains which flow" from these causes.

The problem of deficient teachers' pay is not more important than other problems, but it is "relatively easy to measure" and to find solutions for if Americans have the will, Keyserling declared. He was chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers in the Truman Administration.

Sheehan Appointed To Red Cross Post

Hugh W. Sheehan has been appointed AFL-CIO Community Services liaison with the American Red Cross in the western area, AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis announced. He succeeds Joseph Rodell who has retired.

A native of Portland, Ore., and a graduate of Lewis & Clark University, Sheehan is a member of the State, County & Municipal Employes and has been serving it as an international representative.

He has been active in union and community affairs in both Oregon and California.

Union Blocks Dismissals of U.S. Employes

Huntsville, Ala.—A union's intervention brought a reprieve to 640 employes of the Marshall Space Flight Center here, who were handed dismissal or downgrading notices shortly before Christmas.

The American Federation of Government Employes brought a court case against the National Aeronautics & Space Administration. A federal judge in Washington, D.C., issued a temporary injunction barring the layoffs and downgradings a day before they were to have taken effect.

The union charged the agency with violating government rules by laying off civil service workers rather than private contract employes and with violating its contract with the AFGE by failing to consult with the union on the layoffs.

The judge said the pre-Christmas notices showed "a certain callousness" by the agency. He said the restraining order would remain in effect until employes exhaust all appeal rights and the Civil Service Commission resolves the legality of the private contracts.

President's Legislative Agenda Stresses Nation's Unmet Needs

sands of fathers and mothers who never completed grammar school who will see their children graduate from college."

But his stress was on the need to make it possible for all to share in the nation's abundance. Johnson talked to the American people of the persistent problems of unemployment, of violence in cities, poor housing, low pay for farm workers, rising health costs, pollution.

"We lived with conditions like these for many, many years," he said. "But much that we once accepted as inevitable, we now find absolutely intolerable."

Here is what the President asked Congress to do and the American people to support in major domestic areas:

JOBS—"This year, the time has come when we must get to those who are last in line—the hard-core unemployed—the hardest to reach."

There are an estimated 500,000 such persons, Johnson said, and the Administration's goal is to place them in private industry jobs within the next three years.

He proposed a $2.1 billion manpower program in the coming fiscal year, a 25 percent increase over this year. "Most of this increase will be used to start a new partnership between government and private industry to train and to hire the hard-core unemployed."

The President said there is no task "of more importance to us and to the country or to our future."

MODEL CITIES—Johnson reminded Congress that last year it had appropriated less than half of the $662 million he asked to help meet "the crisis in the cities of America."

This year, the President said, he is asking for $1 billion for the model cities program.

HOUSING — "Surely a nation that go to the moon can place a decent home within the reach of its families," Johnson said.

He said he will propose to Congress a 10-year program to build 6 million new housing units for low and middle-income families. Only 530,000 such units were built during the past 10 years, Johnson stressed.

For the first year of the program, the President proposed to "call together the resources of industry and labor to start building 300,000 housing units for low-and middle-income families . . . three times more than last year."

CHILD HEALTH—The United States, despite its vast resources, ranks only 15th among the nations of the world in "saving the lives of babies," Johnson noted.

To remedy this and to discover crippling defects in time for corrective action, he said he will propose "a child health program to provide, over the next five years, for families unable to afford it—access to health services from prenatal care of the mother through the child's first year."

CONSUMERS—The 90th Congress can earn a place in history by following through this year on the consumer record it made last year, the President said. He asked completion of action on truth-in-lending, gas pipeline safety and other pending consumer bills.

In addition, Johnson said, he will ask Congress for new safeguards to insure the quality of fish and poultry—as a follow-up to the 1967 meat inspection legislation.

He will call for new powers for the Federal Trade Commission to act against swindlers, for a major study of auto insurance and for protection against hazardous radiation from television sets.

Johnson announced that he will name a consumer counsel in the Justice Dept.—"a lawyer for the American consumer."

CRIME — The President reiterated his call for federal grants to help local police forces combat crime and said he now wants $100 million for this "critically needed" program, double last year's budget request. He called for a gun control law "to stop the trade in mail order murder." And he asked strengthening of the Drug Control Act "to provide stricter penalties for those who traffic in LSD and other dangerous drugs."

CIVIL RIGHTS—Johnson urged action on the pending civil rights bills—"fair jury trials, protection of federal rights, enforcement of equal employment opportunity ,and fair housing."

EDUCATION: "I shall recommend an Educational Opportunity Act to speed up our drive to break down the financial barriers that are separating our young people from college."

PROGRAM FUNDING—While economizing elsewhere, the President called for more money than Congress appropriated this year for the anti-poverty program and for anti-pollution efforts.

On the economy as a whole, Johnson predicted steady economic growth this year "if we are vigilant."

The chief danger, he warned, is spiraling prices and higher interest rates, resulting in "a slump in home building and a continued erosion of the American dollar."

Continued failure of Congress to act on a tax increase, the President declared, would be a "tragedy." He has asked only a temporary two-year tax rise, Johnson noted. "Congress can repeal it sooner if the need has passed," he said. "But Congress can never repeal inflation."

The President called on "the leaders of American business and the leaders of American labor" to "act responsibly, and in the nation's interest, by keeping increases in line with productivity. If our recognized leaders do not do that, they and those for whom they speak and all of us are going to suffer very serious consequences."

Johnson said his budget will call for $10 billion more in spending than the current fiscal year's budget. Virtually all the increase is in mandatory programs, including military spending and interest payments. While some domestic programs are increased "to meet the nation's most urgent needs," compensating cuts have been made "in very desirable but less urgent programs."

If the tax increase is approved by Congress, Johnson said, the budget deficit will be reduced to a manageable $8 billion. Without a tax rise, he said, it would be about $20 billion.

Congress gave the President a warm ovation as he entered the House chamber to carry out his constitutional duty to "give to the Congress information of the state of the union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient."

But then, as Johnson remarked wryly, "Congress always extends a very warm welcome to the President—as he comes in."

There was strong applause as the President affirmed America's determination to persevere in Viet Nam until an honorable peace can be achieved.

The applause was mostly from the liberal Democratic contingent as the President outlined his domestic programs. But Republicans—who have sought to make "crime in the streets" a major campaign issue—joined in vigorously to welcome the President's call for "safe streets" legislation.

Republican House and Senate leaders predictably reacted negatively, describing the speech as "political." Congressional Administration leaders praised it.

House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), who blocked action on a tax increase last year, refrained from comment. But House Appropriations Committee Chairman George H. Mahon (D-Tex.) predicted that the session will see a "repeat of the battle of the budget." Mahon, a fiscal conservative, said that "in all but the most imperative necessities, we ought to close our eyes to each and every increase requested over the present level."

Supreme Court to Rule On Wage Law Challenge

A challenge by 28 states to a section of the Fair Labor Standards Act will be argued before the Supreme Court this year.

The states are attacking the constitutionality of 1966 amendments to the wage-hour law extending coverage to employes of public schools and state-supported hospitals.

A three-judge federal court divided three ways on the issue.

The suit, initiated by Maryland and Texas, contends that state employment is not subject to federal regulation. It challenges both the minimum wage and overtime provisions of the law as applied to public employes.

The AFL-CIO and the State, County & Municipal Employes filed briefs before the federal court panel supporting the government's position that the law is constitutional. One judge held that it was, another ruled it unconstitutional, and the third found the minimum wage provision constitutional but questioned the overtime pay requirement. The court, however, delayed enforcement of the law until an appeal could be taken to the Supreme Court.

In other areas of general interest, the Supreme Court:

- Let stand lower court rulings upholding the constitutionality of a 1965 Massachusetts law aimed at eliminating racial imbalance in the state's public schools and declaring unconstitutional a 1962 Louisiana law that gave tuition grants to students attending private, segregated schools.
- Affirmed a finding by a three-judge federal court that the Texas anti-Communist loyalty oath for state employes is unconstitutional.
- Let stand a lower court decision upholding the power of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare to cut off federal welfare funds to Alabama because state officials had not agreed to eliminate racial discrimination in the welfare program.
- Affirmed the constitutionality of a court-ordered redistricting of Florida's congressional districts and the Massachusetts legislature's congressional redistricting law.

The court agreed to decide whether two southern school districts with "freedom of choice" plans must take affirmative action to reduce racial imbalance.

It agreed also to rule on the constitutonality of a Connecticut welfare regulation imposing a one-year residence requirement for aid to dependent children. It will consider a case involving evidence obtained by state police eavesdropping over a party line telephone. And it will hear a constitutional challenge to a New York law providing free text books to students in parochial schools.

Rail Pension Hike Approved By House Unit

Quick approval was given a bill to improve railroad retirement and unemployment insurance benefits in the first official action of the House Interstate Commerce Committee as the 90th Congress reconvened for its second session.

The bill is designed to give railroad employes "catch-up" coverage comparable to the recently enacted social security benefit improvements.

The goal is to enact the measure quickly enough to give retired rail workers the higher benefits at the same time social security beneficiaries receive their increases, effective Feb. 1.

Committee Chairman Harley O. Staggers, sponsor of the bill, said he intended to use "every means I can get to get this bill enacted very promptly." It has the support of both the railroad unions and the major carriers.

7.2 Million Workers to Get Minimum Wage Pay Hikes

Panel Seeks Fair Pact In Copper

By Eugene A. Kelly

The secretaries of Labor and Commerce have named a three-man panel to help achieve a fair settlement of the strike of 60,000 copper workers and urged labor and management to cooperate in finding a solution to the seven-month-old dispute.

The National Nonferrous Coordinating Committee representing 26 unions said "we welcome the opportunity to present our case and will cooperate fully."

Settlement of the strike against 11 companies in 23 states has been prolonged, the unions said, because of the refusal of industry leaders to engage in genuine collective bargaining on contract issues—wages, pensions, insurance and working conditions.

As the panel named by Labor Sec. Willard Wirtz and Commerce Sec. Alexander B. Trowbridge prepared to meet Jan. 26, two union agreements were reached with copper firms and two more unions authorized strike action.

Striking Steelworkers won a 96-cent package from the Copper Range Co. at White Pine, Mich., and 51 cents in wages alone, plus fringe benefits, from American Metal Climax, Inc., at Chicago and Cleveland, O. Both settlements surpassed any offer previously made by copper's Big Four companies, where the strike continues.

The panel includes Prof. George W. Taylor, Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania; Msgr. George G. Higgins, director of the Dept. of Social Action of the United States Catholic Conference, and

An Editorial by George Meany:

A Blow Against Poverty

The minimum wage is going up next Thursday, Feb. 1, for seven million American workers because the trade union movement did an effective political job in the 1964 elections.

It followed the 1964 electoral victory with a well-organized legislative campaign to secure sorely needed amendments to the wage-hour law. A year ago coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act was extended to 9.1 million workers and 4.5 million gained over $1 billion in new purchasing power.

This Feb. 1 over $2 billion in buying power will be added to the pocketbooks of seven million workers in terms of wage increases of 15 and 20 cents an hour.

The basic federal minimum wage will go up next Thursday to $1.60 an hour. Some eight million workers who were brought under wage-hour coverage a year earlier will now get $1.15, a 15-cent rise.

But there are still 11 million more who are not covered at all.

The impact of the minimum wage increases will amount to only one-half of one percent of the total paid in wages and salaries. But the real impact will be felt in the war on poverty.

Those whose pay will rise next Thursday are the working poor, who do useful jobs for wages that provide no more than a bare subsistence, and in some instances not

New $1.60 Floor Takes Effect Feb. 1

Over 7 million workers will receive wage increases of 15 or 20 cents an hour on Feb. 1 as changes in the federal minimum wage law voted by the 89th Congress go into effect.

The increase from $1.40 an hour to $1.60 an hour for those previously covered by the act and the hike from $1 to $1.15 for those covered for the first time by the 1966 amendments will result in over $2 billion added to worker purchasing power.

The changes in the minimum wage law effective next month will affect 7.2 million of the 42.5 million workers presently covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act. The bulk of those receiving wage increases will be those currently earning $1.40 an hour.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany tied the wage increase to labor's "effective political job in the 1964 elections" and a well-organized-legislative campaign by the AFL-CIO to secure the needed changes from Congress.

'Poor' Are Helped

In an editorial in this issue of the News, Meany declared that the "real impact" of the increase will be felt in the war on poverty, that those who will receive higher wages next month are the "working poor."

Meany concluded that the "outcome in November 1968 will decide whether there will be more victories, not only for the working poor but for all Americans."

The first increase under the 1966 amendments took place Feb. 1, 1967 when about 4.5 million workers gained over $1 billion in new purchasing power as the wage

President Asks Action On Rights

Pres. Johnson appealed to Congress and the nation not to let resentment against ghetto riots blind them to "the real grievances of all those who suffer discrimination."

He renewed — with a strong note of urgency — his call for legislation "essential for social justice and social progress" to:

- Strengthen federal criminal laws prohibiting violent interference with the exercise of civil rights.
- Give the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission the authority it needs to act against job discrimination.
- Assure that federal and state juries are selected without discrimination.
- Make equal opportunity in housing a reality for all Americans.

Labor Backs LBJ On Training Jobless

The AFL-CIO pledged its support to Pres. Johnson's $2.1 billion manpower program of job training for 500,000 hard-core unemployed while emphasizing the necessity for additional legislation to create one million public service jobs.

Federation Pres. George Meany said the measures proposed by the President in his manpower message to Congress "are a significant step in the expansion of employment opportunities for those who now suffer serious disadvantages in finding and holding jobs."

But we must not lose sight, Meany added, of the "inescapable proposition that the government must be the employer of last resort," and that until legislation is passed to provide the necessary public service jobs "the basic problem of chronic unemployment and poverty, not only in our cities, but our rural areas as well, will not be effectively solved."

Meany hailed the President's proposals to improve occupational safety and health programs as "long overdue," noting that the states have "failed miserably in this area," and that federal programs are "outdated, outmoded and almost unenforced."

The President spelled out in his message his proposal first an-

New Jersey Republicans Limit Jobless Benefits

Trenton, N.J.—New Jersey workers have found out the hard way what it means to lose an election.

Last spring, the first Democratic legislature in 52 years passed a model unemployment compensation law. It included a provision allowing workers to qualify for payments after six weeks on strike if the state labor commissioner certified that their union has bargained in good faith.

Last November, Republicans swept back into control of both houses of the legislature with veto-proof three-to-one majorities.

On Jan. 15, the Senate voted to repeal the section of the law allowing long-term strikers to qualify for unemployment benefits. They even went a step further and barred benefits to workers locked out of their jobs by management.

On Jan. 22, the lower House of the legislature did likewise.

All but one of the votes for repeal in both houses were cast by Republicans. The bill is now on the governor's desk.

AFRICA's free labor movement drew the attention of Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey during his recent nine-country tour of the continent. Accompanying him in talks with labor leaders there was Irving Brown, AFL-CIO international affairs specialist. Left, they are welcomed by Ethiopian Emperor Haile Selassie (right,) who has donated land for a workers' education center. Above, Humphrey and U.S. Ambassador Franklin Williams are greeted by school children in Ghana, where the vice president also visited with union members.

Humphrey Sees Hope, Dedication During Tour of African Nations

"Harambee"—meaning "let's all pull together"—is the rallying cry heard in developing Africa and its application is in evidence all across the continent, according to Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey.

"Never before have I seen a people so full of hope, so devoted to a common cause of independence, freedom and nation-building," Humphrey declared.

Humphrey's observations on Africa, its people, its problems and its needs—gathered during his recent 14-day, nine-nation tour of the continent—are contained in a special report for the labor press.

Combined with Humphrey's report was another from Irving Brown, AFL-CIO international affairs specialist, who accompanied the vice president along with representatives of business, education and government.

Brown helped set up the African-American Labor Center, formed in 1965 to aid African free trade unions through vocational training, workers' education and social projects. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany heads the AALC.

Brown told of meetings Humphrey had with trade unionists in Ivory Coast, Liberia, Ghana and other African nations.

Training workers in skills and vastly expanded education programs are two major needs if Africa is to succeed with its economic development programs, Humphrey reported.

Humphrey also said he found an "information gap" in Africa, with people there not getting reliable information on what is happening in America and American citizens receiving only scattered information on African developments.

"We need a continuous flow of articulate persons going to Africa to meet with college students and editors and acquaint them with what's going on in America," Humphrey said. "And we need to invite more African youth leaders to our country."

Brown said that Humphrey was warmly received by African labor leaders "as one who has carried on in government the trade union spirit of friendship and solidarity."

Vocational training, education, housing cooperatives and health benefits were among the subjects Humphrey discussed with African labor leaders. He described the talks as "positive and fruitful."

A major message carried by Humphrey to Africa was that democracy and free labor movement go hand-in-hand—one cannot exist without the other, Brown pointed out.

The "most significant" aspect of Humphrey's trip was to convince Africans that America is "sincerely interested" in their continent, Brown said, adding: "We must follow-up on this or his trip will have been wasted."

Senate Panel Approves Farm Labor Bargaining

A bill to extend protection of the National Labor Relations Act to farm workers has been approved by a Senate Labor subcommittee.

A similar measure was approved by a House Labor subcommittee in the first session of the 90th Congress and is awaiting action by the full House Labor Committee.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany testified before both subcommittees, strongly urging the legislation. The United Farm Workers Organizing Committee and a number of religious and civil rights organizations entered similar testimony.

Farm workers are currently excluded from the basic protection of the NLRA which establishes the right of workers to organize and participate in collective bargaining. Farm workers do not have any call on the National Labor Relations Board in setting up representation elections, filing unfair labor practices, etc.

The bill in the House is sponsored by Rep. James O'Hara (D-Mich.) and was approved by a subcommittee headed by Rep. Frank Thompson (D-N.J.). The Senate bill is sponsored by Sen. Harrison Williams (D-N.J.) and was approved by a subcommittee he heads.

The 1967 AFL-CIO convention adopted a resolution declaring that labor would "devote every possible effort to secure passage of federal and state legislation extending benefits and coverage to farm workers equal to other workers with special emphasis at this time on bills now in Congress which would extend the coverage of the National Labor Relations Act to agricultural workers."

Union Education Experiment:

Special Schools Set For Young Workers

Two pilot projects to foster greater involvement in trade unions by young workers have been scheduled by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

Walter G. Davis, director of the department, said the experimental schools will "set guidelines on the most productive method for achieving our goal of getting young union members to be active union members."

Five training institutes are scheduled in one project for young trade unionists from all unions.

The second program will consist of five regional sessions for apprentices from craft unions. This project is being co-sponsored by the AFL-CIO Building & Constructions Trades Dept. and the Metal Trades Dept. in cooperation with the Dept. of Education.

Classes in both programs will be limited to 30 students, Davis said. The students will be under 30 years old, he added, and in the case of the apprenticeship group, most will range in age between 16 and 26.

"The federation's objective is to get the young member to identify himself with his union and its activities," Davis added. "We will be offering the students an in-depth understanding of the trade union movement—why it exists, what its goals are now and in the future.

"While we will be teaching the students, we will also be learning from them," he said. "We hope they will provide us with an answer as to what techniques are the most productive in communicating with the young members."

Bridge Gap

Davis said labor needs to "bridge the gap between the anti-labor bias learned in many school systems and the obvious need for and benefits of unions in the world of work.

"We must learn what the attitude of the young worker is towards his union," he continued, "and in turn we must be able to transmit our concern for all workers — young and old — to them.

"This is necessary to assure the viability of the trade union movement," he said.

Davis emphasized that the students would be sought from a representative sampling of young members. Getting previously inactive members to the schools will be a primary objective, he said.

A follow-up study will be made to see if the students become active in their locals after the schooling.

Candidates for the schools will be selected through the sponsoring bodies in cooperation with the AFL-CIO education staff.

A committee of education directors of international unions is working with Davis and George T. Guernsey, assistant education director, to develop the general pilot school. They are Reese Hammond, Operating Engineers; Holgate Young, Communications Workers; James Noe, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Gus Tyler, Ladies' Garment Workers, and William Elkuss, Clothing Workers.

Otto Pragan of the department of education is working in cooperation with representatives of the Metal Trades Department and the Building & Construction Trades Department in programming the special conferences on "The Apprentice and His Union."

First Classes

The young worker institutes will open with a school from Feb. 11-16 in Atlanta, Ga. Others will be held at the University of Iowa, the University of Oklahoma, the Nationwide Inn in Columbus, Ohio, and the University of Maryland.

The first of the schools geared for apprentices will open March 28 in the LaSalle Hotel, Chicago. Final arrangements have not been completed for the other four schools.

Workers under 30 constitute 25 percent of the total trade union membership a recent poll indicated. And 25 percent of all trade union members have belonged to their union less than five years.

Experience gained in the pilot program will be shared with unions wishing to establish similar schools for their own members, Davis added.

Ross to Resign As Head of BLS

Commissioner of Labor Statistics Arthur M. Ross will resign his post July 1 to become a vice president at the University of Michigan and assistant to its president, Robben W. Flemming.

The 51-year-old economist has headed the Bureau of Labor Statistics since 1965, when he came to the Labor Dept. position from a professorship at the University of California at Berkeley.

He submitted his resignation in a letter sent to Pres. Johnson, who did not immediately name a successor.

Garment Union, AFL-CIO Aid Sicily Quake Victims

The Ladies' Garment Workers have contributed $50,000 for aid and relief to victims of the earthquake-stricken area of Sicily. The money, on behalf of the union, is being sent to Pres. Giuseppe Saragat of Italy.

The AFL-CIO has also made a contribution to the relief fund, Pres. George Meany announced. The federation's $1,000 check is being forwarded through the United Italian-American Labor Council.

The ILGWU contribution was authorized by the union's general board after hearing Vice Presidents Luigi Antonini and Howard Molisani describe some of the hardships and losses resulting from the quake, as reported to them in personal conversations.

"We are especially anxious to extend first aid to the victims of the earthquake in a part of Italy from which many of our Italian-speaking members have come and where they still have relatives," ILGWU Pres. Louis Stulberg declared.

"We understand there is desperate need for immediate help," he said, "and should such need continue we shall certainly consider extending further aid."

TWUA Renews Organizing:

Union Spurs Stevens Drive As 'Blanket of Fear' Dissolves

Charlotte, N. C.—A "blanket of fear" that has smothered J. P. Stevens & Co. for five long years is slowly lifting, union organizers and workers reinstated to their jobs reported here.

Testimony to a new surge of union interest came as Stevens' employes and union leaders gathered to pledge support for a renewed organizing drive at the textile chain's mills in North and South Carolina.

The catalyst for the transforformation, all agreed, was the recent U.S. Supreme Court decision which left stand a lower court order to Stevens to rehire 71 discharged workers with back pay.

They were the victims of a campaign in which Stevens "flagrantly, cynically and unlawfully" denied workers their rights in an effort to crush the Textile Workers Union of America, the court declared.

More recently, the same lower court ordered the rehiring with back pay of 17 additional workers who were fired during TWUA's organizing drive, going back to 1963.

Stevens' workers were enthusiastic and their voices were filled with pride as they described a new atmosphere in their workplaces:

"They're not afraid to take a leaflet," said one worker from Greenville, S. C. "They're ready to go all the way," said another from Slater, S.C. "We'll win this time at Rock Hill," said a third.

One rehired worker said, "When I walked back into the plant you'd think I was part owner of the place. They were real rosy."

The wife of a reinstated worker described the scene in a plant when a company supervisor assembled workers to read the court order reinstating fired employes:

"They stopped the machinery —it got very quiet . . . I could hear the people all around me buzzing — 'It's about that union leaflet.' 'Didn't think they would do it.' 'How about that?' They all looked at me when they mentioned my husband's name. I'll tell you—some of the terror just disappeared right then."

A lawyer from one of the mill towns, who had supported the union and came to the meeting, said, "The company won't be able to pick a jury soon. You can't throw a rock without hitting a union man."

TWUA Pres. William Pollock said the Supreme Court decision "has made it plain that every textile worker who exercises his right to join a union will be fully protected."

He predicted the company's employes "will resume their efforts to build a union and engage in collective bargaining, as they have every right to do."

The union is "gearing" for an all-out drive at Stevens — the nation's second largest textile chain —and will transfer staff organizers from other regions if they are needed, Pollock declared.

Although Pollock hailed the workers' court victories, he said the long, drawn-out battles point up the "glaring shortcomings and inequities" in the National Labor Relations Act.

Changes Needed

He called for a revision that would provide for immediate reinstatement of workers found by NLRB to have been unlawfully discharged so they can continue "to earn a living while the employer's appeal is being heard."

"Under such a provision," he added, "the Stevens workers in this hall wouldn't have had to wait four long years for justice."

Nicholas Zonarich, organizing director for the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., said that "interest in organization has reached a peak" in Stevens plants a a result of the Supreme Court decision. "There is now hope and spirit," he added.

Pollock appealed to other unions to assist TWUA's organizing drive and he immediately won assurances of support from the Steelworkers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and Ladies' Garment Workers.

FOOD DRIVE for Kenosha, Wis., copper strikers brought flood of canned goods to Steelworker headquarters there. The drive for food supplies, sponsored by the Kenosha AFL-CIO, will continue as long as necessary, Council Pres. Felix Olkives said. Left to right, Olkives; Armand Bellaver of USWA Local 9322, and Jasper Helton of Machinists Lodge 34. More than 1,000 Kenosha workers are on strike against the Anaconda American Brass plant.

Protest Grows Against Hearst Strikebreakers

Los Angeles—A team of state and federal mediators continued efforts to end the six-week strike-lockout at the Hearst-owned Los Angeles Herald-Examiner, the nation's largest afternoon daily.

They met with representatives of AFL-CIO newspaper unions and Hearst management. But lack of movement on the company side kept the dispute at almost dead center.

Los Angeles County AFL-CIO officials promptly stepped up programs on the consumer and advertising fronts, topped by a meeting of union leadership to mobilize a public attack against the use of strikebreakers in the Hearst plant.

The Los Angeles dispute has idled 2,000 members of nine AFL-CIO newspaper unions and caused circulation and advertising volume at the Herald-Examiner to tumble by about two-thirds.

In San Francisco, both Hearst's afternoon Examiner and the Independent Morning Chronicle have been shut down since Jan. 5 by a srtike of Mailers Local 18 members.

The disputes in both cities involve wages, manning and other production items and fringe benefits.

Hearst continued to operate the Herald-Examiner here largely with mechanical department strikebreakers imported from widely scattered sections of the U.S., including Hawaii.

In some cases, according to Typographical Union records, strikebreakers were receiving anywhere from $350 to $1,000 a week to keep the flagship of the nine-paper family-owned chain afloat.

The "complete and total support and solidarity of the entire labor movement" of Southern California was promised the striking and locked-out Hearst employes by Sigmund Arywitz, executive secretary of the Los Angeles County labor federation.

"This fight is our fight," Arywitz told a strike rally attended by nearly 1,000.

"If Hearst management is able to get away with beating this strike and breaking your unions then we will have seen the first step toward breaking the labor movement of this area—and we are not going to stand for it," he said.

The AFL-CIO scheduled a mass demonstration for Jan. 26, "the second installment" on the pledge of all-union solidarity in the war with Hearst. An earlier demonstration Jan. 12 attracted 2,000 trade unionists.

Unions on strike at the Herald-Examiner are Newspaper Guild Local 69 and Machinists Dist. 94.

Locked-out are ITU Local 174, Mailers Local 9, Web Pressmen Local 18, Paper Handlers Local 3 and Stereotypers Local 58.

Building Service Employees Local 399, Photoengravers Local 262, News Vendors Local 75-A and Teamsters Local 598 have refused to cross picket lines.

USWA Calls Convention on Strike Fund

Pittsburgh, Pa.—The Steelworkers notified 3,600 local unions in the United States, Canada and Puerto Rico to send delegates to a special convention Mar. 20 in Atlantic City to consider the establishment of a strike fund and a dues increase.

The union now has no strike fund, and has been aiding 50,000 members on strike since July 15 against the copper industry out of general income. Motnhly dues have been $5 per member since 1956.

Pres. I. W. Abel said the USWA executive board voted unanimously to recommend that the special convention consider establishing a defense fund and adjusting the dues schedule to operate the union on a sound basis.

The board, Abel said, will recommend a new dues schedule based on earnings, with the minimum remaining at $5 a month. A suggested formula will be announced later, he said.

Board members, meeting in Washington, agreed to recommend to the convention that the strike and defense fund be financed initially by raising the present dues $5 a month for April, May, June, July and August, and that on Sept. 1 the new dues structure will take effect permanently.

The special convention was authorized by earlier board action. Approximately 3,000 delegates will attend, the union said.

Unions to Present Case To 3-Man Copper Panel

George E. Reedy of the Struthers Wells Corp., former White House press secretary.

Early in January Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) asked Pres. Johnson to name a fact-finding board. Earlier Mansfield and Sen. Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.) urged both sides to testify at a public hearing. The unions agreed but the industry rejected the proposal.

Wirtz and Trowbridge said in announcing the panel appointments that they will "keep in close touch with the situation" and requested the panelists to report developments and advise on "whatever other action might be appropriate."

The Cabinet members named Under Sec. of Labor James J. Reynolds to work with the panel and asked the unions and the companies to give the panelists "every possible consideration so that the dispute may be brought to a prompt and equitable conclusion."

The two secretaries related that the current bargaining situation "offers no prospect of settlement within the near future." They said 95 percent of the nation's copper mines are closed and 80 percent of copper refining and fabricating facilities shut down by the strike, which started July 15 and has spread as contracts expire.

They agreed that "every reasonable effort has been made to encourage settlement" through the normal processes of free collective bargaining but said "unfortunately it has not worked."

Their statement said the strike is "creating severe economic hardship; resulting in a serious increase of government contract costs; adversely affecting our international trade situation . . . and seriously thwarting our efforts to reduce our adverse balance of payments."

"The national interest will not permit the continuation of this situation," the secretaries said. "The effect of this strike on the industry, the employes and the nation's domestic and international position warrant a prompt resolution of this dispute and the restoration of normal operations."

Revised Offers

The unions involved in the strike have revised their offers in an unsuccessful effort to draw a favorable response from management.

This week a union committee at Butte, Mont., unanimously rejected an offer from the Anaconda Co. the members said was "worth less than 45 cents an hour" but scheduled further meetings on local issues. Management, the unions said, offered to improve its last offer, made July 13, by 3 cents an hour—far below the union proposal to settle for 99 cents an hour over a three-year contract term.

Some 500 members of USWA Local 5977 at Baltimore, Md., voted 422-7 by secret ballot to reject a Kennecott Copper Co. offer. They walked out on the industry's last unstruck copper refining facility Jan. 20 after 20 meetings in which the company refused to improve its last "meager offer" of June 7.

At Corpus Christi, Tex., some 600 members of USWA Local 5022 voted by a 99 percent margin against an offer of a 40-cent increase over three years and struck the American Smelting & Refining Co. zinc refinery.

Union negotiators have made three contract settlements while the rest of the industry held out—and Chicago, and at Tucson, at White Pine, Mich., Cleveland Ariz. In the latter agreement, 650 members of five unions won a 75-cent package of improved benefits from Pima Mining Co. without a strike.

Adopt a Striker's Family, Copper Committee Asks

Establishment of an "adopt a copper striker's family" campaign has been announced by AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Joseph D. Keenan and Joseph A. Beirne. They were appointed by Federation Pres. George Meany as a special committee to raise funds for 60,000 striking workers.

"It is a trade union tradition for members to help their fellow workers in need," Keenan and Beirne said. "The copper syndicate is trying to starve its workers into submission. We cannot—and we will not—permit that to happen."

More than $700,000 has been donated by AFL-CIO affiliates and distributed to strikers who have been on the picket line for nearly seven months. The 22 striking unions of the AFL-CIO have contributed heavily through defense funds. Yet there remains a growing need for financial help, Keenan and Beirne noted.

Locals, groups of workers or individuals can adopt a striker's family for $25 a week, the AFL-CIO vice presidents said, urging funds and pledges be sent to: Nonferrous Metals Strike Fund, AFL-CIO, Washington, D.C. 20006.

even that. That there is such a group in America is an inexcusable blight on its economic system.

Next week's increases will not eliminate that blight, nor will those scheduled for newly-covered workers in the three years ahead. A wage floor of at least $2 an hour, applicable to all employes in all occupations, would be needed to achieve that goal. But the pending improvements demonstrate again that the mechanism for achieving the goal exists, and even within its present limits, exerts a powerful force for the general good.

Why, after more than 30 years of such demonstrations, hasn't the nation gone all the way? Why has the minimum wage never been a living wage, in the true sense? Why is there such resistance to extending the full protection of the law to everyone?

Part of the answer is simple greed. There are still too many employers who believe that the cheapest possible labor is the best possible buy. However, this is only a partial answer because many other employers now know better. They may bargain hard for the terms they want, but they have grasped the fact that good pay for workers—including their own—is an essential prerequisite to good profits.

Another part of the answer is the economic ignorance and prejudice prevalent among columnists, editorial writers and the spokesmen for employer trade associations. They presume to set a dollar value on human effort, to the point of maintaining that certain workers are not "worth" a living wage—that if the legal floor rises, these "marginal" workers will simply be fired.

This is untrue in fact and outrageous in theory. The prediction about layoffs was made with special force a year ago; it turned out, like its predecessors, to be without foundation. The reaction of employers in affected fields was toward upgrading skills rather than eliminating workers.

As for the theory, the notion that the full-time labor of any American is worth less then he needs to live on is offensive to the basic concept of a democratic society. Worse than that, the assertion that any member of the human family should exist on starvation wages is an affront to the moral principles on which modern civilization is built.

What will happen next Thursday was begun in November 1964, when the voters—aroused as seldom before—chose the 89th Congress. What will happen next Thursday is a result of political action, of the concern of President Johnson and his Administration, of the leaders in Congress who made the Dent-Yarborough bill possible.

Another political campaign will be waged this year—a year of confusion, distractions and dissent. We in the AFL-CIO cannot afford to be confused or distracted, and we must be sure our dissent is aimed at the right targets.

The outcome in November 1968 will decide whether there will be more victories, not only for the working poor but for all Americans. The decision is yours to make.

'All for One':

Women's Trade Union League Rallied Aid to Labor's Struggle

SINCE 1828, when 400 women walked out of a factory in Dover, N.H. to protest factory regulations that even took away their personal liberties, women have played an important part in American trade unionism.

The Dover strike, which led to the first "Yellow Dog" contracts in U.S. history, put women on notice that they would not be treated by employers any more gently than the men.

To get this point across to the nation's women workers a most unusual organization was formed in 1903, the Women's National Trade Union League. Membership was opened to both male and female trade unionists and to those in sympathy with the trade union movement.

For half a century the national league, and its local affiliates, concerned itself with the many problems confronting women employed in factories and shops of the country.

League members conducted extensive education programs, manned picket lines, worked for legislation during the rough and formative years of the American labor movement.

The story of the League and its work has been told, in the past, in only bits and pieces. Now the full story is available in an autobiography of Rose Schneiderman, long-time president of the New York League who also served as head of the national league for a period.

"All for One," is not just the life of Miss Schneiderman but also the story of the league and its many gallant members and officers.

It grew out of a meeting held during the Boston convention of the AFL in 1903 and AFL Pres. Samuel Gompers was one of its godfathers. Women union members from a half dozen unions and others concerned about social problems formed the League.

Mrs. Mary Norton Keough, a socially prominent Bostonian, was its first president. Mary Kenny O'Sullivan, a member of the Bookbinders was elected secretary and the famed Jane Addams of Chicago's Hull House was made vice president.

In a speech to the founding meeting, Miss Addams said that "in this movement we must pool our interests. There are 11,000 trade union women in Chicago already organized. In going into this movement we are going to stand with them, to share their blunders with them as well as their successes. No moral movement has been without its perplexities. To enlist in a cause which has none to enlist is a dead cause—one with a tombstone."

Branches sprang up in Boston, Chicago and New York. Wealthy women in a so-called "Mink-Brigade" lent crucial assistance in the New York shirtmakers strike in 1909.

One of the 13 firms that had succeeded in breaking the shirtmakers strike was the Triangle Shirtwaist Co. It was there in 1911 that the tragic Triangle fire took place and 143 girls and women perished.

Joining the Ladies' Garment Workers, the league went to work, forcing investigations and legislation, determined that such horrors would not again take place.

Miss Schneiderman in her younger days was only four and one-half feet tall, topped by flaming red hair. She was a member and general executive board member of the Cap Makers which later merged with the Hatters & Millinery Workers. She and several other league members had an extremely close relationship with Eleanor and Franklin Roosevelt.

During the depression days Mrs. Roosevelt donated her income from radio broadcasts to the New York League to keep it going. FDR would visit the league headquarters every Christmas and read Dickens' Christmas Carol to large groups of workers' children.

SHE HAS A MESSAGE for women workers of this age:

"Working women today," she says, "have not the faintest inkling of what conditions were before the terrific increase in trade union organization, nor do they begin to realize what their predecessors went through in order to change those conditions.

"Broken skulls, arrests, jail sentences, hunger—nothing stopped them. In my early days, we in the Cap Makers Union worked hard to do our bit so as to build an organization that would help the workers make a better life for themselves through better pay and shorter hours.

"But now the young women join unions as a matter of course and accept all the conditions for which other women went to jail and had their heads split open by policemen as their just rights."

Those who made these gains possible were not only the unionists, like Miss Schneiderman, but also many unsung sympathizers who worked through the Women's National Trade Union League.

State of the Union:

First Essential Is More Jobs, Johnson Tells Congress, Nation

The following is excerpted from Pres. Johnson's State of the Union Message to the second session of the 90th Congress.

IN OUR CITIES last summer, we saw how wide is the gulf for some Americans between the promise and the reality of our society.

The first essential is more jobs; useful jobs for tens of thousands who can become productive and can pay their own way.

Our economy has created seven and a half million new jobs in the past 4 years. It is adding more than a million and a half new jobs this year.

Through programs passed by the Congress, job training is being given tonight to more than a million Americans in this country.

This year, the time has come when we must get to those who are last in line—the hard-core unemployed—the hardest to reach.

Employment officials estimate that 500,000 of these persons are now unemployed in the major cities of America. Our objective is to place these 500,000 in private industry jobs within the next 3 years.

To do this, I propose a $2.1 billion manpower program in the coming fiscal year—a 25-percent increase over the current year. Most of this increase will be used to start a new partnership between Government and private industry to train and to hire the hard-core unemployed persons. I know of no task before us of more importance to us and to the country or to our future.

ANOTHER ESSENTIAL is to rebuild our cities.

Last year the Congress authorized $662 million for the model cities program. I requested the full amount of that authorization to help meet the crisis—the crisis in the cities of America. But the Congress appropriated only $312 million—less than half.

This year I urge the Congress to honor my request for model cities' funds to rebuild the centers of American cities by granting us the full amount that you in the Congress authorized—$1 billion.

The next essential is more housing—and more housing now.

Surely a nation that can go to the moon can place a decent home within the reach of its families.

Therefore we must call together the resources of industry and labor, to start building 300,000 housing units for low- and middle-income families next year—that is three times more than last year. We must make it possible for thousands of families to become homeowners and not rentpayers.

I propose, for the consideration of this Congress, a 10-year campaign to build 6 million new housing units for low- and middle-income families. Six million units the next 10 years. We built 530,000 the last 10 years.

Better health for our children — all of our children — is essential if we are to have a better America.

Last year, medicare and medicaid, and other new programs that you passed in the Congress, brought better health to more than 25 million Americans.

American medicine—with the very strong support and cooperation of public resources—has produced a phenomenal decline in the death rate from many of the dread diseases. But it is a shocking fact that, in saving the lives of babies, America ranks 15th among the nations of the world. And among children, crippling defects are often discovered too late for any corrective action.

This is a tragedy that Americans can and Americans should prevent.

I shall therefore propose to the Congress a child health program to provide, over the next 5 years, for families unable to afford it—access to health services from prenatal care of the mother through the child's first year. And when we do that, you will find that it is the best investment we ever made, because we will get these diseases in their infancy, and we will find a cure in a great many instances that we can never find by overcrowding our hospitals when they are grown.

WHEN WE ACT to advance the consumer's cause, I think we help every American.

Last year, with very little fanfare, the Congress and the executive branch moved in that direction. We enacted the Wholesome Meat Act, the Flammable Fabrics Act, the Product Safety Commission, and a law to improve clinical laboratories.

Now I think the time has come to complete our unfinished work. The Senate has already passed the truth-in-lending bill, the fire safety bill, and pipeline safety laws.

Tonight I plead with the House to immediately act upon these measures, and I hope take favorable action upon all of them.

And I call upon the Congress to enact, without delay, the remainder of the 12 vital consumer-protection laws that I submitted to the Congress last year.

I also urge final action on a measure, which has already been passed by the House, to guard against fraud and manipulation in the nation's commodity exchange markets.

These measures are a pledge to our people—to keep them safe in their homes and at work, and to give them a fair deal in the marketplace.

And I think we must do more. I propose:

New powers for the Federal Trade Commission to stop those who defraud and who swindle our public.

New safeguards to insure the quality of fish and poultry, and the safety of our community water supplies.

A major study of automobile insurance.

Protection against hazardous radiation from television sets and other electronic equipment.

Yardstick Standards Asked:

Prompt Steps Sought to Curb 'Skyrocketing' Medical Costs

THE AFL-CIO's social security director urged prompt steps to curb "skyrocketing" doctors' fees and medical costs that have forced a sharp jump in medicare insurance premiums.

The 33⅓ percent premium hike for voluntary medical insurance under Medicare that takes effect Apr. 1 "could have been prevented," declared Bert Seidman, director of the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Social Security.

"Steps should be taken right now to hold down physicians' fees and other medical costs, which are rising sky-high," Seidman said. He urged tightening the reimbursement system that now allows doctors and hospitals to "decide for themselves, exclusively, what their charges will be." His statements came on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, heard Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. EST on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Seidman said that the "responsibility for holding down the costs of medical care extends all across the board." The government, he said, should take a leadership role by setting reimbursement standards that are "fair to the government itself—and that means all of us as citizens—fair to those who are covered by the programs, and fair to the physicians and hospitals."

Such standards would also be a "yardstick" by which third-party contractors such as insurance companies, Blue Cross and Blue Shield, could measure the reasonableness of the fees and charges they pay for their clients and subscribers, he said.

SEIDMAN ALSO called for more effort to increase the efficiency of medical services and make fuller use of medical facilities.

"We ought to be using the doctor for the things that he can do best, and using nurses and others who are trained to do some of the things that do not require the doctor's degree of professional skill," he said. At the same time, he said, it should be determined whether hospitals are duplicating personnel and facilities, and whether hospitals are being fully utilized at all times.

Reporters questioning Seidman were James Deakin of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and Frank Swoboda of United Press International.

By Press Associates, Inc.

IT NOW APPEARS certain that the second session of the 90th Congress will be marked by an intensive Senate probe into the astronomical rise in the cost of medical care in the United States. The President stressed this ominous problem in his State of the Union message.

Each year—and notably since the coming of medicare and its voluntary medical insurance program—the cost of meeting the health needs of the nation has risen to clearly alarming heights.

So true is this that barely a year after medicare went into effect, the whole economic basis of the program has been threatened.

This is especially true of the voluntary medical insurance plan. Instead of costing the elderly $3 a month, it is now costing them $4. This is a one-third boost that is of serious and even tragic consequences to men and women who are barely managing to exist on their meager social security pensions.

The Senate, which has shown a great deal more concern for the plight of the elderly than the House of Representatives has, is now preparing no less than five investigations into various phases of the terrific cost of medical care and its runaway escalation of the past few years.

The Monopoly subcommittee of the Select Committee on Small Business, under Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.), is already investigating the huge profits being made by the pharmaceutical industry and the wide discrepancy in drug prices—prices that have frequently been described as the grossest kind of profiteering.

A Government Operations subcommittee under Senator Abraham A. Ribicoff (D-Conn.) wants to find out more about physicians' income and fees, especially those who work in hospitals where costs are skyrocketing.

The Labor & Public Welfare Committee, headed by Sen. Lister Hill (D-Ala.), is chiefly concerned with hospital costs which have been reaching the point where anyone who has a serious illness and lacks medical insurance can face hospital bills of bankruptcy proportions.

The Senate Finance Committee, under Sen. Russell B. Long (D-La.), has received many complaints that some hospitals and doctors are over-charging elderly patients under the medical insurance program.

Finally, a Judiciary subcommittee, headed by Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), plans to look into phony medical claims that cost Americans millions of dollars in non-existent "cures" and so-called curative devices.

IT HAS LONG become obvious that the whole question of medical practice—from the office of the physician through the whole gamut of hospital care—is desperately in need of reform in the United States. In many ways the federal government has been forced to enter into the field simply because the medical profession, through the American Medical Association, has completely failed to meet growing discontent with high medical costs through voluntary action and its stubborn battle against any kind of action by governmental bodies.

There is scarcely an item in the 50 or so categories which the Bureau of Labor Statistics measures which has not increased in cost over the past 10 years.

But it remains for medical care and medical care services to lead the entire procession. Medical care in general has gone up 39.7 percent over the past ten years while medical care services have increased by 49.6 percent. This is an average of 4.96 percent over the ten years with no less than 7.9 percent being the boost registered in 1967 alone.

The social and economic implications of such an increase in costs in so vital an area as the nation's health cannot be overestimated. It is encouraging to see that the Senate apparently is determined to do a lot more exploring this year.

FAST-RISING doctors' fees and hospital charges have forced up the cost of medicare and should be curbed, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman (center) said on Labor News Conference. Reporters Frank Swoboda (left) of United Press International and James Deakin of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch questioned Seidman on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. EST on Mutual radio.

MACHINISTS' MILLIONTH MEMBER was honored at a dinner in Washington, D. C. attended by leaders in labor and government. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, shown speaking, cited "tremendous contributions" the IAM has made to labor and the nation during its 80-year history. The union's membership stood at 1,002,579 on Dec. 31.

Machinists Celebrate Milestone, Reach Million-Member Mark

By Duane Emme

The Machinists' membership has topped the 1-million mark and the union celebrated the "milestone" by honoring the man who brought it into the seven-digit category.

He is Timothy Braunstein, 24, of Hartford, Conn., who joined the union in December at Pratt & Whitney division of United Aircraft Corp., where he is an assembler in an experimental department. He is a member of IAM Local 1746.

"Mr. One Million," identified by a computer that scanned the union's rolls, and Charles Higgins, the shop steward who signed him up, were honored at a dinner in Washington, D.C.

On hand to help celebrate the occasion were leaders from labor, government and the press. Speakers at the jubilant affair were IAM Pres. P. L. Siemiller, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz.

Siemiller, who reported the union's membership stood at 1,002,579 on Dec. 31, described attainment of the 1-million figure as "a truly momentous and long-awaited milestone" in IAM's 80-year history.

He recalled that IAM was founded in May, 1888, by 19 rail machinists who gather in a locomotive pit in Atlanta, Ga. "I'm sure they couldn't have imagined a 1-million member union growing out of the seed they planted," Siemiller said.

Meany congratulated IAM on its growth but also pointed out that the union "didn't wait until it got a million members" to serve its purpose. Through the years, he said, "it has made a tremendous contribution" to the labor movement.

A single union or an entire labor movement, Meany continued, is not measured by "its numbers" but by what it does for its members, the community and the nation.

In America, he noted, nearly all progressive legislation enacted over the years "bears the label of the union movement even though it benefits all workers and the nation, not just those who are members of unions."

Labor in the U.S. has always believed "that what is good for the country is also good for its workers," Meany said.

"The AFL-CIO and its members are making a contribution" to helping labor in other nations, Meany declared, "because we also believe that what is good for other workers in the world is also good for America."

Wirtz told Braunstein that he is "awfully lucky" to be an IAM member. "I guess I'd like very much to be the 1 millionth member of this union, or I guess I'd like very much to be the shop steward who signed him," he said.

If an individual worker "is going to mean anything at all" in the plan of things, "he has to be represented," Wirtz said, adding that no member of the IAM or any union stands alone.

"There's an opportunity in what labor stands for to make this country what all of us want it to be," Wirtz concluded.

15-20c Pay Floor Hikes Tied to Labor Drive

floor moved from $1.25 to $1.40 and coverage was extended to 9.1 million workers, including 400,000 farm workers, with an initial floor of $1 an hour and provisions to move up to $1.60 by 1971. The farm worker top was set at $1.30 to be reached in 1969.

The 1968 changes include also a lowering of the workweek standard for overtime for newly covered workers from 44 to 42 hours. Most newly covered employes working more than 42 hours a week are entitled to overtime at a time and one-half rate. There is no change for those presently paid overtime on a 40-hour week basis.

Information on the new changes has been distributed to nearly 2 million employers by the Labor Dept. including an official poster which must be displayed in all establishments, highlights of the amended law and a listing of regional, district and field offices where further information can be obtained.

The department's Wage & Hour Division also has available the "Handy Reference Guide to the Fair Labor Standards Act" a non-technical pamphlet with basic information about the law's minimum wage, overtime pay, equal pay and child labor standards.

The Fair Labor Standards Act went into effect 30 years ago with a minimum hourly wage of 25 cents covering about 15 million workers. For the next six years, the wage was set at 30 cents an hour, moving up to 40 cents the next few years.

In 1949 the wage floor was lifted to 75 cents an hour and in 1955 to $1. During these years coverage was reduced in some areas.

In 1961 general coverage was extended for the first time to 3.6 million workers and the wage floor increased in two stages to $1.15 and $1.25.

The 1966 amendments provided for the coverage of 9.1 million more workers and the wage increase to $1.40 and $1.60.

During the 30-year history of the act the overtime provisions were strengthened moving from time and one-half after 44 hours to 40 hours, improving protection against child labor and providing in 1963 for an end to wage discrimination against women workers.

Wider Program Urged:

nounced in the State of the Union message for a $2.1 billion manpower program "to help Americans who want to work to get a job."

The new program, he said, is a 25 percent increase over the current fiscal year expenditures and will add $442 million to the manpower efforts.

Noting successful test efforts of on-the-job training in private industry, the President proposed a permanent program to put 100,000 men and women in jobs by June 1969 and 500,000 by 1971.

The program—Job Opportunities in Business Sector (JOBS) would be "a new partnership between government and private industry to train and hire the hard-core unemployed" the President said, with $350 million earmarked to support the program.

The government, he said, will identify the unemployed and the companies will train them and offer jobs, bearing the normal cost of training. The extra cost of preparing the hard-core unemployed for training will be borne by the government.

National Alliance

The President said he has called on American industry to establish a National Alliance of Businessmen to be headed by Henry Ford II and 15 top business leaders from the nation's 50 largest cities to serve on its board.

The President told Congress also he would strengthen the Manpower Administration by adding 600 "new positions" and extend the program of linking federal manpower efforts with the resources of state and local levels.

A basic question facing the nation, the President declared, is "in an economy capable of sustaining high employment, how can we assure every American, who is willing to work, the right to earn a living?"

Noting that in today's economy jobs are widely available and the unemployment rate is low, the President said that "the 'make-work' programs of the 1930s are not the answer to today's problem."

Meany's statement on the President's program said the AFL-CIO shares the "President's deep concern about the problem of hard-core unemployment. This nation must not tolerate any longer what the President rightly refers to as 'a tragic waste of the human spirit and the economic resources of a great nation.'"

He sent the President a copy of a wire to Ford pledging AFL-CIO support for the Administration's proposals and noting that the government funds "must be used only for exceptional job training and supportive services and not for hidden wage subsidy."

On occupational health and safety the President cited the "shame of a modern industrial nation" in which 14,500 workers are killed annually on the job, 2.2 million are injured, 250 million man-days of productivity are wasted and $1.5 billion in wages are lost.

The federal government offers the worker today "a patchwork of obsolete and ineffective laws," the President said and only a few states have modern laws to protect the workers health and safety.

In submitting to Congress the Occupational Health and Safety Act of 1968, the President said it will cover 50 million workers in interstate commerce and provide federal help to the states for those in intrastate commerce.

Fish Take Priority Over Ohio Safety

Ohio has 109 state fish and game inspectors but only 79 safety inspectors to check on the needs of factory workers, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany noted in commenting on Pres. Johnson's manpower message to Congress.

The states have "failed miserably" in assuring the occupational safety and health of workers, Meany said in citing Ohio as a "horrible example" of state neglect.

Ohio AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Warren J. Smith testified before a legislative commission last year about the imbalance of safety inspectors but the legislature, now in session, has made no move to meet the need.

Metal Trades Beat Raid at Norfolk Yard

Norfolk, Va.—The 5th Naval District Metal Trades Council defeated an attempt by an unaffiliated union to carve out a small craft unit at the Norfolk Naval Shipyard here.

The AFL-CIO council turned back Planners, Estimators and Progressmen's Association, Local 1, in a secret ballot election conducted by the Navy. The vote was MTC 119, PEP 102.

MTC has for nearly five years represented all the blue collar employes in the yard. Late last year the unaffiliated union asked for, and the Secretary of the Navy granted, over MTC objection, an election on carving out a separate bargaining unit of planners, estimators, ship progressmen and ship schedulers from the other Wage Board workers represented by the AFL-CIO metal trades.

The election marked the third attempt by the small union to raid MTC's membership. Council Pres. James M. Porter said MTC has been certified again by Rear Admiral J. S. Brown, yard commander, as exclusive bargaining agent for all Wage Board workers here.

Court Upholds NLRB:

Rights' Group Aid Okay in Union Vote

Richmond, Va.—Strong messages of support by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People on behalf of a union were "germane, temperate and factual," the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled here in upholding National Labor Relations Board election results at the Baltimore, Md., Luggage Co.

By a 2-1 vote the court rejected the company's claim that the NAACP's endorsement deprived employes of their right to a "free and untrammeled election" and ordered management to bargain with the AFL-CIO Leather Goods, Plastics & Novelty Workers.

"Far from diminishing the sobriety of the election," the NAACP's appeal to Negro workers to vote for the union "may have substantially increased the possibility of a rational, well-informed electorate," Judges Simon E. Sobeloff, and J. Braxton Craven, Jr., declared. Judge Herbert S. Boreman dissented.

Baltimore Luggage employes voted for the union a year ago, 96-46, after a vigorous campaign in a plant where 134 of the 144 eligible employes are Negro. The board certified the union but management refused to bargain, charging that a letter and two speeches by NAACP representatives affected the climate of opinion unlawfully.

The letter expressed support for labor "because they have demonstrated that they are our friends and have helped us in our civil rights struggle." The speeches emphasized that "economic opportunity and personal dignity" could be achieved through unionization.

The court majority, contrasting other race cases where "thinly-veiled anti-white venom" was used to get votes for a union, concluded: "This is not the situation in the instant case."

The disputed statements were "clearly not for the purpose, and could not have had the effect," of inflaming racial prejudices. "This was no gospel of hate. Rather than appealing to deep-seated emotional fears, the letter and speeches temperately addressed themselves to the economic and social self-interest of the workers, 90 percent of whom were Negro," Judge Sobeloff wrote.

"Such an exhortation must be a legitimate tactic in any pre-election campaign," he said.

The letter was written under an NAACP letterhead by Dr. Lillie M. Jackson, president of the Baltimore NAACP. In urging support for the union, she wrote: "Our sympathies are with the labor movement . . . The wife of a union official (Mrs. Viola Liuzzo, Detroit) gave her life in our cause."

Stating her belief that the only way the luggage workers can improve their lot is through organization, the NAACP official said "it is a simple fact that colored workers who belong to unions are far better off than those who don't."

The speeches were given at a union rally by the Rev. Marion Bascomb, member of the local NAACP council, and St. George Cross, another NAACP representative. Both urged workers to vote for the union.

The court majority held that "standards to be applied in determining whether racially-oriented remarks" can spoil an otherwise lawful election were established by the NLRB in Sewell Mfg. Co., a 1962 case, and in NLRB v. Schapiro & Whitehouse, Inc., approved by the 4th Circuit in 1966.

In Sewell, the board agreed that a relevant campaign statement cannot be condemned simply because it deals with racial matters. In Schapiro & Whitehouse, a leaflet used in another Baltimore organizing campaign was held to be "so irrelevant and so highly inflammatory . . . as to invalidate the election."

Novik Reappointed To Advisory Panel

Pres. Johnson has reappointed M. S. Novik, radio-TV consultant for the AFL-CIO, and Editor Palmer Hoyt of the Denver Post to three-year terms on the Advisory Commission on Information.

The five-member panel meets monthly to evaluate the policies and programs of the U. S. Information Agency. Other members are Publisher-Editor Thomas V. H. Vail of the Cleveland Plain Dealer, Pres. Frank Stanton of the Columbia Broadcasting System and Sigurd S. Larmon, New York advertising executive.

Negro Doctors Sponsor Health Services Center

Negro doctors in the nation's capital are joining with the federal government in a new program to provide health and housing facilities for the urban poor, particularly the elderly.

The program, sponsored by the National Medical Association, predominantly a Negro physicians' group, will begin with a $60,550 grant from the Health, Education & Welfare Dept.

NMA will supervise a health survey in the District of Columbia to develop plans for building and operating a comprehensive health care center there. The program also will be aided by Howard University and the D.C. government.

The center will include facilities for group medical practice, a nursing home, social care, elderly housing, a medical office building and a neighborhood service center for senior citizens.

Eventual cost of the D.C. center is expected to be about $3 million, financed mainly by NMA and other private sources, the Administration reported. Dr. Lionel F. Swan, NMA president, hopes the center will be functioning "within a year."

Meanwhile Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare John W. Gardner and Sec. of Housing & Urban Development Robert C. Weaver have indicated the program may be greatly expanded.

In a joint letter to the President, they outlined plans for transferring the D.C. plan, if successful, to cities all across the U.S.

Pres. Johnson also expressed hope that the D.C. program "will serve as an example for other cities which lack adequate health care in poverty areas.'"

He praised its emphasis on helping the elderly poor. "There is nothing . . . we need more urgently in the cities of this country than health care and housing for the elderly—unless it's for the young," Johnson said.

He also paid tribute to NMA for taking the lead in sponsoring the program, describing the organization's action as an example of how "concerned citizens in a voluntary association can work with the government" to solve critical problems.

Cooperative Efforts Urged By Schnitzler

Labor and management in the beverage industry must work together in support of badly needed legislation, to elect a liberal Congress and to help provide jobs and education to those who need them most, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler told the annual meeting of the industry's National Coordinating Committee.

Beverage workers and managers "represent the highest degree of mutual cooperation and trust that can be found anywhere in America," Schnitzler said. He noted that committee memberships have grown from 12 unions seven years ago to 31 today, plus one AFL-CIO department—Maritime Trades.

Schnitzler pointed out that the industry can contribute to the creation of urgently needed jobs.

Congressional conservatives say the nation cannot afford social welfare improvements because of Viet Nam costs but "this is bunk," said Schnitzler, adding "This country can handle both jobs; it really has no choice, for both jobs must be done."

The AFL-CIO officer warned that the "spirit of prohibition is still very much alive" and said some members of Congress would like to make the life of the beverage industry more difficult.

Johnson Spurs Congress on Civil Rights

ment. He noted that the AFL-CIO has testified for every one of the bills Pres. Johnson has proposed.

Meany termed the open housing bill "a key item in the war against discrimination and segregation" and urged Congress to remember that "in America there can only be one kind of citizenship—first-class citizenship."

Johnson's special message to Congress came as a bipartisan group of senators battled a filibuster threat against one of the President's bills.

Rights Protected

It would make it a federal crime to use force or intimidation to prevent someone from exercising his legal rights. Pres. Johnson gave these examples of the crimes the legislation seeks to punish:

"A Negro parent is attacked because his child attends a desegregated public school . . .

"A Negro is beaten by private citizens after seeking service in a previously all-white restaurant . . .

"Grown men force a group of Negro children from a public park."

Johnson asked for Equal Employment Opportunity Commission power to issue anti-discrimination orders under the same procedure used by the National Labor Relations Board, and to seek enforcement in federal courts.

He asked the Senate to pass a non-discrimination law in the selection of state juries, in addition to the federal jury law it previously passed—and asked the House to enact both bills.

On fair housing, the President defied the congressional silence which greeted his reference to housing discrimination in the State of the Union message.

Segregation Hit

"Every American who wishes to buy a home, and can afford it, should be free to do so," the President declared.

He warned that segregated ghettoes have compounded the nation's economic and social problems.

"Housing discrimination means the Negro veteran of Viet Nam cannot live in an apartment which advertises vacancies," Johnson pointed out.

Johnson referred soberly to last summer's "tragedy of urban riots."

The "prime victims," he noted, were the "law-abiding majority" in the ghettoes.

"Lawlessness must be punished—sternly and promptly," Johnson said. But "nothing can justify the continued denial of equal justice and opportunity to every American."

CLARK CLIFFORD, named by Pres. Johnson to succeed Defense Sec. Robert S. McNamara on Mar. 1, is shown as he arrived at the White House. Clifford has been a key adviser to Presidents Truman and Kennedy as well as Johnson.

Federal Agency Charges Race Bias In New York's Biggest Corporations

New York—This city's 100 major corporations "clearly fail to match their economic leadership in equal opportunity," the federal government's Equal Employment Opportunity Commission concluded.

The conclusion came in a report released by EEOC during four days of hearings held here into discrimination against Negro and Puerto Rican white-collar workers.

The report also said that the 100 big firms "lag significantly" behind the New York average in employment of Negroes and Puerto Ricans, even though that average is "far below" the proportion of minorities to total population.

"Unbelievably," the report noted, "56 of the companies, with a total of 12,665 officials and managers in the city had not a single Negro in that category."

The other 44, according to the report, had just 221 Negroes among a total of 19,500 officials and managers.

Forty-eight of the companies, with 8,857 officials and managers here "employed not a single Puerto Rican in this capacity. The other 52 had 235 Puerto Ricans among 23,808 officials and managers.

In its summary, EEOC said that Negroes, making up some 18 percent of the population, fill 5.2 percent of all white collar jobs reported in the city in 1966, and "only 2.6 percent of such jobs in the 100 major companies."

Puerto Ricans, representing an estimated 10 percent of the city population in 1966 held 2.9 percent of the white collar jobs citywide in that year, "but only 2 percent in the 100 companies."

Another EEOC report, focusing on the communications industry, found that Negro white collar workers in 1966 ranged from a high of 3.9 percent in radio and television to a low of 2.5 percent in advertising agencies.

The report said that newspaper publishers were "generally the laggard" in minority hiring.

The hearings themselves focused on lack of white collar workers in executive posts in banks, insurance, communications and other industries.

At the hearings' conclusion, EEOC Chairman Clifford L. Alexander warned he was considering legal action against discriminating firms.

He said the hearings had primarily received "a lot of paper pledges," adding "If future intentions were gauged by past performance, it would mean that Negro and Puerto Ricans would probably be waiting until 2164" for fair treatment.

Truth-in-Lending Nears Showdown:

Congress Renews Battles Over Budget, Taxes and Civil Rights

By David L. Perlman

A new round of political battles over spending, taxes and civil rights has dominated the first two weeks of this election-year session of Congress.

In the conservative-controlled House, the influential chairman of the Ways & Means Committee once again turned down Pres. Johnson's pleas for an emergency tax increase to meet Viet Nam war costs and restrain inflation.

Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) listened patiently during a week of hearings to top Administration officials pleading for action on the tax bill.

Then, with soft-spoken bluntness, Mills told them he still isn't convinced that government spending has been cut deeply enough into the bone.

He said a "better case" has been made for a tax increase than last year. But, Mills declared, he is setting aside committee consideration of the tax bill until the Administration determines whether deeper budget cuts can be made.

"Take a fresh look at the budget," he suggested. "Has the budget been cut enough?"

Mills in effect said the same thing last year—and forced through a resolution directing Federal agencies not to spend all the money appropriated by Congress. But he continued to sit on the tax bill.

The scene was familiar in the Senate also. Back in 1966, a comprehensive Administration civil rights bill had passed the House. But a Senate coalition of southerners and conservative Republicans filibustered successfully to keep it from coming to a vote.

Now before the Senate is a more limited House-passed civil rights bill, one part of the legislative package Pres. Johnson has urged Congress to enact.

The bill, making it a federal crime to use violence or intimidation to prevent Negroes from exercising their legal rights, faces the same filibuster threat.

Liberals had hoped to amend it to include other portions of the civil rights program, including the important open housing proposal.

Balk at Vote

The Dixie bloc has not yet openly proclaimed a filibuster and the debate of the first weeks has been largely polite sparring. The southerners refused to agree to a timetable for voting, and have accused Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.) of foul play because he managed to have the civil rights bill made the pending order of business.

In past years, filibusters have been mounted to keep civil rights from even coming up in the Senate.

The House, meanwhile, unanimously approved a bill raising benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act in line with increases enacted for social security beneficiaries.

The legislation has the support of both unions and management in the industry and the only question was how soon the Senate could pass it.

Consumer Issue

Early in February, the House will have its first chance to prove whether it can earn Pres. Johnson's accolade of the "consumer Congress."

Cleared for floor action is a "truth-in-lending" bill to require disclosure of true interest rates on credit transactions so that consumers will be able to shop for the best credit terms as well as the best buys in the marketplace.

The original bill, introduced by Rep. Leonor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.), covers all credit transactions, including the revolving credit system used by a growing number of stores.

The House Banking & Currency Committee amended the bill to exempt revolving credit and transactions in which the credit charge is $10 or less. Similar exemptions are in the companion bill the Senate passed last year.

Mrs. Sullivan, with strong support from labor and consumer groups, has said she will fight on the House floor to preserve her original bill and defeat the committee amendments.

The legislation has been cleared by the Rules Committee and has been tentatively scheduled for floor action Feb. 5.

Lister Hill Joins List Of Retiring Senators

Sen. Lister Hill (D-Ala.), chairman of the Senate Labor & Public Welfare Committee and a veteran of 45 years in Congress, has announced he will not seek re-election in November.

Hill was elected to fill a House vacancy in 1923 and re-elected for seven consecutive terms. In 1938 he was appointed to the Senate, after Pres. Roosevelt named Hugo L. Black to the Supreme Court. Hill is topped by only three other senators in continuous service.

He co-authored the Hill-Burton Act of 1946, through which millions in federal funds have been channeled to hlep with hospital construction.

Pres. Johnson described Hill as "a giant in Congress" and added: "He has built an enduring monument of good works, especially in the field of health. He will be sorely missed."

Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) will move up to the chairmanship of the Labor Committee—if he wins nomination and election contests this year. Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.) follows Morse in seniority among Democrats on the committee.

The announcement by Hill brings to four the number of Senators who have declared they will not seek re-election this year.

The others are Senators Frank Carlson (R-Kan.), Bourke B. Hickenlooper (R-Iowa) and George A. Smathers (D-Fla.)

Meanwhile, another veteran in Congress, Rep. Charles A. Halleck (R-Ind.) also announced that he is retiring at the end of this term to let a younger man take his place and "to start doing the things I like."

Halleck, GOP Minority Leader between 1959 and 1965, first came to the House through a special election in 1935 and has been continuously reelected since then.

Others Retire

Earlier, according to Congressional Quarterly, 12 other members of the House have announced that they will not stand for re-election this year. They are:

Representatives Robert T. Ashmore (D-S.C.), Thomas B. Curtis (R-Mo.), Robert Dole (R-Kan.), James C. Gardner (R-N.C.), E. C. Gathings (D-Ark.), A. Sydney Herlong (D-Fla.), Paul C. Jones (D-Mo.), Horace R. Kornegay (D-N.C.), Arch A. Moore Jr. (R-W. Va.), Joseph Y. Resnick (D-N.Y.), Richard S. Schweiker (R-Pa.) and William M. Tuck (D-Va.).

Curtis, Dole, Schweiker and Resnick have said they will seek nominations for the Senate in their respective states, while Gardner and Moore will try for governorships.

However, the time element and procedures in Resnick's bid for the Democratic Senate nomination in New York are such that he could, if unsuccessful, change his mind and again run for the House, he said.

CQ listed Ashmore and Jones as citing health as reasons for their decisions to retire. Kornegay said Congress' long sessions were too long. Gathings merely said, "I'm homesick and I'm going home."

Meany Heads ILG Dubinsky Foundation

New York — AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has been named chairman of the recently established David Dubinsky Foundation, it was announced by Louis Stulberg, president of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

The foundation will make grants ranging from $5,000 to $50,000 annually, for a total of $1 million in the next 10 years, to causes and institutions in line with the traditional objectives of the ILGWU, but not presently covered by regular ILGWU contributions. It is aimed especially at encouraging promising and pioneering enterprises.

Other members of the foundation's governing body include Adolph A. Berle Jr., former assistant secretary of state; Dr. Isador Lubin, former U.S. commissioner of labor statistics; Stulberg and Vice Pres. Luigi Antonini, representing the union, and Dubinsky. Gus Tyler, ILGWU assistant president is in charge of administering the fund.

The foundation was set up by the union last year to honor Dubinsky on his 75th birthday. He had headed the union for 34 years until his retirement in 1966. The foundation's committee expects to announce its first awards within the next several months.

Stack to Represent AFL-CIO in Asia

Waldemar B. Stack has been appointed Asian representative of the AFL-CIO with his office at Naha, Okinawa. Stack was formerly regional representative of the Commercial Workers Trade Secretariat (FIET), located for several years in Tokyo, Japan.

In coming to the AFL-CIO he joins the Department of International Affairs' staff as an international representative.

For a number of years Stack was secretary of Local No. 1453, Retail Clerks International Association, in Joliet, Ill.

Labor's Stake Stressed In Local Health Plans

Labor was challenged at a U.S. Public Health Service seminar in Washington to use its collective bargaining power at the community level to improve the quality of health services.

Despite such spectacular medical achievements as heart transplants and open heart surgery, the organization of medical care services and the methods by which they are delivered "remain rooted in the 19th Century," the conference was told. Participating were representatives of 33 union organizations—the AFL-CIO itself, 16 central bodies, 13 international unions, and three local labor units—and 20 observers from the Public Health Service.

The trade union movement is not convinced that the dollars that unions have negotiated are buying the health care that members are entitled to, Dir. Bert Seidman of the federation's Social Security Dept. reported.

"If we want to change the system," said Richard E. Shoemaker, Seidman's assistant, "we are going to have to do it ourselves by developing more comprehensive group practice prepayment plans."

Dr. Carruth J. Wagner, director of the U.S. Bureau of Health Services, congratulated the labor movement for the "vital role" it played in winning passage of landmark legislation and the "remarkable contributions you have made" to the improvement of community health services.

Prof. Raymond Munts of the University of Wisconsin's School of Social Work called on labor to revise its collective bargaining programs to deal directly with community agencies—physicians, hospitals, insurers, suppliers.

In 1966, Munts recalled, the AFL-CIO "tried to warn the Social Security Administration they were headed for trouble on doctors' fees" and was told "Yes, we know, but labor can play a role in holding fees down by reporting overcharges" under the medicare program.

It is impossible, Munts said, to expect labor to participate effectively in planning for better health services until hospital planning, for one thing, is clarified.

Shoemaker declared that, while scientific advances in medical knowledge made in the last 10 years probably exceed the progress previously made since the time of Hippocrates, the "providers of services and the physicians have adamantly resisted the changes" necessary to give the public the health care it needs.

The two-day conference reached these conclusions:

- International unions should re-examine their health programs under collective bargaining to determine whether their dollars are buying adequate health services.
- Labor central bodies should evaluate their communities to determine the feasibility of setting up a group practice pre-payment plan.
- Jointly administered health, welfare and pension plans should explore the possibility of using trust fund reserves for investment in health facilities and services.
- The Public Health Service should assist organized labor in conducting research, providing technical services and developing educational materials.

Cleveland Teachers Vote to Keep Union

Cleveland, O.—The Cleveland Teachers Union, AFL-CIO, defeated the Cleveland Education Association by a vote of 4,105 to 1,413 to retain bargaining rights for 5,800 public school employes. Negotiations on contract terms will start before Feb. 1, when the present contract expires, Pres. James E. O'Meara said.

The union, affiliated with the American Federation of Teachers, improved its margin over the association, an affiliate of the National Education Association. In the last election, in 1964, the union won by 700 votes. This time the union got 73.2 per cent of the votes. All but 200 teachers voted.

House Strengthens Truth-in-Lending

AFL-CIO News

Plugs Gaps In Senate Measure

The House strengthened the Senate-passed truth-in-lending bill to give a dramatic victory to the American consumer.

With a strong assist from labor, the Administration and consumer organizations, sponsors of a loophole-free interest disclosure bill rallied a decisive House majority to beat down restrictive amendments.

Both the House and Senate versions—which now go to conference—are aimed at making it possible for consumers to "shop" for the best buy in credit by requiring that interest rates and credit charges be expressed in terms of simple annual interest.

Thus a rate of 1.5 percent a month would be translated into 18 percent a year and misleading advertisements of "4 percent financing" on new cars, involving elaborate systems of concealed charges, would be outlawed.

The House also added a new section limiting the amount of a worker's wages subject to garnishment and protecting a worker against being fired because a single creditor attaches his pay.

The House-passed measure corrects major weaknesses in the Senate bill:

- It would cover revolving credit charge accounts used by many department stores which quote low-sounding monthly rates.
- It would cover all transactions, not just those in which the credit charge is under $10. The Senate's exemption in effect excluded purchases amounting to more than $100.

A majority of the House Banking & Currency Committee had voted to amend the strong truth-in-lending bill introduced by Rep. Leonor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.) to add the loopholes on revolving credit and under-$10 charges.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, in a letter to all House members, said there was "no shred of justification" for exempting revolving credit from annual interest rate disclosure.

He said the under-$10 exemption was "even more objectionable." It would mean "a society matron who charged a $500 gown would be told exactly what the credit costs were; an ordinary housewife who charged $50 worth of clothes for her children would be kept in ignorance."

Mrs. Sullivan, backed by her committee chairman, Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.), took the fight

Public Service Job Incentives Urged for Vets

Pres. Johnson proposed to Congress a new program to encourage veterans returning to civilian life to enter public service employment.

He asked $50 million in first year "incentive" grants "to channel the talents of the veteran to the most urgent needs of rural and urban America."

The President also proposed an increase in government guarantees of GI home loans, new "one-stop" veterans service centers in major cities, part-time as well as full-time vocational rehabilitation for disabled veterans.

He asked Congress to pass a resolution urging private firms

Panel Told Copper Firms Union-Busting Bars Pact

BIG COPPER can end the strike of 60,000 union employes whenever it wants to make an "adequate economic offer" and abandon its efforts to starve its workers into submission, union witnesses told a three-member presidential hearing panel. Left to right: first witnesses, top, were Research Dir. Otis Brubaker and Vice Pres. Joseph Molony of the Steelworkers, Russell Williams, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Butte, Mont.; bottom, panel members Msgr. George G. Higgins, Dr. George W. Taylor, chairman, and George E. Reedy.

Labor Hits Tactics Of Industry's Big 4

The goal of the Big Four copper companies is to "smash the unions," a spokesman for 60,000 striking copper workers told a special presidential panel at hearings designed to find a way to settle the 200-day-old strike.

"That's what this strike is all about," said Chairman Joseph P. Molony of the National Nonferrous Coordinating Committee representing 26 unions on strike since July 15 against four giant companies and seven smaller firms.

Molony was the first witness when the three panel members opened hearings. He testified that the industry-wide walkout can be settled readily "if and when the companies decide they want to make an adequate economic offer."

The panel has been hearing from union and company witnesses alternatively over a four-day period. Chairman George W. Taylor, George E. Reedy and Msgr. George G. Higgins listened to statements and then questioned union representatives and managers of the Big Four companies in this order: Phelps Dodge Corp., Kennecott Copper Corp., the Anaconda Co. and the American Smelting & Refining Co.

The industry theme was that bargaining will resume only when the unions withdraw their insistence on company-wide bargaining.

Union witnesses said they seek contracts spelling out equal pay for equal work instead of the former patchwork of wage rates and conditions that fragmented the copper workers and their bargaining units.

Before the hearings started, the companies charged the unions caused the strike by demanding industry-wide agreements. Industry witnesses told the panel that union insistence on company-wide bar-

Union Wins Can Pacts Worth 90c

New York — The Steelworkers' can industry conference won pattern-setting contracts from American Can Co. and Continental Can Co. and continued negotiations with National Can Corp. and Crown Cork & Seal Co. for similar terms.

USWA Pres. I. W. Abel announced that the conference had "overwhelmingly" voted to ratify a three-year settlement covering 32,000 American and Continental workers.

The new pacts, reached a few hours before a Feb. 1 strike deadline, were valued by union Co-chairmen William Moran and Hugh Carcella at 89 to 90 cents an hour in wages and other contract benefits.

Under the settlement, covered workers will get wage increases of 20 cents an hour the first year, 14 more cents the second year and 10 additional cents in the third year of the agreement.

The two big firms also agreed to an early retirement plan similar to one established in the union's basic steel contracts; improved pension

Jobless Outlook Unchanged:

President Forecasts Continued Growth

The unemployment rate will remain "essentially unchanged" in 1968, prices will increase "somewhat in excess of 3 percent" and the economy will grow at a real rate of 4 percent.

That's the outlook for the year projected by the President's Council of Economic Advisers, which forecast a $61 billion increase in the gross national product — the total value of all goods and services produced—to $846 billion.

The council's outlook backed up the President's Economic Report which stressed that "restraint" in government fiscal policies "is essential to our economic health." He strongly renewed his request for a 10 percent tax surcharge.

The President urged "in the strongest terms I know that unions and business firms exercise the most rigorous restraint in their wage and price determinations in 1968."

He announced that he is establishing a "Cabinet Committee on Price Stability" to focus attention on the problem and to work with business and labor to seek solution to price increase and "inform them of the consequences of irresponsible wage and price behavior."

The President said the committee will not "become involved in specific current wage or price matters."

He summed up his views on the economic program for the year by declaring that Administration policies "will be prudent as well as creative; safe as well as ambitious; responsible as well as compassionate."

The year 1967, the President said, was a "year of readjustment" because the economy began the year "out of balance." These imbalances no longer exist and the economy is again advancing strongly, he asserted.

He cited also the record of seven years of expansion and

NAM Seeks to Stir Anti-Union Opinion

Cleveland—Start drumming up public opinion against unions, a top official of the National Association of Manufacturers urged business leaders here.

NAM Vice Pres. William H. Zinke called for new legislative curbs on unions and "reforms" to end "bias" by the National Labor Relations Board against employers.

He asked a law to bar coordinated bargaining by unions, as in the copper and electrical industries.

To pave the way for this new legislation, Zinke said, industrialists must create the kind of public climate "which resulted in the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin Acts."

The address, before the Associated Industries of Cleveland, followed earlier statements indicating that the NAM and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce are planning a major legislative attack on unions if this year's voters elect a more conservative Congress.

Both business organizations have held special meetings and workshops in key cities to lay the

'64 Rail Arbitration Ruled Still in Effect

An effort by three rail operating unions to restore some 24,500 jobs lost under a 1964 two-year compulsory arbitration award was turned back by the U.S. Supreme Court.

The Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, Trainmen and Switchmen had asked the court to rule that the award is no longer in effect and that conditions existing prior to the award should be restored.

But instead, the Supreme Court left standing a lower court's decision which held that the award established a "new plateau" and that jobs eliminated through it remain abolished.

However, the union won a point when the Supreme Court also refused to disturb lower court rulings ordering the railroads to bargain with them over future jobs. The companies had appealed these decisions.

One of them requires employment of firemen on "new runs"—that is trains newly scheduled after the award expired in 1966. This could halt managements' moves to eliminate more firemen through attrition.

The Trainmen and Switchmen faced a similar situation in that reversal of these other decisions could have led to further elimination of train and yard crews by railroads through special boards.

In another area, the Supreme Court denied review of 9th Circuit Court of Appeals actions involving National Relations Board decisions.

In one, Laborers Local 1082 had appealed the court's decision that it violated "good faith" bargaining requirements of the Taft-Hartley Act by requiring E. L. Boggs Plastering Co. of Los Angeles to post a performance bond to guarantee payment of wages and benefits.

In the other, the Supreme Court left standing an order requiring Strong Roofing & Insulating Co., Alhambra, Calif. to recognize Roofers Local 36 as bargaining agent for its employes and to sign a multi-employer contract as part of a multi-employer bargaining group.

Meanwhile, the Supreme Court also rejected another appeal by jailed Teamsters Pres. James R. Hoffa for a new trial in Chattanooga, Tenn. on a jury tampering charge on which he was convicted in 1964.

It was the third attempt by Hoffa to win a new trial. The Supreme Court refused to review a denial of the move by a lower court, which also had rejected his two previous moves.

Four Train Unions Agree To Push Toward Merger

Chicago—Presidents of four rail operating unions—Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, Trainmen, Switchmen and Conductors & Brakemen—agreed to work for a merger of their unions.

Following a meeting here, they jointly declared "We are in accord in the belief that a single, large trade union organization representing engine and train service employes would be most desirable."

"Further," their statement said, "because of developments in the railroad industry, unification of our organizations is not only needed, it is long overdue."

Joining in the statement were Presidents H. E. Gilbert, BLF&E, Charles Luna, Trainmen, Neil P. Speirs, Switchmen and C. F. Lane, ORC&B. Together their organizations represent about 300,000 workers.

Each president assigned a top officer in his union to a special committee that will begin work on a merger proposal. The proposal will be subject to approval by 10-man committees in each union and a referendum of the union's members.

Despite Higher Earnings:

Workers '67 Buying Power Cut As Living Costs Continued Rise

The cost of living continued to rise during 1967 while the buying power of the average worker's paycheck continued to drop, the Labor Dept. reported.

A typical factory worker earned more but could buy less in 1967 than in either 1966 or 1965.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics' analysis of prices and earnings over the year were combined with regular monthly reports on the same two subjects.

The Consumer Price Index climbed by three-tenths of 1 percent in December to 118.2 percent of the 1957-59 average, 3.1 percent higher than in December 1966.

That means it cost the average city family $11.82 in December to buy goods and services that would have cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period.

The earnings report for December showed that take-home pay-gross earnings less social security and federal income tax deductions—averaged $84.45 a week for a single production worker and $91.99 for the worker with a wife and two children.

These after-tax earnings were up by $2.28 and $2.41 respectively from December 1966, but when they were adjusted for higher prices it was a different story.

Real spendable earnings in December, measured in 1957-59 dollars, were $71.45 for the worker with no dependents and $77.83 for the worker with three dependents, down 19 and 27 cents from December 1966.

For the year as a whole, take-home pay for the production worker with three dependents averaged $90.98 a week compared to $88.55 in 1966, and $86.30 in 1965.

However, his spendable earnings adjusted for the cost of living averaged $78.23 in 1967, compared to $78.29 in 1966 and $78.53 in 1965.

Thus, while this worker's take-home pay actually has increased by $3.68 over the past two years, its purchasing power dipped by 30 cents in the same period.

Looking at it another way, this worker with three dependents has seen the value of his paycheck decrease about four-tenths of 1 percent over the past two years.

The 3.1 percent rise in consumer prices in 1967 was below the 3.3 percent increase in 1966 but it was greater than the 2.5 percent "at most" predicted by BLS at the beginning of last year.

Food prices rose by only three-tenths of 1 percent during 1967, but a rise of 4.8 percent in the cost of restaurant meals pushed the over-all food category up by 1.2 percent.

Prices of housing — to include rent, homeownership, fuel and utilities—were up 2.7 percent in 1967, apparels were up 4 percent, transportation rose 3.6 percent and health and recreation costs climbed by 4.6 percent.

Of the twenty-three items measured under the above five major categories, medical care showed the sharpest rise in 1967—6.4 percent. BLS attributed the increase to higher doctor and dentist fees, and higher costs for hospital service.

Noting that BLS had "missed the mark" in its 1967 prediction, Arnold Chase, the bureau's assistant commissioner, declined to forecast any specific percent of price increase in 1968.

However, at a news briefing, he said that "it looks as though this trend (1967's) will continue." Preliminary data on the Wholesale Price Index—usually a forerunner of price increases—indicated a rise of three-tenths of 1 percent in wholesale prices in January.

Approximately 125,000 workers will receive increases through union negotiated cost-of-living escalator clauses as a result of the December price increases.

For 85,000 aerospace and airline workers it mean 3-cent-an-hour increases. About 10,000 employes of painters and decorators in Los Angeles will get a 10-cent increase. Some 13,000 employes of Greyhound Corp. will receive 1-cent more. Other workers will get raises ranging from 1 to 7 cents an hour.

Feller Blasts Sniping Attack On Johnson

Pres. Karl F. Feller of the Brewery Workers called on his union's membership to face up to the real issues in the 1968 election campaign and not be diverted from support of Pres. Johnson by the "contingent of discontents."

In a signed column in the Brewery Worker, Feller sharply criticized the "strident" dissenters who heap blame on the President for everything from the Viet Nam war to race riots.

"Their suggestions for solutions have been sparse," he noted.

Feller urged union members to cast their votes on the basis of issues — the "why" of the election rather than the "who"—and warned that "for labor, the decision may become one of survival or surrender."

He asked: "Do you think any of the present Republican candidates would have provided the leadership to elevate the minimum wage, increase social security benefits, provide landmark educational aid programs, push for civil rights, encourage urban renewal, or launch an aggressive program to protect consumers."

These, he said, are what is at stake in the 1968 presidential and congressional elections.

AFL-CIO Brief Contests State Court Injunction

The AFL-CIO has asked the Supreme Court to uphold the claim of the Machinists that federal courts and not state courts have jurisdiction to decide a lawsuit involving a no-strike clause in a collective bargaining agreement.

The suit involves the Avco Corp., major subcontractor making aircraft components at Nashville, Tenn.

In 1965 Avco got a state court injunction restraining IAM Local 735 from striking during the life of a contract. The union removed the suit to the U.S. District Court in Nashville, the company asked that it be returned to the county courts, and appealed to the Supreme Court when two lower federal courts upheld the IAM.

Avco claimed that Local 735 breached a contract clause stating that the union would not "cause or sanction" work stoppages during the contract period. The company told the state court that union members staged several "wildcat" walkouts and on Oct. 15, 1965, called a plant-wide strike of 2,000 production and maintenance workers.

The union and the AFL-CIO filed briefs to support the argument that a civil action based on the claim that a union has breached a no-strike clause is removable to U.S. courts since the claim arises under federal law.

Under the Taft-Hartley Act, the briefs pointed out, a suit alleging labor law violation is within the original jurisdiction of a federal court and must be heard in that court. Further, neither a state court nor a federal court may issue a no-strike injunction in T-H cases, the unions asserted. Such injunctions are forbidden by the Norris-LaGuardia Act, they said.

The IAM related in its brief that the state court injunction was issued without notice to the union, and without the opportunity to present the union side of the case. The U.S. District Court dissolved the injunction about four months after it was issued.

The U.S. Court of Appeals wrote that if the company won its point, "state courts would become the preferred forum" for adjusting lawsuits about no-strike clauses.

"Federal labor policy must have uniform application," the appeals court said. "Congress has declared that injunctions shall not issue to restrain peaceful picketing."

benefits; better insurance and hospital care coverage; an extra paid holiday and other gains.

Moran is director of the union's District 9, Bethlehem, Pa., and Carcella of District 7, Philadelphia. They headed a negotiating committee which bargained under a new procedure set up by the USWA convention last year.

The union won a key objective when the two companies agreed to revise rates in the industry job manual, to accept new job descriptions and new evaluations. The revised rates will give a large number of employes, including skilled trades and crafts, an additional raise of 8.5 cents an hour in the first contract year.

Management agreed to pick up a scheduled $1 raise in medical care rates; raised pension benefits from $5.50 per year of service to $6.50—a new high for the industry; and agreed to a half-cent per hour increment in the second contract year to preserve the current spread between rate groupings.

The new pact provides an additional pension benefit of $10 a month for present retirees; adds a $100 monthly pension for the spouse of a retiree on the latter's death before age 65; and permits retirement after 30 years of service at any age.

The contract term was extended to Feb. 15, 1971, but insurance coverage has a June 1, 1971, expiration date.

Consumer Council Protests:

Forced Insurance Termed 'Trickery'

A Montgomery Ward & Co. practice of charging customers for credit life insurance unless they act to cancel it was denounced as "trickery" by the President's Consumer Advisory Council.

A statement issued for the council by its chairman, Bronson C. LaFollette, Wisconsin attorney general, called upon the firm to halt the practice. Otherwise, Congress should outlaw it, LaFollette said.

The practice, as he explained it, consists of Montgomery Ward's including the charge for life insurance—10 cents monthly per $100 of debt—on bills sent to revolving charge account customers.

This is the first notice most of these customers get of the life insurance plan, LaFollette said. They are required to notify the company if they do not want coverage.

It was estimated that the company had extended the insurance to about 3.5 million of about 6 million customers on its mailing lists. The firm did not push the procedure in some states where laws barred it.

Montgomery Ward's tactics "are overreaching and an unwarranted imposition upon the public," LaFollette said. "They place the burden on the consumer of rescinding a contract he did not make."

The council did not make a judgment on the insurance itself, which purports to assure a dependent of not having to pay up a bill in case of death to the principal wage earner in the family.

However, LaFollette noted that a Montgomery Ward subsidiary company writes the insurance. What the company is really doing, he added is "insuring itself and the consumer is paying the bill."

The main concern of the council, he pointed out, is that "many consumers will not understand the details of this transaction and will fail to take the action necessary to cancel the policy."

If a store wants to sell credit insurance "it should be explained and sold to the customer when he comes into the store," LaFollette said.

The 12-member council, which includes Pres. Louis Stulberg of the Ladies' Garment Workers, examined the Montgomery Ward insurance plan during a two-day meeting in Washington.

It also sent a message to Congress calling for passage of a "comprehensive" truth-in-lending law—one that requires disclosure on interest rates of charge accounts—and continued its studies on consumer credit and household maintenance and repair practices.

In another consumer development, Congress heard how the poor in Washington, D.C. are hoodwinked into paying nearly twice the normal price for appliances and furniture.

In some cases, Federal Trade Commission Chairman Paul R. Dixon testified, low-income retailers inflate sales prices and then quote the customers low finance charges to "give the illusion of cheap credit."

His testimony was based on an FTC survey which compared prices charged by stores in low-income areas with prices of the same items in downtown stores and those in higher-income areas.

He cited the example of a portable television set with a wholesale price of $109. It sold for $129 in downtown department stores, and $219 in a store serving a low-income area.

Dixon testified before a Senate subcommittee for a bill by Sen. Joseph D. Tydings (D-Md.) to regulate financing charges in the District of Columbia. It would eliminate many "damnable practices," Dixon said.

'What Makes You Think We're All the Same?'

Steelworkers Set Goals For New '68 Contracts

Wages, pensions and job security will have high priority when the Steelworkers start bargaining for new contracts this year covering 485,000 workers in the basic steel and aluminum industries, union policymakers have decided.

The union's Intl. Wage Policy Committee met in Washington to formulate policy and to guide union conferences and negotiating committees in seeking new agreements.

Current contracts with major steel companies are terminable Aug. 1, 1968, and in aluminum on June 1.

There is "no mystery," the committee said, about the fact that wages stand "high on our list of priority items."

"The simple fact is that our members and their families face substantially higher costs for the basic essentials of their day-to-day living"—housing, food, clothing, education, transportation, medical care.

The committee said it was concerned not only with general wage increases and classification increases but "in addition there is a pressing need to combat the erosion of real earnings due to future rises in the cost of living."

Its policy decision took account of the profitability and productivity of the industries involved and the sustained growth in the nation's economy. The committee considered the levels of recent settlements in auto, rubber, airlines and trucking. It cited the "greatly increased" living costs and "the urgent need to increase our members' purchasing power and to improve their income security and working conditions."

Further, the statement pointed out, "substantial wage increases are essential" to provide workers with purchasing power "sufficient to absorb the constantly increasing output of goods and services, and to assure continuance of the nation's prosperity and economic expansion."

Closely allied to an appropriate wage scale is a proper job classification structure, it noted. Job rankings are "grossly distorted" by the pattern of incentive wage plans from which many employes are excluded or covered only by inadequate plans, the committeemen said.

Other policy committee objectives:

- Pension programs should be improved by further liberalizing the eligibility requirements, and by reducing the gap between the income received by employes and survivors.
- Shutdown and disability benefits should be provided, or increased where they exist. Widows and widowers should be assured an adequate pension, and vesting provisions should be improved.
- Insurance coverage should be broadened to provide members with "high quality medical care" for themselves and their families and to "protect them against skyrocketing medical care costs." Included in the area needing expansion are mental care, nursing home services, dental care and prescription drugs.

The development of prepaid group practice plans "should be encouraged" so members may participate on an "equitable" basis. Adequate supplemental insurance should be provided also for retired workers.

- Steelworkers should be further protected against the ever-present possibility of unemployment, injury, illness or transfer to lower rated jobs.

Union-Busting Held Aim of Copper Firms

gaining is illegal and must be withdrawn before talks can begin.

Molony said the unions do not now, and never did, ask for industry-wide bargaining but do want uniform wage schedules and fringe benefits in contracts affecting the employes of any one company.

Molony said "we can only hope" the companies recognize the fact that plant-by-plant and union-by-union bargaining "is past for them" and that they "recognize it soon and abandon their efforts at trying to starve their employes into submission."

Molony, who is vice president of the Steelworkers, added that the unions "do want and expect to be able to achieve basically common economic settlements with each company for all properties of that company whose agreements have expired or which are without agreements."

The workers "feel very strongly on this issue," he stressed. Molony said he doubts whether the members of the panel or the unions could persuade the workers "to settle at one property of one of these companies and leave their brothers at another property out on the street walking a picket line."

Molony recited the facts of the negotiations, emphasizing the failure of the copper companies to negotiate in good faith. He cited the "enormous profits" of the copper industry, noted that the wage structure in the industry "borders on the chaotic" and said the industry's pension agreements "are among the worst and have the lowest level of benefits in American history today."

Other witnesses for the unions at panel sessions included Otis Brubaker, director of research for the USWA; Russell Williams, special representative for the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Butte, Mont., and USWA Rep. M. R. Barraza of Tucson, Ariz.

Williams asserted that the industry has shown "a complete disregard for its employes." He stressed that "today we stand as 26 unions united" to get a "decent contract."

The panel conducting the hearings was named by the secretaries of labor and commerce to assist the parties in seeking an "equitable solution" to the long dispute.

NAM Seeks to Arouse Public Against Unions

groundwork for a legislative campaign.

Zinke exhorted his businessmen listeners to see to it that all the audiences they can reach, including lawmakers, "understand the critical need for a broad review and revision of our national labor laws."

The NAM official lashed out at the "bigness" of labor, strikes, "infringements" on management's rights, "extraordinary power" of unions and workers demands for wage increases.

He attacked the "dangerous device" of unions joining in "bargaining coalitions" in large industries, such as the joint negotiating efforts that have occurred in the electrical and copper industries.

He proposed legislation that would prevent "all forms of collusion, coalition and other subtle combinations by which employes seek to bargain jointly."

Other "reforms" called for by Zinke included:

- A guarantee of "management's right to manage" by outlawing the right of unions to negotiate on contracting out of work.
- Legislation to ban "all picketing to obtain bargaining rights," as well as common site, consumer and informational picketing.
- A requirement that unions secure representation only through election. Present procedures to permit recognition through authorization cards would be eliminated.

"It is clear that the road to this reform will have to be the legislative route," Zinke said.

He termed it unlikely that the present "bias" in favor of unions by NLRB and the courts "will change quickly enough to avert the dangers" which they threaten.

"The time is now," he concluded. "Let it not be said that industry side-stepped the challenge for major labor law reform when both the need and opportunity were so clear."

Selma Borchardt Dies in Washington

Selma M. Borchardt, 72, a former Teachers vice president, died in a Washington, D.C. convalescent home following a stroke. Active in AFT from its earliest years, Miss Borchardt served it as a vice president in three different periods between 1924 and 1962. She was a member of standing committees on education in the AFL and then the AFL-CIO.

An English teacher in Washington schools for more than 35 years, she also was a delegate to several White House conferences on education and children. At the time of death, she was executive secretary of the Washington AFT local.

Kaiser Vote Retains Revised Sharing Plan

Fontana, Calif.—Steelworkers employed by Kaiser Steel Corp. here voted 3,293-1,763 to keep the Long Range Sharing Plan first negotiated by union and management in 1962; to extend its term four years and to make two changes in the rules.

Two USWA locals representing production and office employes served notice last September of intent to terminate the plan Oct. 1 and began negotiating changes. The revised plan, approved by officers of Locals 2869 and 3677, will result in higher benefits for workers—from an estimated 20 to 25 cents an hour, effective Feb. 1, a union source reported.

The two unions issued a statement before the vote saying:

"This is not a guarantee of any sort. There may be months when no gains are generated. The formula does not create gains. It measures the gains that are created through cost savings and provides for the sharing of the gains between union and company."

The plan provides that covered employes will divide a 32.5 percent share in cost savings resulting from higher output per man-hour and from more efficient handling of materials.

Under the revised plan, the wage and benefit reserve fund is eliminated and management will pay employes the increased cost of the forthcoming 1968 settlement in basic steel to Kaiser Steel. Also new is a provision that crews operating under the sharing plan may transfer to the company's incentive plan if they prefer.

Smokescreen in Copper

THE AMERICAN trade union movement is determined that the copper industry will not starve its workers into submission by raising false issues that delay an equitable settlement of the seven-month strike.

The false issues were exposed at the public hearings of the panel appointed by the secretaries of labor and commerce. In their presentation the unions made these points:

"The companies and their propaganda bureau have alleged repeatedly that the unions are seeking industry-wide bargaining in copper. This is not true. The unions want equal pay for equal work in the industry. They want common levels of pensions, insurance, job security, paid holidays, shift differentials, etc. throughout the industry.

"The unions could not care less whether there is or is not industrywide bargaining. In any event, we have not requested such. This is not an issue. . . .

"The companies have alleged that the unions are seeking company-wide bargaining. This is so. We have, however, dropped our demand for company-wide contracts, even though they are common to most major companies and would make good sense here.

"We do want and expect to be able to achieve basically common economic settlements with each company for all properties of that company whose agreements have expired or which are without agreements. . . .

"It was to stop this antedated divide-and-rule approach of these powerful companies that our unions banded together in coordinated bargaining. This is an issue."

The Nay-Sayers

THE CONSERVATIVE Republican-Dixiecrat coalition that successfully called the shots in the first session of the 90th Congress has sounded the call to battle against Pres. Johnson's program for the second session.

As the President has spelled out his 1968 legislative program in his major messages to Congress, the coalition has reacted mechanically with its standard "cut the budget, cut spending" and its completely negative views on programs to deal with poverty and the urban crisis.

The President has shaped his program to the bitter realities of defeating aggression in Viet Nam and maintaining a reasonable rate of economic progress at home. There is a note of austerity in the budget in terms of social and economic programs. But even this attempt to balance choices and priorities is too much for the conservative coalition bent on gutting progressive programs.

A long and grim battle may be in store for the Administration's program, especially in the House where the coalition's strength is the dominant factor.

But this struggle may have its beneficial aspects, also, as the irresponsible attacks of the coalition come into the spotlight of an election year.

If any evidence were needed of the necessity of electing liberals and progressives to the 91st Congress, the first session provided plenty. The tone of the coalition's attack at the onset of the second session should remove any lingering hopes that the conservative Republican-Dixiecrat coalition will be a responsible segment of Congress in the second session.

Disregard Extremists:

President Summons Congress To Improve Equal Rights Laws

The following is excerpted from Pres. Johnson's special message to Congress on civil rights legislation.

IN THE STATE OF THE UNION message I spoke of a spirit of restlessness in our land. This feeling of disquiet is more pronounced in race relations than in any other area of domestic concern.

Most Americans remain true to our goal: the development of a national society in which the color of a man's skin is as irrelevant as the color of his eyes.

In the context of our history, this goal will not be easily achieved. But unless we act in our time to fulfill our first creed: that "all men are created equal"—it will not be achieved at all.

For most Americans, the nation's continuing prosperity has meant increased abundance. Nevertheless, as I noted earlier, the unemployment rate for nonwhites has remained at least twice the rate for whites.

Part of the answer lies in job training to overcome educational deficiencies and to teach new skills. I asked the Congress for a $2.1 billion manpower program to assist 1.3 million of our citizens. A special three-year effort will be made to reach 500,000 hard-core unemployed of all races and backgrounds in our major cities.

The law forbids discrimination in employment. And we have worked to enforce that law:

- More than 150 cases of employment discrimination are under investigation by the Department of Justice.
- Lawsuits have been filed to stop patterns and practices of discrimination by employers and unions in the North as well as the South.

But the Justice Department does not bear the major responsibility for enforcing equal employment opportunity. Congress created the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission in 1964 to receive and investigate individual complaints, and to attempt to eliminate unlawful employment practices by the informal methods of conference, conciliation, and persuasion.

Since last September, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has, for the first time, processed more complaints than it has received, thereby reducing its backlog. In the last six months, the commission increased its investigation rate more than 45 percent over the rate for 1966, and doubled the number of conciliations for the same period a year ago.

Yet even this stepped-up activity cannot reach those who will not agree voluntarily to end their discriminatory practices. As a result, only part of our economy is open to all workers on the basis of merit. Part remains closed because of bias.

The legislation that I submitted last year would empower the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to issue, after an appropriate hearing, an order requiring an offending employer or union to cease its discriminatory practices and to take corrective action. If there is a refusal to comply with the order, the Government would be authorized to seek enforcement in the Federal courts.

I urge the Congress to give the Commission the power it needs to fulfill its purpose.

SEGREGATION IN HOUSING compounds the nation's social and economic problems. When those who have the means to move out of the central city are denied the chance to do so, the result is a compression of population in the center. In that crowded ghetto, human tragedies—and crime — increase and multiply. Unemployment and education problems are compounded—because isolation in the central city prevents minority groups from reaching schools and available jobs in other areas.

The fair housing legislation I have recommended would prohibit discrimination in the sale or rental of all housing in the United States. It would take effect in three progressive stages:

- Immediately, to housing presently covered by the Executive Order on equal opportunity in housing.
- Then, to dwellings sold or rented by a nonoccupant, and to units for five or more families.
- And finally to all housing.

It would also:

- Outlaw discriminatory practices in the financing of housing, and in the services of real estate brokers.
- Bar the cynical practice of "block-busting" and prohibit intimidation of persons seeking to enjoy the rights it grants and protects.
- Give responsibility for enforcement to the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development and authorize the Attorney General to bring suits against patterns or practices of housing discrimination.

A fair housing law is not a cure-all for the nation's urban problems. But ending discrimination in the sale or rental of housing is essential for social justice and social progress.

Conversation at the White House

MR. MEANY: Mr. President, this film we are making this morning will be shown to officers and members of our unions throughout the country, mostly the leaders of the American trade union movement at the local level.

I want to express our appreciation and the appreciation of the membership of the AFL-CIO for giving us this opportunity to talk to you about the many issues that we face, as well, perhaps, to talk a little bit about the issues we faced in the past, things that you are interested in and, of course, things that our members are very much interested in; for instance, the question of education, which I am sure you are greatly interested in.

THE PRESIDENT: Mr. Meany, I welcome this opportunity to talk with you and to the officers and members of your unions and specifically on this subject of education.

I was in Congress for 24 years. During that time we talked about education a great deal, and how important it was that we do something about it. But we did very little. We never had any overall comprehensive federal aid to education during that period.

In 1964 and 1965, with the help of the AFL-CIO and the teachers of the country, and the mothers, we promulgated a program and finally passed through Congress a massive educational measure and supplemented it with more than 20 other bills.

The key bill is Elementary and Secondary Education. So as a result, today, the federal government is doing more than three times as much in the field of education as it did four years ago when this Administration began.

FINAL ADJUSTMENTS are made before the cameras roll on "Conversation at the White House"—a frank discussion between President Johnson and AFL-CIO President Meany of the issues involving all Americans.

MR. MEANY: I think that's true. I think actually what happened in '64 and '65 was that for the first time in the history of this country the federal government assumed that there was a federal responsibility for the education of the children of America at every level and that we, of course, have always held as a cherished goal of America's workers, that we would see the day when every boy and girl in this country would get all the education that he or she—that they could assimilate, that they had the aptitude for, and that they would get this irrespective of the economic circumstances from which they sprang.

THE PRESIDENT: That is the objective and the goal of this Administration—to give every boy and girl in this country all the education that he or she can take. Through the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, through the Higher Education Act, we are taking care of the people between the first grade and the college graduates, even the graduate school graduates.

But we have responsibilities even beyond that which we are undertaking. In the Head Start program we are getting the youngster before he gets in the first grade. And in the adult education program, we are going back and taking people who are in their 60's, and some even in their 70's, and giving them adult education programs and teachings.

The sad thing about the world in which we live is that four out of every ten people, Mr. Meany, cannot read and write. This illiteracy and this ignorance is a terrible handicap to peace in the world, because when people are uninformed, and when people are ignorant, they cannot reason and make judgments that they do if they have had the benefits of education.

So not only here in our own country, but throughout the world, one of the Number 1 problems of our time it education and how we can get it to the masses.

We have a massive program in this country. We are going to continue it. We are going to expand it.

MR. MEANY: Well, of course, that's true, of course, that we feel that education and lack of education—illiteracy—makes a contribution toward the development of a situation where peace is not possible.

So we have been in this fight for a long time. For instance, the fight on poverty, the fight for minimum wages—this is not new, this is not new to us, and not new to you. Now, the first of February this year the minimum wage in this country went to $1.60 an hour. The first of February last year there were about 8 million people added to that.

Now, what does this mean? This means in the final analysis that as far as those families are concerned, something concrete has been done in the war on poverty. The minimum wage law is part of the war on poverty. I am sure you can recall, because you were a member of Congress back in 1938, I think it was, somewhere back there, when we passed the first minimum wage law, 25 cents an hour.

You remember that. I am sure you remember that because you voted for it. There were people said then that this was going to bankrupt the country, this was going to be a terrible thing.

Now, in the final analysis, what it does, it brings more and more people into the mainstream of the American economy in the sense that they become purchasers and consumers in the marketplace.

THE PRESIDENT: I have been through several minimum wage fights—the 25 cents an hour one, the $1 an hour one when I was leader in the Eisenhower Administration, when I was Majority Leader of the Senate, and finally the $1.60 that we have worked on the last few years.

I am glad it is going in effect. I think it is absolutely essential that we have some guarantees of some minimum for the people in this country. I remember when we passed the first act we had women, mothers of children, working for 6 and 7 cents an hour in pecan shelling plants in my state. People predicted havoc if we passed a 25-cent minimum wage, just as they do when we take any progressive step in this field.

But it wasn't havoc. It was a substantial improvement for the entire nation. I am very happy that the Congresses of recent years have recognized the necessity for upgrading and keeping these minimums in effect.

MR. MEANY: All of these things are tied together—education, minimum wage, because, as you said before, people today want a better world. We want a better world, and I'm sure the common people all over the world want a better world. All these things help.

THE PRESIDENT: The thing you have done, though, Mr. Meany, that I think is a great monument to the labor movement in this country, to your leadership, and I think to the government as well, is the health program that we have been able to enact into law in the last few years, Medicaid and Medicare, and the some 20-odd supplementary health measures, because it doesn't make any difference how smart a person is, it doesn't make any difference how skilled a person is, if he is in poor health he is not very productive.

So we must take precautionary measures in the health field. We are doing that. In the last few years, as a result of the leadership that labor and its individual members have given to the country and to the Congress, we have been able to pass the Medicare bill and the Medicaid bill, and supplementary health measures that result now in millions of people having a means to pay their doctors' bills, and millions of people who never had means to pay their hospital bill before. They now do not have to rely on their children to take care of them.

MR. MEANY: That's true.

THE PRESIDENT: And we're not going to be satisfied to stop there. We see that because we do not arrest the disease early enough, it brings on great complications and cost us much more.

MR. MEANY: You talk about health, and of course this leads you into another subject in which you are interested, and that is rebuilding the cities of America, because we have conditions in a number of our cities that are certainly, to say the least, unhealthy, and causing us a great many problems, and we, too, would like to see something done.

I hope that Congress is more cooperative in this coming session in going along with your program for helping the cities of America rebuild, because all of these things are tied together—the minimum wage, health, Medicare, urban renewal and all this sort of thing—and, of course, this brings us to a great big subject I am sure you must be interested in, and that is an overall housing program. Are we going to have an overall housing program this year? I hope we are.

THE PRESIDENT: We are. The greatest challenge that this Congress faces, really, in the domestic field, is the problem of the cities. I have a commission that has carefully gone into that and studied it. It is headed up by some of the ablest men in this country.

We know that the problems of the cities are many. First, we have some 500,000 hard-core unemployed people in those cities who are frustrated, that have no jobs, that have nothing to do. Our first problem is to try to find employment and training for that minimum, hard-core group that causes us problems in the cities.

The second thing is to get an overall housing program, certainly a program particularly for the poor, because we have had relatively a few thousand units built each year and there are more of them deteriorating and going out of date than new ones are replacing them. So we are having a minimum 10-year housing program where we hope that we can add not just a few thousand, but millions of homes for low-income people in this country.

We anticipate that this year we will have a minimum of 300,000 new homes, instead of the 35,000 or 45,000 that we have had for poor and low-income groups.

We must, Mr. Meany, find some way in this country to find a decent, a sanitary, a structurally sound house at as low a cost possible for our poor and low-income groups. Now, if we can go to the moon, and if we can perform all these other feats of science, we have got to find the answer to low-income housing, and we haven't done that in our cities.

This Administration had a committee working under the direction of Mr. Edgar Kaiser. We are hoping that we can present to the Congress a program that the Congress will adopt that will launch us on a 10-year housing effort that will result in millions of new homes for the people who need them most

MR. MEANY: Well, I am sure that you find that the AFL-CIO will be back of you in this effort.

Mr. President, the subject of education, housing, poverty, minimum wages, all of these things are related. But they bring to mind another question, and that is this question of crime, crime in the streets that people are talking about today. This, too, is one of your problems.

THE PRESIDENT: Mr. Meany, that is one of the major problems facing this country. Now, what are we going to do about it?

First, if we are going to do something about crime, we are going to have to do something about what causes crime. Unemployment, ignorance, disease, filth, poor housing, congestion, discrimination—all of these things contribute to the great crime wave that is sweeping over this country. We are going to, through our poverty program, through our education program, through our conservation-recreation program, try to get at some of the causes of crime.

But in addition to that, the federal government cannot ever develop into a police state and have its base here in Washington. Our Founding Fathers protected against that when they wrote the Constitution. So this is a problem that begins first in the home with the parents.

Someone said to me when I was home during the holidays that it would be a good thing if all parents could say "Where are our children?" at 11:00 or 12:00 o'clock in the evening. "What are they doing? Do the parents know?"

So the problem begins at the home. And then if the laws are violated, the law enforcement is local law enforcement. The federal government cannot pick the chief of police in a given city. The federal government can't select the sheriff. The federal government doesn't select the local judges. And law enforcement is a local matter, with the local people, in a local community, and in the state.

Now, we are doing everything we can to give the maximum amount of assistance to the cities and to the states. But, as I say, it is a problem of the home, it is a problem of the local community, it is a problem of the state, and the federal government has many suggestions. It has recommended a gun control bill. It has recommended a safe streets bill. It has recommended to provide research assistance and counseling with the cities and with the states.

But no one wants a federal police force and the federal government cannot, by itself, control crime. It can only supplement what the local authorities do, and that we are going to do.

MR. MEANY: Well, as I see it, it is a problem that has got to be approached in two ways: Number One, you have got to have law enforcement, because while we realize that it is the ghettos and the disease and the poverty that provide the atmosphere for this type of local crime, it is the people in the ghettos in most cases are the victims.

THE PRESIDENT: They are the ones that suffer most.

MR. MEANY: They are the ones that suffer most from these riots, from these crimes, and there are people with criminal minds who take advantage of these conditions. So I think what we have got to do, we have got to eliminate the conditions to whatever extent we can, and as rapidly as we can, but at the same time we have got to have respect for law, because if we don't have respect for law, we won't even be able to eliminate these conditions.

THE PRESIDENT: I heartily agree with you, and I think that one of the most important bills that the Congress will have to face up to this coming year will be the safe streets bill that I recommended last year, and I hope the Congress will enact this year; the gun control bill; and the other measures that will get at the cause of crime and also provide a remedy.

MR. MEANY: Yes, because just strict law enforcement might help, but it will not solve the problem. We have got to have law enforcement, and we have got to have a program to eliminate the conditions that breed crime in our cities. I think we have a two-pronged approach in this thing.

THE PRESIDENT: If we attack the discrimination problem, if we attack the poverty problem, if we find jobs, if we can provide decent housing, if we can help rebuild our cites, we can get at some of these causes. But the local law enforcement has got to be done at the local level. This begins in the home. This beings in local conditions.

We can help them. We can supplement them, but we must not supplant them.

MR. MEANY: I agree with you completely.

I would like to bring up one other subject that I think is important. Don't you agree with us that we can do all these things and still keep our commitments to the other nations of the world, to the free people of the world? You see, we are always up against this argument that, well, we can't support the efforts of the people of South Viet Nam to retain their freedom and independence which we are committed to do—we can't do that and at the same time do all these things on the home front.

We think America is big enough to do both.

THE PRESIDENT: America is big enough to do both. It can do both, Mr. Meany, and I believe that it will do both. This argument that is used that because we are trying to protect freedom in some part of the world we can't protect our people at home is a phony argument. It is an excuse.

Now, it is true that we do have to forego some of the things. We can't do everything at once. We can't correct the neglect of centuries in a day. But we can try and we can make a start and we can get on our way. That we definitely are doing.

I am the father of two daughters. When I hear this argument that we can't protect freedom in Europe, in Asia, or in our own Hemisphere and still meet our domestic problems, I think it is a phony argument. It is just like my saying that I can't take care of Luci because I have Lynda Bird. We have to take care of both of them and we have to meet them head on.

Here is a nation with more people employed than ever in our history. Here is a nation with people working at better wages than ever in our history. Here is a time when our profits are higher than ever in our history. Here is a time when we have had 82 months of prosperity in this nation. Here is a time when we have the greatest gross national product that we have ever had, and we are spending $25 billion in protecting freedom in Asia. To say out of the $800 billion we make, and the $25 we have to spend in Southeast Asia, that the other $775 shouldn't be used for the benefit of the people is just a very poor excuse.

We must educate our children. We can't neglect them. We must provide health for our people. We can't neglect it. We must provide conservation of our resources in this country. We cannot neglect that. We must find jobs for those who want jobs and who need jobs, and we are going to do it by encouraging private industry and the labor unions and the government to work hand in hand in these matters, as we have been in the more recent years past.

There is no group that has been more helpful to bringing prosperity to this country and to launching a program for the benefit of all the people of this country than the AFL-CIO under your leadership.

I am happy to say that the businessmen generally have tried to listen and to be cooperative. I am hopeful in the days ahead that we can enact through the Congress a job program, a housing program, additional education measures, provide for additional steps that we ought to take in the health field, and at the same time protect freedom.

It is just a bunch of balarney that we can take care of one need we have and have to ignore all the others. It's just the same as saying you can take care of one child and you can't take care of the other.

MR. MEANY: I'm quite sure we have the same faith in America that you have; that America is big enough and strong enough to do this. Insofar as our commitments in Far East Asia are concerned, we in the trade union movement are very practical people. We know from experience what dictatorship means. We know it before anybody else knows it, because if anybody is going to dictate any place in this world he must control the means of production. They can wait awhile about controlling the artists or the scientists or the writers, but they can't wait insofar as the worker is concerned. They have got to control him immediately. This is what Hitler did. This is what Mussolini did and this is what Stalin did and Lenin, when they came to power 50 years ago in the Soviet Union. They took control of the workers.

So we are more keenly aware of what dictatorship means. This is why we feel that you just can't stand by and see two or three million people go down the drain and hope that that's the end of it, because we are convinced that if we step aside, if we withdraw from Viet Nam, that you are not going to satisfy the appetite of these people who believe in dictatorship. They will move down Southeast, and the next thing you know they will be in the Philippines, and you know what that would mean to us.

So we are convinced that you are on the right track. The American trade union movement, as represented by the AFL-CIO, made it crystal clear at its last convention that we support the policy in Viet Nam of fighting for the freedom of those people and that we also believe that we can do that and continue the Johnson program to make this a better nation for all of the American people.

BRIEF INTERMISSION in the filming came when President Johnson went to his office to study a report needing immediate attention. At the President's invitation, he was joined by (from left) Andrew J. Biemiller, director, AFL-CIO Department of Legislation; Albert J. Zack, director, Department of Public Relations; Lane Kirkland, executive assistant AFL-CIO President George Meany; Presidential Assistant Marvin Watson, Alexander Barkan, director, AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, and President Meany.

THE PRESIDENT: Mr. Meany, our people are peace-loving people. We seek no war. We want peace in the world. But we have learned some things from participation in World War I and World War II and the Korean War and other disturbances in recent years, and that is that you cannot successfully appease an aggressor. If you run and if you hide and if you let aggression spread, the time comes when you must face up to it sooner or later.

Now, we have the will for peace. We have the machinery for peace. No one in the world wants peace more than I do. I live with war 24 hours a day. I read the casualty lists every morning. But I know that until the enemy, the Communist enemy, is willing to genuinely and sincerely sit down and talk about peace in good faith, that we shouldn't hold out all these illusions and all these hopes that can't be realized to our people.

So the best road to peace that I know of is to remain strong, and remain firm, and to stand on principle. We haven't had an appeaser President in my lifetime. Every President that has preceded me has stood on the principle that when we were called upon to resist aggression and to perform under the treaties that this country had entered into, that the word of the United States could be depended on. As long as I am President, we are going to keep our word.

We are not going to let any of our nations who are bound to us by treaties and alliances be gobbled up by any would-be conqueror, any would-be dictator, while we stand by under an umbrella. Now, if they want to talk peace and if they will agree to self-determination in South Viet Nam, we are willing to meet them at the conference table tomorrow.

We said in San Antonio, we will stop our bombing now if you will come and have a prompt discussion and a productive discussion in good faith. You can make all the proposals you want to. We will make our proposals. We will exchange views.

But they have not accepted that proposal.

Now, I don't know how much further I can go. I don't think it would be in the interest of this nation for us to stop our bombing, only to have them to continue theirs. A bomb dropped from a bicycle can kill as many people as a bomb dropped from a plane. It is rather ridiculous for some of our people to say "You ought to stop bombing," and then when I say, "Well, will we have a prompt discussion?" They say, "We don't know."

We don't have the answer. "Will they have a productive discussion?" "Well, we don't know." "Will they talk about just North Viet Nam? That's what indicated. That problem is in South Viet Nam."

So we must pursue and explore the meaning of these so-called offers so that we don't buy a pig in a poke and so we don't repeat the errors of Panmunjom and we don't let the Communists lead us down a road that we don't know where we are going.

MR. MEANY: I think in exploring, Mr. President, we should also take into consideration the fact that every bombing pause we have had has resulted in an immediate Communist buildup that has cost American lives. So those who want us to stop the bombing, and stop it without qualification, I would like to ask them how many American lives do we have to lose before we start bombing again in case the Communists don't come to the conference table.

This is the problem, and I know this is your problem.

THE PRESIDENT: It is, and we live with it every day. We have the professionals who have rendered great service in our foreign policy field for many years and they are taking every word that is said and exploring it in every place they can in an attempt to find a reasonable way to get to the peace table. But until the enemy is willing to go to the peace table, and is willing to say if you stop your bombing he will promptly come and talk, and that we can have productive discussions, and that he will not take advantage of our restraint to put extra pressure on during that period, then I think that we would be endangering the lives of our men, and some men don't have that responsibility. But as Commander-in-Chief I do have, and I must take that into consideration before I make these decisions. We are going to continue to search every day for peace, but a peace with honor.

The film "Conversation at the White House" was produced by the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education. It was filmed in the Fish Room at the White House for showing initially to the 1968 COPE area conferences, the first one scheduled for Feb. 3 in New Orleans.

This is an exact transcript of the unrehearsed and spontaneous conversation between President Johnson and AFL-CIO President George Meany.

Information about additional copies of the film and this section of the AFL-CIO News can be obtained from Alexander Barkan, director of COPE, at 815 Sixteenth Street NW, Washington, D.C. 20006.

MR. MEANY: I am sure that the American people are in agreement, Mr. President. They want peace, but they want peace with honor, and they don't want peace at a sacrifice of our good word and a sacrifice of our commitments that we have made.

On behalf of the American trade union movement, I can say to you we are with you in this effort. I want to thank you very much for giving us this time and letting us know what is on your mind, so our members can listen in and certainly get closer to you and your problems as a result. Thank you very much.

As you have just heard, the President of the United States and we share the same views on the critical issues of the day. We share, as well, with Lyndon Johnson the same hopes and aspirations for a better America.

In a few short months, the American people will be going to the polls to decide these issues by choosing a President, a Vice President, and a Congress. They will decide whether we will march forward to new legislative victories or whether the gains we have already made and our unions which made them possible will be attacked.

As I have often said before, elections are not won in Washington. They are won back home. And they are won by you, the leaders of the labor movement.

So I urge you to start now. Get your registration drives underway. Collect the COPE dollars which are so necessary to the campaign. Make sure your members and their families and their neighbors know the issues, know the voting record of the candidates, know who is a friend and who is not, and get out the vote on election day.

In a very real sense, you, the leaders of the labor movement, will decide the 1968 election. I am confident you will do the job.

Government's Role Scored:

Strike in Viet Nam Points Up Crucial Role of Free Unions

By Harry Goldberg
AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs

THE EVENTS which led to the electrical workers' strike in Viet Nam go as far back as last August when the CVT Electrical Workers Union began negotiations with the electric power concerns (CEE). These were French owned but were due to be taken over by the South Vietnamese government by January 1.

The workers asked for severance pay from the company prior to the government takeover, also a 15 percent increased cost-of-living-allowance and a 13th month end-of-year bonus. While the workers were negotiating with the company, the company, in turn, was negotiating with the government to get paid for its assets upon takeover.

It is not our purpose, however, to go into the lengthy details of these three-cornered negotiations, nor is it our province or intention to analyze or judge the demands which the union raised. The CVT is a mature and responsible organization that can be trusted to adequately and justly defend the legitimate interests of its members. It needs no outside advice nor interference.

What does concern the AFL-CIO, however, is the abridgement of legitimate democratic rights by the representatives of the government in a labor dispute and the use of methods which, for all practical purposes, broke the strike. This the AFL-CIO condemns.

The strike was proclaimed on the morning of January 11. Negotiations between the two parties started soon thereafter at the Ministry of Labor. The union negotiators were led by Vo Van Tai, chairman of the Saigon Council of Trade Unions, the government team by the Minister of Public Works. At 7:30 p.m. of the same day, while the negotiations were still going on at the Labor Ministry, the police entered the negotiation meeting room and arrested six leaders of the strike, Vo Van Tai, and five others, and took them to jail.

The strike continued on January 12. The power stations were manned by Army engineers. Sympathy strikes were declared by other CVT affiliates (port workers, petroleum workers, bus workers, transport workers etc.). Government representatives sounded out the arrested leaders in jail whether they would end the strike. The answer was, "No negotiations behind bars."

In the meantime, President Buu of the CVT was continuously active. He had meetings with Vice President Ky, with General Khanh, Commander of the 11th Corps, an influential military leader and (by telephone) with the Minister of Interior, General Vien. Buu explained the reasons for the strike, defended the justice of the demands and the patience of the workers who had sought a peaceful solution for five months. He protested the arrest of the six trade union leaders.

In spite of some difference of opinion in the top hierarchy of the government, on January 13 Prime Minister Loc signed a decree "requisitioning" striking workers. Five truckloads of police, under the personal direction of police chief, General Loan, went to CVT headquarters and ordered all striking workers back to work. Hundreds of others received personal "requisition orders" to report back to work. Thus was the strike virtually broken.

ON THE EVENING of January 15 President Buu met with Prime Minister Loc, but to no avail. On January 16, the CVT announced that it was calling an end to all strikes in the interest of not disturbing the population before the Vietnamese New Year, "Tet." Workers were asked to return to their jobs the next morning.

Though temporarily "settled," the situation remained uncertain and confused. The workers were smarting at the injustices perpetrated. Further trouble threatened. The CVT demanded the release of the six jailed leaders.

The government, on its part, cooled off a bit and tried to mollify the CVT. First, five of the six leaders were released from jail, and later the sixth, Vo Van Tai. The Minister of Labor personally told Buu that the government had no desire to destroy the CVT or even to hurt it. Negotiations at the Ministry of Labor were resumed and it was reported that the government had agreed to a 12 percent increase to be applied retroactively to the last 4 months of '67, and a New Year's allowance of half-a-month's pay.

If the government carries out this agreement and yields to the demands of the union that the charges against the arrested leaders be quashed and that nobody be brought up for trial before a military tribunal (something that at the moment of writing still seems to be pending) then further trouble might be avoided.

THE AFL-CIO WOULD REMIND those who (legitimately disturbed by the forcible disruption by the police of the negotiations and the arrest of the six leaders) have brought into question support of the South Vietnamese cause as such, of the fundamental difference pertaining between South Viet Nam and the Communist dictatorship in North Viet Nam. After all, a strike was proclaimed by an independent trade union movement even during a war. That trade union organization is still protesting and demanding redress.

The government has given some indications of reconsideration and retreat. The Senate of South Viet Nam has announced that it is investigating the strike, and that its investigating committee will report to a plenary session of the Senate on February 8. Democratic concerns and criticism and defense are very much alive in South Viet Nam.

To ask whether these things would be possible in the North is to answer the question. There are no free unions in the North, no strikes or protests of any kind are possible or conceivable, any attempt at such would be met by instant repression, imprisonment or execution.

Finally, we would urge the government to drop the charges against the leaders, especially the prospect of being tried before a military tribunal, and restore the atmosphere of peaceful negotiations. Abridgement of basic and legitimate democratic rights can only compromise and make more difficult the struggle against Communist conquest and dictatorship.

2,000 Complete Course:

Laborers Look to Expansion Of Skill-Upgrading Program

RAPID EXPANSION of its new skill-upgrading program to prepare members for better-paid jobs is anticipated by the Laborers union.

Reporting on the first year of the union's program, Vice Pres. Vernie Reed said that 2,000 have already completed the course. He noted growing interest and cooperation in the program from both the federal government and contractors' associations.

Launched last year under a $1.5 million contract between the union and the federal government, the program was quickly expanded when the demand for trained and experienced laborers outstripped original estimates, Reed said. He made the statements on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference.

Reed said that a large percentage of the union's members taking the training are from minority groups that often have high jobless rates.

The union official predicted that the Model Cities program will further expand the need for the kind of trained and experienced laborers coming out of the union's worker-education program.

A GREAT MANY of them will come from the blighted areas to be renewed under the Model Cities program, he noted, and declared: "We intend to make them welcome in our union . . . and cooperate in every way possible, with all of our resources and manpower, to help these individuals help themselves."

"The native ability is there; the desire is there; and now, the opportunity is going to follow," he asserted.

Reporters questioning Reed on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. EST on the Mutual Radio Network, were Neil Gilbride, labor reporter for the Associated Press, and Murray Seeger, Washington correspondent for the Los Angeles Times.

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA BRITANNICA tells us that primitive people "thought that they had been blessed or cursed simply because they possessed gold nuggets or objects of art" made of gold and there are still lots of economic primitives among us who still look at gold as an object of reverence and worship. But that day seems finally coming to an end.

The Johnson Administration has asked Congress to remove the 25 percent gold cover that still applies to Federal Reserve notes and the U.S. and Treasury notes of 1890—a coverage that ties up some $10.7 billion of those diminishing piles of gold bricks that we still so carefully guard at Fort Knox.

For economic conservatives the thought of removing the gold coverage is a form of economic treason even though it is more than 30 years since any American could go to the government and demand gold for his Federal Reserve notes and deposits. Like the primitives of old, they still cling to gold as a fetish that can bring blessings or curses.

Yet the role of gold in the modern world has been far from as immutably powerful as many seem to think. Actually a gold standard of currency in modern terms dates back only to 1821 when it was put into operation by Great Britain. Before that silver had been the standard. Even then it was not until 1870 that a full gold standard went into operation in most countries.

By the time of the outbreak of World War I in 1914, the gold standard was in trouble once more and while it came back at the end of the war the great depression of the Thirties did it in again. When the United States deliberately devalued the dollar in 1934, the gold bloc collapsed and it has never been the same since.

The 25 percent gold coverage that hung on and that the Johnson Administration wants to get rid of is one of its last vestiges and, as Treasury-Sec. Henry H. Fowler told Congress, has been "outmoded" and should be removed.

As Secretary Fowler put it, it is a matter of simple arithmetic: We have $12 billion in gold. The present cover requirement is $10.7 billion. That leaves $1.3 billion for international purposes. A normal increase in Federal Reserve notes will absorb more than $500 million annually and a further $150 million will go for domestic, artistic and industrial purposes. Add and subtract and in two years we have nothing left for international purposes.

THE STRENGTH of the American economy in terms of growth has long been a labor goal. In 1965, the AFL-CIO testified before the Senate Banking Committee in favor of removing the 25 percent gold cover.

The burden of its argument was that the American economy needed a growth policy if it was to meet the job needs of the unemployed and that the 25 percent gold cover could be used "as a dangerous curb on monetary expansion."

"The gold cover should have been removed long ago, in an atmosphere of calm appraisal, at a time when the balance-of-payments deficit was declining when the gold outflow was small," its spokesman said. "At such time, the rational act of completely removing the gold cover would not have caused a flurry of concern."

His words were prophetic.

At the same time he sounded a warning that still has validity. He warned that the issue of the gold cover must not be viewed in a vacuum, that it should be examined against a backdrop of our national needs, both domestic and international.

"It would be tragic, for example," he said, "if the gold cover were removed completely or in part—and if such action were accompanied by a restrictive tight-money policy, as some people propose."

He also called for pressure against the large-scale and sometimes unpredictably sudden outflows of private investment to foreign countries. "Such flights of private American investment funds—both short-term and long-term—need national supervision and temporary restriction if the balance-of-payments deficit is to be reduced."

Such restrictions are now being applied by the Johnson Administration.

THE LABORERS union's new skill-upgrading program for its members will grow rapidly, Laborers' Vice Pres. Vernie Reed (center), predicted on Labor News Conference. Reporters Neil Gilbride, left, of the Associated Press, and Murray Seeger, Los Angeles Times, questioned Reed on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. EST on Mutual Radio.

SUGAR PLANTATION workers in Louisiana used to live in former slave quarters (top photo) and some still do. But an agricultural workers' local of the Meat Cutters is building a community of homeowners from its headquarters. In bottom photo, sugar workers invest their own efforts to pay for down payment on low-cost homes. With the investment of labor and low-cost loans through the Farmers Home Administration, the monthly payments are within reach of these plantation workers. The union also serves as a center for voting registration and job training.

Joint Effort Means New Homes For Sugar Plantation Workers

A small local of sugar plantation workers in southern Louisiana has declared its own war on poverty conditions—and is winning it.

Only recently, many of its members were living in rundown shacks without running water. Now a group of them live in new houses, modest but comfortable and with all the modern conveniences.

This big miracle in the small town of Edgard, La., was not easy. It took the initiative of a few dedicated men, government help in financing and, most importantly, mutual self-help on the part of the plantation workers.

The first 10 houses in the "Union Homes Project" have been dedicated and are occupied by families who moved out of ramshackle former slave quarters near a sugar mill. Dozens of other houses are under construction in this cooperative effort, with a goal of 100 houses in each sugar county.

The prime movers behind this self-help movement are Frank Lapeyrolerie, secretary-treasurer of Local 300 of the Meat Cutters; H. L. Mitchell, representative of the union's Agricultural and Allied Industries Dept. and Rev. Louis J. Twomey, director of the Human Relations Institute at Loyola University in New Orleans.

These men were attending a White House Conference on Human Problems and Housing and raised the question of how to get help in replacing rural slums. They were directed to a federal agency and this was followed by a meeting Father Twomey arranged with Farmers Home Administration state and local officials. Thus the financing was set.

Self-Help Plan

For manpower, Lapeyrolerie organized the interested plantation workers into self-help groups of 10 families each. For guidance, Lapeyrolerie obtained the cooperation of Paul Richard, a local builder. The federal government paid the salary of the construction supervisor.

Each man working on a house received a credit of at least $1.40 an hour, which became part of his equity on the new home.

The completed house and lot, valued at $9,000, costs the plantation worker about $5,600, a sum financed by the federal agency at 4 percent. The $3,400 balance represents the value of the labor contributed by the family in building the dwelling.

The loan is repayable in monthly installments of $31, plus $5 for insurance.

The new houses have three bedrooms, bath, kitchen, utility room and a combination living and dining room.

The difference a house makes was expressed by Mrs. Raymond Lumas, mother of eight. In the old house, she said, "There was no running water, no bathtub, no nothing." It was "full of holes" and "filled with roaches and rats."

Another new owner, Paul Rainey, commented that now "we don't have to get up at night and move the furniture around when it rains."

This demonstration of successful self-help has inspired a flood of applications to Local 300.

For U.S. Employes:

Bipartisan Unit Asks Hatch Act Reforms

A bipartisan commission appointed to recommend changes in the Hatch Act has recommended after a year of study some loosening of the stringent prohibitions against political activity by federal employes.

It said federal employes should be allowed to hold a local political office, provided it is not full time, the pay is nominal and the head o the employe's agency approves.

A 12-member panel headed by Arthur S. Flemming (R), former secretary of health, education and welfare as chairman and Sen. Daniel B. Brewster (D-Md.) as vice chairman sent the President and Congress additional recommendations for a bill they said was designed to "strike a fair and workable balance" between the right of an American citizen to have a voice in the affairs of government and the need for integrity in governmental affairs supervised by an "impartial civil service free from partisan politics."

At hearings before the commission the AFL-CIO and representatives of public workers unions called for modernization of the act. Thomas E. Harris, AFL-CIO associate general counsel, told the commission portions of the act are "too broad" as to workers covered and the type of prohibited activity and that interpretations of the act by the Civil Service Commission have been "excessively broad."

The Commission on Political Activity of Government Personnel proposed to expand, within limits, the area of political activity permitted federal employes, and to "expand even more the area of such activity permitted under federal law for state and local employes administering the ever-increasing number "of federally-financed programs, while strengthening sanctions at all levels against "coercion and misuse of official position."

The commission made these recommendations:

- Public employes should be permitted to express their opinions freely in private and in public on any political subject or candidate.
- The law regulating political activity of government personnel should specify in readily understandable terms those political activities which are prohibited, and specifically permit all others.
- The distinction between local political offices which can be campaigned for and held by federal employes, and those which cannot, should be based on the nature of the office itself without reference to a partisan or nonpartisan distinction or geographic area.
- At the federal level, the U.S. Civil Service Commission should have sole responsibility for enforcement. Its jurisdiction should be extended to cover not only merit system employes but also exempted employes over whom the employing agency now has enforcement jurisdiction.
- Enforcement of the Hatch Act should be strengthened and made more flexible by adding to the present criminal penalties administrative sanctions and procedures.
- The states should be encouraged to develop systems for controlling political activities, comparable to the federal system.

The commission recommended that the CSC should study and report on the feasibility of establishing a plan of voluntary political contributions like similar programs in private industry.

W. C. O'Neill Dies At 82, Leader in UA

San Francisco—William C. O'Neill, retired secretary-treasurer of the Plumbers, died here at 82 and was buried after services in St. Stephen's Church.

Union officers who attended included Sec.-Treas. Martin J. Ward, Leslie Dilg, his assistant, and all six vice presidents — J. C. Archambault, Harry R. Shaw, Thomas E. Hambly, Regis C. Aiken, William Levine and Charles J. Simonin, union board members.

O'Neill retired Feb. 28, 1966 after 43 years of union service as business agent of Atlantic City, N.J., Local 121; general organizer in the southwest; secretary-treasurer of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. of the former AFL; and secretary-treasurer from 1958 to his retirement.

O'Neill was an early member of the National Joint Board for the Settlement of Jurisdictional Disputes in the building industry. In 1953 and 1959 he was a worker delegate to meetings of the Intl. Labor Organizations' building, civil engineering and public works committee in Geneva, Switzerland.

Survivors include four sons and two sisters.

A message of sympathy from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler termed O'Neill "a true trade unionist" who had served "the entire trade union movement and his fellow workers with dedication and devotion."

Union Victory Held Valid In Spite of Glass of Beer

The National Labor Relations Board should not penalize a union because a board agent drank a glass of beer with a union organizer, a court has ruled.

U.S. District Judge John J. Sirica upheld the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers in a case involving an election May 3 at the Sturbridge, Mass. plant of Athbro Precision Engineering Corp.

IUE won the election but the NLRB refused to certify it as bargaining representative because a board agent was seen drinking a glass of beer at a nearby cafe before the polls reopened for the evening. This was a violation of rules for the conduct of elections, the board said in ordering a new vote.

IUE asked for a restraining order, saying the NLRB abused its discretion. The judge agreed. He ruled its refusal to certify deprived the union of its lawful right to represent the employes and was "arbitrary and capricious."

LBJ Budget Geared to Defense Needs

'Selective' Hikes Set For Domestic Areas

President Johnson has sent Congress a $186.1 billion budget geared to the "very large" costs of defending freedom and the necessity of choosing carefully "among the many competing demands on our resources."

The budget combines a "selective expansion" in areas that cannot be delayed, "delay and deferments" in programs not immediately vital to national objectives and "basic changes, reforms or reductions" in programs no longer meeting present needs, the President declared.

The President stressed throughout his message the need for a 10 percent income tax surcharge, noting that "it is not the rise in regular budget outlays which require a tax increase but the cost of Viet Nam."

The country is spending 3 percent of the gross national product for the war in Viet Nam, the President said, or about $25 billion annually. But, he pointed out, other outlays, not including social insurance trust funds, have been declining as a share of the total value of goods and services produced—from 14.6 percent in 1965 to an estimated 13.9 percent in fiscal 1969.

Two-Party Project

The new unified budget presented to Congress resulted from recommendation of a bipartisan commission last year and includes receipts and expenditures from trust funds, making the totals larger than in former years.

The President said that revenues for the 12-month period starting July 1, 1968 would be $178.1 billion, including funds from the proposed surcharge, leaving an overall deficit of $8 billion. For the fiscal year 1968, ending June 30, 1968, the deficit is estimated at $19.8 billion, the President said, noting that this new budget would reduce the deficit by $11.8 billion.

The $186.1 billion budget, the President pointed out, represented an actual increase of $10.4 billion from the current fiscal year with $3.3 billion of the increase going for national defense; $4.2 billion for social insurance programs, chiefly social security and medicare; $1.6 billion for civilian and military government pay increases; $1.3 billion for fixed charges such as interest, veterans pensions, etc.

The President earmarked $79.8 billion for national defense, $71.8 billion for "relatively uncontrollable civilian programs" and $39.5 billion for relatively controllable programs.

In the application of "rigorous priorities," the President cited selective increases for manpower training, model cities, crime control, health care for mothers and infants, air and water pollution control and educational research.

These and other programs, he stressed, "respond to the most urgent needs of our nation today—the basic problems of poverty, crime and the quality of our environment . . . We can ignore these problems only at grave risk of harm in the fabric of our society."

Among the agencies listed for program reduction and reform—with cuts below the 1968 program level as funded by Congress—were: Agriculture, $197 million; Commerce, including ship construction, $163 million; Health, Education & Welfare, $400 million; Housing and Urban Development, $62 million; Interior $61 million; space program, $447 million; small business, $90 million. The total projected by the President is $1.6 billion.

However, total 1969 fiscal outlays for housing and community development, health, labor and welfare and education show an increase over 1968 of about $6 billion.

The President requested $2.5 billion for the foreign aid economic assistance program and called for extension of the Food for Freedom program beyond its Dec. 31, 1968 expiration date.

User Taxes Next

He said he would ask Congress to approve a series of user taxes in road, air and water transportation, extension of plane and auto excise taxes beyond Apr. 1, 1968 as well as authority for lifting the ceiling on FHA and VA interest rates above the current levels.

Noting his earlier request for a $2.1 billion job training program, the President said he would seek legislation also to update the unemployment insurance program by extending coverage, raising benefit levels and increasing their duration.

The President estimated that under a wide range of federal programs aid to the poor would be increased by $2.9 billion in the fiscal 1969 budget to $27.7 billion, compared to $12.5 billion in 1963.

He said that the number of people living in poverty fell from over 35 million to less than 29 million since 1963, and from 19 percent of our population to under 15 percent. "But 29 million poor people are still far too many," he stressed.

prosperity, noting that "the American people have enjoyed exceptional economic benefits" but that these benefits also confer obligations.

The 14.5 million families with incomes above $10,000 a year, he said, "have a special obligation to the more than 10 million households still in poverty." The increase in real per capita income over the seven years of $820 exceeds the current total average per capita income "in nations with 70 percent of the world's population."

'Inescapable' Duty

This, he added, "makes inescapable the obligation of the American people for helping to maintain security and for providing economic assistance to the developing world."

The priority problems in 1968, the President said, are to put "our fiscal affairs in order," "slow down the wage-price spiral," restore equilibrium to international accounts, deal more effectively with the urban problems and expand opportunities for all citizens.

The President said that the $61 billion increase in the GNP is based on passage of his 10 percent income tax surcharge proposal and —assuming that "fiscal restraint is forthcoming" — congressional approval of the fiscal 1969 budget.

Restraint Asked

In terms of the balance of payments deficit and the strain on the dollar, the President declared "we must also exert every effort to avoid the possible destructive effects on our trade surplus of strikes or the threat of strikes in key industries."

The road to price stability, he stressed, includes keeping the average gain in wages and fringe benefits in new labor contracts in line with gains in productivity and to have business absorb cost increases and restrain their price hikes.

The President specifically said he would propose new measures to "slow down the spiraling cost of health care."

On the 1968 outlook the Council of Economic Advisers said that with the 4 percent real increase in the GNP and expected growth of 1.75 percent in the civilian labor force, the unemployment rate "for the year as a whole should be essentially unchanged from its current level." The 1967 rate was 3.8 percent, unchanged from 1966.

Wages Up

The council reported that collective bargaining settlements in 1967 averaged about 5.5 percent a year, "well in excess of settlements in 1966." It said 20 percent of all workers affected by new contracts received annual increases in compensation exceeding 6 percent.

Discussing the possible alternatives, the council discarded mandatory wage-price controls as "folly," noting that "although such controls may be unfortunately popular when they are not in effect, the appeal quickly disappears once people live under them."

Turning to the wage-price guideposts, the council said it would be "inappropriate" to set a "numerical target" for wage increases. But to slow down the rate of price increases it suggested that the average of new union settlements should be "appreciably lower" than the 5.5 percent in 1967 and for business to "avoid any widening of their gross margins over direct costs."

In the face of the 3 percent increase in consumer prices in 1967, the council said, "it would be patently unrealistic to expect labor to accept increases in money wages which would represent essentially no improvement in real hourly income."

15 Job Corps Centers Scheduled for Closing

The Office of Economic Opportunity announced that 15 Job Corps centers will be closed and some other phases of the anti-poverty program trimmed to fit budget cuts imposed by Congress.

Congress appropriated $1.7 billion for the anti-poverty program for the current fiscal year instead of the $2.06 billion requested by Pres. Johnson. The President then made a $10 million cutback in the Job Corps budget and shifted funds to job-finding programs for the adult unemployed.

The Job Corps operates 123 urban and conservation centers for impoverished boys and girls. The corps will be cut at first from 41,000 to 37,000 enrolled in boys' centers only, and eventually to 32,000 through attrition.

Smaller cuts have been ordered for the Neighborhood Youth Corps, Head Start programs for pre-school children, local Community Action programs, legal aid and migrant aid.

Urban Job Corps centers are scheduled to close in New Bedford, Mass., Battle Creek, Mich., Lincoln, Neb. and Sparta, Wis. All are operated by private firms under federal contracts.

Eleven conservation centers run by the U.S. Agriculture and Interior departments in 10 states will lose OEO funds. One, the Swiftbird, S.D., center, will not be opened.

Forty one neighborhood health centers will continue to operate at current levels but nine other centers scheduled for operation this year will not be funded, the government said.

Middleman Named Aide to Kenin

New York — Musicians Pres. Herman D. Kenin has announced the appointment of Sam Middleman of Los Angeles to succeed Phil Fischer as assistant to the president, with headquarters at AFM Local 47, 817 North Vine St., Hollywood, Calif.

Middleman has been serving as an assistant to Fischer, who is retiring Feb. 1. At the same time, Kenin announced the appointment of John Dumont, also of Los Angeles, to act as Middleman's assistant.

'Project Build':

D.C. Crafts Launch Youth Job Training

Some 160 disadvantaged youths in the nation's capital will get a chance to help build houses and their own futures under a unique program developed by Washington unions.

The program, appropriately called Project Build, will be federally funded under a Manpower Training & Development contract signed by the Greater Washington Labor Council and the Labor Dept.

Council Pres. J. C. Turner, who also is a member of the District of Columbia City Council, joined Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz in signing the agreement providing $416,000 in federal funds over 14 months.

Cooperating in the program are the Washington Building & Construction Trades Council, Opportunities Industrialization Center (an anti-poverty agency), U.S. Employment Service, public schools and several community groups.

Joseph F. Curtice, executive secretary of the Washington Building & Construction Trades Council, will serve as chairman of the program and Rev. David Eaton, Washington OIC executive director, will be its vice chairman.

Haggerty, Slaiman Sign

Among those attending the signing ceremony were Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. and AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman.

Speakers at the signing—including Wirtz, Turner, Haggerty and Slaiman—emphasized the wide participation in the program and the broad scope of its operation.

The youths, who must be in the 17½ to 23-year-old age group and not in school, will be given a year of instruction and practical work experience in housing rehabilitation and construction.

In the educational phase of training, they will be paid $56 a week. During the second phase, which will include work experience in such crafts as plastering, carpentry, plumbing, electrical work and bricklaying, their wages will increase to $1.90 an hour.

Their work sites will be privately owned housing and non-profit or limited-dividend housing corporations. Journeymen from various unions will serve as "coaches" to the trainees throughout the year.

The program is directed toward preparing the youths for apprenticeships, but Turner said, "If a youth can't qualify for an apprenticeship, we are committed to find him a job under one of our collective bargaining contracts."

Haggerty, noting this aspect of the program, said "It is highly likely that what happens in carrying out this program will have a profound effect on establishing similar programs throughout the United States."

Project Build's format was hailed by Slaiman as both "imaginative and constructive" in that "it combines features of other programs into a new dimension" to include both work experience and preparation for apprenticeship.

Wirtz congratulated the groups participating in the program. "I know that a great deal of work has gone into Project Build and I know that a great many people are already involved in it," he added.

23 Cities Join

Meanwhile, the AFL-CIO has released a "progress report" which shows that 23 cities now have labor-sponsored, government-funded programs for recruiting, tutoring and counseling apprentices for the building trades.

In more than a dozen other cities, programs are either awaiting a government contract or still in the planning stage.

In all of these cities, the Building & Construction Trades Dept., the Dept. of Civil Rights, and local Building Trades Councils are cooperating with other groups in carrying out the programs.

These include the Joint Apprenticeship Committee of the Workers Defense League and A. Philip Randolph Foundation, the Urban League, the Trade Union Leadership Council and the NAACP.

Hotel Union Backs LBJ In Election

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The executive board of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes has urged Pres. Johnson to run for re-election and pledged full support of the 500,000-member union.

A resolution commended Johnson for his skill in attacking the nation's political, economic and military problems. It observed that the President is "subject to harassing political attack by those who put their nation's safety second to their own political advancement."

The board said it appreciates the "courageous determination" with which Johnson has faced his responsibilities "no matter how unpopular their exercise, always holding steadfast to a course for the nation's good."

The best interests of the country require a "continuation of the same skillful and determined handling of the affairs of the nation," the board said. It resolved to "use its facilities to the utmost permissible by law" to achieve the "re-election of this great man."

Union Pres. Ed S. Miller said a copy of the resolution will be distributed to every member "with appropriate suggestions" for implementing it.

House Votes to Beef Up Credit Disclosure Bill

to the House floor. An unexpected assist came when stores which do not use revolving credit realized that the Senate bill would give a competitive advantage to those that do—and joined in calling for closing of the loophole.

The revolving credit loophole was defeated on a 131-10 teller vote and the $10 exemption was shouted down on a voice vote.

Opponents of a strong bill made a final effort to eliminate the garnishment restrictions, but again failed.

The House bill prohibits garnishment of the first $30 of a worker's wages and limits garnishment to 10 percent of wages above that amount. It bars an employer from firing a worker because of a single wage garnishment.

The Senate bill does not deal with garnishment.

The House also added a so-called "loan shark" amendment which would make it a federal crime to charge interest rates exceeding maximum rates allowed under state law—in the 43 states which have usury laws.

Throughout the House debate, former Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) was singled out as the man who launched the truth-in-lending campaign eight years ago and did the most to arouse the public to the misleading nature of most credit and interest charges.

At one stage in the debate, Rep. Paul A. Fino (R-N.Y.), who supported the revolving credit loophole, tried to quote Douglas as a supporter of the Senate bill.

Rep. Joseph G. Minish (D-N.J.) was immediately on his feet with the transcript of the House committee hearings at which Douglas termed the stronger House version "superior to the Senate bill."

While the House action was going on, senators continued—both on and off the floor — to wrestle with civil rights legislation.

On the floor, familiar arguments were hashed and rehashed over the bill to protect Negroes and civil rights workers against threats and intimidation for exercising specified legal rights such as voting, attending previously all-white schools, seeking service in restaurants and serving on juries.

The legislation is one part of the President's broad-ranging civil rights program — which also includes a federal open housing law, stronger enforcement powers for the Equal Employment Oportunities Commission, and a ban on discrimination in selection of both state and federal juries.

As in years past, opponents have threatened a filibuster against the civil rights bill.

The off-the-floor debate was over the two key elements of strategy.

On the one hand, the broad civil rights coalition has urged that the open housing and fair employment sections of the President's program be added to the bill on the Senate floor — and asked a major effort be made to break a filibuster and reach a vote.

The other side of the coin is an effort, with which Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen has been identified, to water down the civil rights protection bill to meet many of the objections of the Dixie bloc and seek an agreement to bring it to a vote.

Meanwhile the bill remains the pending business of the Senate and several speeches are made pro and con each day. But the Senate also sets aside the bill by unanimous consent whenever necessary to act on other business.

Auxiliaries Stress Key Political Role

The key role of women in aiding labor's political action in this year's elections will highlight the agenda of an AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries conference in Washington, D.C., April 29-30.

The conference also is expected to take up organizing, union label, legislation and education.

Johnson's incentive grants program calls for additional educational allowances and on-the-job salary supplements for veterans who agree:

- "To teach the children of the poor;
- "To help man understrength police forces and fire departments;
- "To do meaningful work in local hospitals;
- "To fill the ranks of VISTA, to work in Youth Opportunity Centers and in the concentrated employment program."

Johnson said the pattern of benefits will vary. He cited as an example a veteran who wants to teach in a deprived area.

"While he is getting the schooling that will qualify him for teaching," the President explained, "he will draw additional benefits of $50 a month for every month he agrees to teach, up to three years.

"While he is actually on the job teaching, he will draw a special training allowance, in addition to his regular salary—$80 a month for the first school year, $60 a month for the second."

On GI loans, where the present maximum guarantee is $7,500, the President asked a $10,000 ceiling.

He also reiterated a proposal he made last year to raise the amount of servicemen's group life insurance.

Johnson said he will soon sign an executive order allowing veterans who need further experience, skills and education to be hired without competitive examination for the five lowest civil service grades—provided the veteran agrees to take a part-time educational program under the GI Bill.

The President also announced a planned step-up in training of medical specialists by the Veterans Administration—up to 80,000 a year —to overcome the present shortage and improve medical care available to veterans.

Rail Retirement Hike Voted by Congress

Legislation to provide substantial increases in retirement benefits for 653,000 retired railroad workers and their families went to the White House after unanimously passing both the Senate and House.

The President is certain to sign the measure, which has the backing of both rail labor and rail management. It is the first bill to clear Congress this session.

The legislation amends the Railroad Retirement Act to boost retirement benefits to levels about 10 percent higher than comparable benefits under the social security amendments enacted last year.

Rail retirement benefits are higher than those paid under social security, but the tax paid by rail workers also is higher. In both cases, the employer pays an amount equal to that paid by the employe.

The bill also brings some 3,000 disabled widows in the 50-to-60 age bracket under the retirement law making them eligible for the first time for benefits.

In addition, the bill amends the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act to raise the ceiling on its jobless and sickness benefits from $10.20 to $12.70 a day, and makes other improvements in this law.

The retirement increases are effective with the retiree's February anuity and the extra money is expected to begin reaching beneficiaries in April.

Chairman G. E. Leighty of the Railway Labor Executives Association has estimated that the legislation will increase total retirement benefits by about $122 million a year and jobless-sick pay benefits by $21 million annually.

All told, he said, "it will eventually mean more money in the pockets of about 1.5 million railroad people — counting those now retired, future retirees and those who become unemployed or sick."

Job Increase Follows Wage Floor Hike

Economy Takes Rise In Stride

Repeated predictions that jobs would be lost when the federal minimum wage was raised in 1967 proved just as false as in the past, according to a report to Congress by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

Employment continued to rise after the higher rates became effective a year ago and "there is little or no evidence of layoffs or plant shutdowns related to the minimum wage increase," Wirtz said in transmitting a report on the economic effects of the 1966 amendments of the wage-hour law.

A year ago, coverage of the law—the Fair Labor Standards Act—was extended to 9.1 million more workers and the wage floor moved up from $1.25 to $1.40 an hour for those already covered. This year, the second phase of the 1966 amendments voted by the 89th Congress raised wage minimums from $1 an hour to $1.15 for the newly covered workers and from $1.40 to $1.60 an hour for those previously covered.

These are the groups that AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany described in a recent statement as "the working poor, who do useful jobs for wages that provide no more than a bare subsistence, and in some instances not even that."

There are still 11 million American workers not covered by the law at all, Meany pointed out.

Millions Aided

About 4.5 million workers had to be given wage increases averaging 12 cents an hour on Feb. 1, 1967, when the 1966 amendments first took effect. An estimated 7.2 million workers were slated to get increases averaging nearly 16 cents an hour when the second-phase rates became effective Feb. 1, 1968, the Labor Dept. said.

"How well the economy will adjust to the (second) step-up in minimum wage rates can be gauged in part by an examination of the effects of the first phase," the report noted. It listed these findings based on studies by the Wage-Hour Division:

- The economy as a whole has continued to prosper. Hourly earnings of all private nonagricultural workers averaged $2.70 as of September 1967, 9 cents more than in January 1967. Weekly earnings averaged $103.41, $3.71 more than in January.
- Total employment continued to rise—from 72.2 million in January 1967 to 74.6 million last September, an increase of nearly 2.5 million workers, or 3.4 percent. The increases in jobs affected all age

Federal Standards Urged To Insure Worker Safety

Consumer Aid Pushed By Johnson

Pres. Johnson called for new federal laws to protect the health and pocketbooks of America's consumers and appealed to Congress for bipartisan support.

He asked extension of federal standards of poultry inspection to the 1.6 billion pounds of poultry sold each year without crossing state lines. The coverage would parallel last year's expansion of meat inspection.

The President proposed a new fish inspection program, citing evidence that contaminated fish has been the cause of outbreaks of disease and food poisoning.

"If poultry inspection is spotty today, fish inspection is virtually non-existent," Johnson said.

The President asked Congress to strengthen the powers of the Federal Trade Commission by enabling it to seek court injuntions to halt fraudulent and deceptive sales practices without waiting until administrative hearings have been completed and all appeals exhausted. Some cases now take years before an FTC order becomes final.

He asked legislation authorizing federal safety standards for small boats, noting that "last year boating accidents claimed more than 1,300 lives."

To protect consumers against harmful radiation from defective equipment—such as has been found in some color television sets and in poorly-designed X-ray equipment—Johnson asked Congress to give the Health, Education & Welfare Dept. authority to set federal standards and require manufacturers to recall defective equipment.

The President said he will also

Ends Strike Hearings:

Copper Panel Shifts To Private Meetings

A three-member federal panel turned to private talks with labor and management representatives after winding up four days of hearings into the 23-state strike of more than 50,000 copper workers, now in its seventh month.

The panel, named by the secretaries of labor and commerce to help achieve a settlement, heard two hours of explanation from each of four big nonferrous metal companies and spokesmen for the 26 unions involved in contract negotiations.

Company representatives made it clear they are determined to hold out for their own terms. The unions characterized the managements' attitude as a refusal to bargain realistically and an insistence on complete union surrender.

The panel will continue private meetings with both sides in its search for the key to settlement. After all public and private methods have been explored it will report the facts to Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Commerce Sec. Alexander B. Trowbridge.

The panelists are Dr. George W. Taylor of the University of Pennsylvania, chairman; Msgr. George G. Higgins, director of the Social Action Dept. of the United States Catholic Conference, and George E. Reedy of the Struthers Wells Corp., former White House press secretary.

The strike started July 15 after the Big Four companies made a "take it or leave it" offer. It has

Wirtz Hits Lax State Programs

Thousands of workers needlessly die or are maimed each year because states don't have the laws, money or manpower to set and enforce on-the-job safety and health standards, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz told Congress.

Wirtz testified at House hearings on the Administration's new bill to enable the federal government to set and enforce standards protecting workers in all employment affecting interstate commerce.

The proposed Occupational Safety & Health Act would also provide grants to help states finance comparable programs in fields not reached by federal regulation.

States Failed

Earlier AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany had hailed Pres. Johnson's call for a national occupational safety and health law, noting that the states have "failed miserably in this area." Federal action is "long overdue," Meany said.

Wirtz said experience has shown that the annual death rate from on-the-job accidents can be brought below the present level of 14,500 and the number of workers suffering disabling injuries reduced from the current 2.2 million a year.

In the "few" states with extensive safety programs, Wirtz said, the death rate from work accidents is 19 deaths per 100,000 workers. "In the 10 states with the smallest programs," he added, "the death rate averages 110 per 100,000 work-

CVT Asks Aid For Victims Of Terrorism

Saigon — The Vietnamese Confederation of Labor (CVT) has appealed to free unions around the world for aid to workers and other persons injured in recent Viet Cong attacks in the cities.

The appeal was made in messages to the AFL-CIO, the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the Intl. Federation of Christian Unions and other labor organizations by CVT Pres. Tran Quoc Buu.

In his message, he said:

"We at CVT are safe and sound. We appeal urgently to free world union organizations to aid workers and other Vietnamese who were

Jobless Rate Declines to 3.5%, Employment Shows Little Change

The nation's unemployment rate dropped two-tenths of 1 percent in January to 3.5 percent, but payroll employment showed little change when seasonally adjusted, the Labor Dept. reported.

Although the rate was the lowest since November 1953, it was only a two-tenths of 1 percent decline over the year. In November 1966, the rate also was 3.5 percent but an end-of-the year adjustment later revised it to 3.6 percent.

The January improvement in the jobless rate was mainly the result of a shift in the job picture for women, and not due to any major trend in the economy, the department said.

Commissioner Arthur M. Ross of the Bureau of Labor Statistics pointed out that the labor force decline among adult women was greater than usual for January, although the total labor force normally declines in the month.

The jobless rate for adult women was 3.9 percent in January, compared to 4.1 percent in December, and well below the nearly 5 percent levels of September and October.

The number of unemployed workers in January totalled 3.1 million, down 100,000 over the year. Of the total jobless 1.3 million were adult men, 1.1 million were adult women and 650,000 were teenagers.

The unemployment rate for adult men was 2.3 percent, up one-tenth of 1 percent from December, but just where it was in Janu-

COPPER PICKETS share a cup of coffee with Steelworkers' Pres. I. W. Abel at the gates of Kennecott Refinery Corp. in Baltimore, Md. Abel visited several picket lines, found morale "extremely high" in the seventh month of the strike by more than 50,000 members of USWA and 25 other unions against Kennecott and 10 other nonferrous metals firms.

Panel Completes Hearings:

Copper Companies Continue Holdout

spread to 11 firms with 61 mines, mills and smelting plants.

Testimony by Big Four company officials produced these attitudes:

The Anaconda Co. said settlement of the strike is possible if the workers drop their proposals, adopt a more conciliatory attitude on contract issues and return to work while negotiations continue.

The American Smelting & Refining Co. said that while the issue of company-wide bargaining is important, there are probably a couple of dozen strike issues but "we really don't know what they are."

Kennecott Copper Co. said it has no reason to improve its one-and-only contract offer of June 7 because the unions' insistence on company-wide conditions is a bar to the resumption of bargaining.

Phelps Dodge Corp. asserted that company-wide bargaining is not in the best interests of the corporation or its workers.

Steelworker witnesses gave the panel an analysis of the industry's pension and insurance programs and called them grossly inferior to those of industry generally. Bernard Greenberg of the USWA pension and insurance department testified that the companies' real objection to company-wide bargaining is their desire to continue "chiseling" on wages and conditions at their widespread properties.

Bargained Jointly

Ed Ayoub of the USWA research department, another union witness, testified that the Big Four opposition to company-wide bargaining is contradicted by the bargaining experience of unions that for 15 years have negotiated with American Smelting.

That company has bargained jointly for a group of 12 properties without adverse effects, he said. But this time ASARCO has in fact made its proposals to the local unions rather than at the national bargaining table, Ayoub said.

Arthur Stuart, also of the USWA research department, told the panel that no economic offer has ever been made by Anaconda to the unions for more than half of its properties. That contradicts the company's assertion that it believes in plant-by-plant bargaining, Stuart asserted.

Earlier, Russell Williams of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers charged that the copper industry has "shown a complete disregard for its employes."

Chairman Joseph P. Molony of the National Nonferrous Coordinating Committee, representing the 26 unions, called attention to the failure of the companies to bargain in good faith; their "enormous" profits, "chaotic" wage structure, and pension systems he called among the worst and at the lowest levels in American industry.

Urging management to "take off the brass knuckles and return to the bargaining table," Molony said: "Our members have no intention of surrendering. We went on strike together to achieve common contract goals and we intend to return to work together."

32,000 Glass Workers Strike at 86 Plants

Miami Beach—More than 32,000 members of the Glass Bottle Blowers maintained picket lines at 86 plants producing 90 percent of the U. S. glass container supply as federal mediators sought to get union and company negotiators back to the bargaining table.

GBBA Pres. Lee W. Minton had recommended acceptance of a management offer as "the best offer we have ever had in this industry." But a rollcall vote of local union presidents produced a 62-31 vote against acceptance of the 67-cent wage and benefit package offered by the Glass Container Manufacturers Association.

When the association refused Minton's request for reconsideration, he said "it looks like this will be a long strike."

The employer offer—the 13th since contract talks began — included an immediate increase in base hourly rates of 17 cents, plus 10 cents for skilled classifications; an additional 4 percent hike in the second contract year, and another 3 percent in the final year.

The manufacturers also offered a cost-of-living escalator clause, pension and insurance improvements, and steps toward a uniform wage structure for similar jobs throughout the industry.

Negotiations on contract terms began Nov. 28 and ended Feb. 1 when the strike began upon contract expiration. The affected plants are in Alabama, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Michigan, Minnesota, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Oklahoma, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, West Virginia and Wisconsin.

1965 Strike

The expired contract was reached in 1965 after an 11-day strike. The strikers returned after management improved its wage offer.

The GBBA has a Mar. 1 deadline for a new pact covering 10,000 skilled glass workers in the union's National Automatic Machine Dept.—the operating or "hot" side of glass container production. Union proposals were scheduled for presentation to management Feb. 8.

Still to be negotiated is a contract covering an additional 7,000 production and maintenance employes in West Coast plants, the GBBA said.

Tobacco Union Wins Raises At 2 Firms

The Tobacco Workers won wage increases totaling 45 cents an hour over three years at two big cigarette firms—one after a 25-day strike—and sought to win similar benefits from two other major companies.

First to settle—without a strike—was the Philip Morris Co. for plants with 4,500 employes at Louisville, Ky., and Richmond, Va. Besides the wage hikes, retroactive to Jan. 1, the union won wage adjustments up to 51 cents an hour for machine fixers and other skilled craftsmen, a cost-of-living escalator provision—a major union objective—and better vacation, insurance, holiday and disability benefits.

More than 5,000 union members walked out Jan. 2 at American Tobacco Co. plants in Richmond, Louisville, and at Durham and Reidsville, N.C. They returned after the company agreed to accept terms similar to those offered by Philip Morris. American Tobacco products include Lucky Strikes, Pall Mall, Tareyton and Omar cigarettes, and several brands of cigars and roll-your-own tobaccos.

Union locals at Louisville, Petersburg, Va., and Greensboro, N.C., are negotiating with P. Lorillard and the Brown & Williamson Tobacco Co.

The increases for most workers are 24 cents this year, 9 cents next year and 12 cents in the third year.

The new pacts give seasonal employes successive wage boosts of 20 cents, 8 and 11 cents a year; an additional paid holiday, the Friday after Thanksgiving Day; and a fifth week of vacation after 32 years of continuous service.

The weekly sickness disability benefit was raised from 50 percent of the basic wage and a top of $50 for 13 weeks to a new top of $60. Employes eligible for workman's compensation will be paid the difference between workman's benefits and the $60 weekly benefit for 13 weeks, it was agreed.

Barry Named To Editorial Post on News

John M. Barry has been appointed assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications and managing editor of the AFL-CIO News.

Barry, 42, has been an assistant editor of the federation's weekly newspaper since 1961. He came to the AFL-CIO staff from the Newspaper Guild, where he served as assistant editor of the Guild Reporter from 1956 to 1961 and as assistant director of research and information from 1953 to 1956.

He is a former member of the executive board of the Guild's Washington, D. C., local. Before joining the ANG staff, he was president of the local in his native city, Nashua, N. H., while working as a reporter for the Nashua Telegraph.

He was named AFL-CIO News managing editor on the retirement of Willard Shelton, who had held the post since 1958.

Farm Union's Struggle Filmed for Television

"Huelga!"—the prize-winning chronicle of the California grape pickers' strike—has its television premiere on "NET Journal" the week of Feb. 18 on more than 80 educational TV stations across the country. An additional 55 stations will air the film in following weeks.

The hour-long documentary, applauded by Variety for its "stirring revolutionary form," charts the farm workers strike that began in September 1965 against 35 growers around Delano, Calif. The strikers, Mexican-American migrants, dramatize their demands in the fields, encouraging other workers to join them. The film depicts their growing unity, as they march up to the capitol at Sacramento, form their own satirical theater group, and finally draw some foremen and strikebreakers into their camp.

Prominent in the film are some of the people who have led the cry of "Huelga!"—the Spanish word for "strike"—such as Dir. Cesar Chavez of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, AFL-CIO. Their efforts continue to date, as only three of the 35 growers have agreed to demands for a minimum wage, the right of collective bargaining, and unemployment compensation.

"Huelga!," a presentation of National Educational Television, won awards at the Intl. Labor Film Festival in Montreal, Intl. Film & Television Festival in New York, and Vancouver Intl. Film Festival. Written and produced by Mark J. Harris, the film is narrated by Paul Herlinger.

Local television program schedules should be consulted for broadcast and time on each educational channel.

'My Hat's In, Too!'

By Anti-Trust Unit:

Unions Urge Probe Of Hearst Practices

Los Angeles—AFL-CIO leaders pressed for a fresh U. S. Senate probe of "monopolistic practices of the Hearst Corporation" as 5,000 Hearst employes here and in San Francisco remained idled by labor disputes.

Chairman Philip Hart (D-Mich.) of the Senate Anti-Trust Subcommittee was asked to launch an investigation of Hearst interests and practices in both California cities.

In both cities, "the question of anti-trust violation and monopolistic abuse" arose after mergers of various newspapers, including those owned by Hearst, according to a letter to Hart from Executive Sec. Sigmund Arywitz of the Los Angeles AFL-CIO.

The request for anti-trust investigative action came as strike-lockout of 2,000 members of 12 unions went into its ninth week at the Hearst-owned Los Angeles Herald-Examiner, biggest afternoon daily in the nation.

Union leadership contended the dispute was "a premeditated attack by Hearst to break organized labor." The Hearld-Examiner has been operating since the start of the dispute, Dec. 15, with non-union personnel and imported professional strikebreakers.

Negotiations have been off since a futile session between management and the Paperhandlers Jan. 19.

In San Franciso, Hearst's Examiner and the independent Chronicle have been closed by a Mailers strike since Jan. 5.

Urgency of the struggle prompted the 14-member executive board of the Newspaper Guild to move its winter quarterly meeting from Washington to Los Angeles.

In addition, ANG top officials called on the Leaders of Guild Locals which have contracts with Hearst papers to attend.

Ways will be divised to combat "the all-out warfare against trade unions embarked upon by the Hearst corporation," ANG Pres. James B. Woods, Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson and Sec.-Treas. Charles A. Perlik, Jr., announced jointly.

The Los Angeles dispute started when 1,100 ANG members and 15 Machinists struck for contract improvements.

Hearst quickly locked out 800 members of the newspaper craft unions—Typographical, Pressmen, Stereotypers and ITU mailers.

The ANG statement said "patterns of bargaining emerging at other Hearst papers across the country are so out of touch with the reality of today's conditions and the needs of his employes that their object humiliation or strike provocation can be his only motives."

"That is Hearst's challenge and we're determined to answer it," the statement added.

Pressmen's Pres. Anthony J. Deandrade said here at a meeting of the Herald-Examiner Strike-Lockout Council that the Hearst situation "requires the support of all the printing trades unions and the general labor movement to stop this strikebreaking activity of this giant corporation."

Meanwhile, a court injunction forced removal of ANG pickets from Long Beach harbor newsprint warehouse, where an estimated 5,000 tons of newsprint slated for the Herald-Examiner was tied up. The court order opened the way for delivery of the paper supply.

Hearst management began construction of a steel fence the height of a man around a parking lot at its newspaper plant. Workmen began installing the fence just one week after a mass demonstration by AFL-CIO unions in the Los Angeles area. An injunction later forbade county AFL-CIO officials from leading future demonstrations on behalf of Hearst strikers.

THE HOME FRONT drew attention in Saigon when bumper stickers turned up proclaiming that Hearst's Los Angeles Herald-Examiner—in its eighth week of a strike-lockout—is "unfair to labor." Stickers were pasted on pedicabs and pushcarts. Vietnamese labor leaders and American GIs saw them and voiced support for the eight unions involved in the dispute.

3 Railroads Struck In Crew Size Dispute

Some 6,000 members of the Railroad Trainmen struck three railroads after the union charged the carriers with refusing to negotiate on train crew sizes and arbitrarily trying to change work rules.

Companies struck were the Missouri Pacific Railroad, Texas & Pacific Railway, a MoPac subsidiary, and the Atlantic Coast Line sections of the Seaboard Coast Line Railroad.

The BRT's 4,000 members left their jobs on MoPac and Tex-Pac on Feb. 5 and the strike by 2,000 on Seaboard began Feb. 6. Most operations were halted as members of other rail unions observed picket lines.

Several management spokesmen charged that the strikes halted war supplies for Vietnam. BRT. Pres. Charles Luna immediately pledged the unions' members would move such material.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, rail managements were seeking appointment of a Presidential emergency board to investigate and make recommendations in the Mo-Pac dispute.

Appointment of a board would halt the strike for at least 60 days under terms of the Railway Labor Act. A board is named by the President only after the National Mediation Board certifies that there is an emergency.

'No Emergency'

Luna maintained that neither strike created an emergency in view of the union's offer to move defense supplies and the availability of alternate forms of transportation in areas served by the railroads.

He accused the companies of "deliberately" trying to precipitate an emergency by refusing to negotiate on BRT's notices for new crew consist (crew size) rules.

"They are hoping the government will step in and force trainmen to work against their will and conscience," Luna said.

The dispute goes back to 1960 when the BRT first served notice on railroads calling for minimum crews of not less than two trainmen in addition to the conductor on all trains.

After the two-year compulsory arbitration award on train crews expired Jan. 31, 1966, the notices were held up by litigation. The U.S. Supreme Court recently refused to review an appeals Court ruling that the union is free to bargain with individual carriers on the issue and cannot be compelled to bargain nationally.

Agreement on the crew consist issue was reached by BRT some time ago with 34 railroads through separate negotiations. But talks have since been stalemated on the three struck railroads and negotiations are being pushed on five others.

savagely attacked by Communists during the truce of Tet, the traditional sacred feast of Viet Nam."

In another development, the CVT condemned recent Viet Cong terrorist attacks and called upon all of its members "to work energetically to serve our people."

Saigon CVT Council Sec. Va Van Taie said that the Viet Cong had failed completely in recent efforts to cause an uprising among workers in the city by sending propaganda teams through workers' neighborhoods.

These armed propaganda teams failed to attract crowds because of the workers' hostility to the Viet Cong, Va Van Taie said.

CVT leaders also declared that the Viet Cong terrorist campaign here and in other cities had backfired because it had strengthened the resolve of Vietnamese labor to resist the Communists.

Meanwhile, support for Vietnamese workers has been pledged by Utility Workers Local 1-2 of New York City, through a message from Business Manager Michael Sampson to the Electrical Workers here.

"We pledge all our support to utility workers and the CVT in their struggle for a better life and against the terroristic aggression of the Viet Cong," Sampson said.

He hailed the "courageous stand" of Vietnamese workers against the Viet Cong terror. "We rejoice . . . that the Communists have failed in their efforts due to refusal of the great masses" to support them, he added.

Auto Workers Achieve Harvester Agreement

Chicago—Major contract gains were won for 45,000 Auto Workers in 47 bargaining units at Intl. Harvester Co. plants.

Members of the UAW's Harvester Council ratified a three-year pact, subject to membership acceptance, after extending the contract three days. Sporadic walkouts were called at several plants but all strikers returned to work within three hours, the union said.

Union bargainers elsewhere came to terms with Chrysler Canada after a week's strike of 11,000 workers in seven Toronto and Windsor area plants.

The UAW set a Feb. 9 deadline for a local settlement covering 17,000 members at the Pontiac motors plant of General Motors Corp. in Pontiac, Mich., and a Feb. 13 deadline for 20,000 GM workers in four plants at Flint, Mich. The union also continued efforts to win acceptable terms from Continental Motors Corp., where 7,500 workers walked out Feb. 1 for the auto industry "pattern" at plants in Toledo, O., Detroit and Muskegon, Mich., Chicago and Milwaukee.

The Harvester agreement follows the farm equipment industry pattern set earlier at Caterpillar and John Deere Co. It includes wage hikes of 15 to 57 cents an hour; living cost adjustments of 5 to 21 cents the first year, 8 to 13 the second and 11 to 21 the third. Pensions are raised from $4.25 a month times years of service to $5.25, and pension supplements of 25 to 75 cents become effective next Nov. 1.

The agreement also includes better insurance, layoff benefit and vacation programs, plus a prepaid drug plan with employes paying $2 for up to a month's supply of drugs. Other gains include Christmas week off and bonuses of $25 at Christmas and $75 in vacation pay.

Still unsettled are new UAW contracts with the Allis-Chalmers Co., Massey Ferguson and the Oliver Corp., all farm equipment makers.

Canadian Chrysler workers ratified by a 95 percent margin a three-year pact providing the same economic package as in the U. S.

It includes wage increases of 20 cents an hour for plant workers, 50 cents for skilled workers retroactive to last Nov. 15; wage parity with U. S. workers by the third contract year; and 11 paid holidays, a gain of one. The agreement retains all Canadian work practices, including stopping the assembly line twice a day for rest periods.

The union seeks similar terms from GMC of Canada, for whom it set a Feb. 9 strike deadline.

In U. S. plants of GM, union negotiators passed the halfway mark for local agreements. More than 60 of the 168 plant-level pacts remain to be settled, though agreement on a national contract was reached in December. The union charged last month that some key settlements have been delayed because management has an oversupply of new cars.

Phillips Named IUE Organizing Director

Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers has announced the appointment of Walter Phillips as IUE's new director of organization.

Phillips, a former IUE field representative, is chairman of the union's board of trustees and a member of its executive board. He is a former vice president of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO.

Sharp Rise Recorded In White Collar Pay

Salaries of clerical employes rose by a record 6.1 percent between early 1966 and June of 1967, the Labor Dept. reported.

Other white collar pay scales also rose substantially during the survey period—in almost all cases by more than 5 percent.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics survey, taken each year since 1961, is used as a benchmark of "comparability" for federal employes in similar occupations.

The annual figures are not exactly comparable because the latest survey covered a 15-to-16-month period in an effort to make the statistics more up-to-date. But even when adjusted to a lower 12-month rate, the clerical pay rise is well above the 1965-66 average increase of 3 percent and the 2.4 percent average raise between 1964 and 1965. It is by far the highest since the surveys started.

For the first time, last year, the percentage increase for clerical employes was higher than that for most professional and administrative groups. The 6.1 percent clerical average increase compares with 5.4 percent for engineers, 5.5 percent for chemists and 5.8 percent for accountants, as examples of the 13 occupational groups and 81 work level categories surveyed.

Job analysts had the smallest percentage increase over the 1966-67 period — 4.2 percent. And directors of personnel weren't much better off. Their average salary went up only 4.7 percent.

The occupations surveyed accounted for more than 1.45 million employes, about one-fifth of the total technical, administrative, professional and clerical employment.

Despite their pickup this year, clerical employes have trailed other white collar and professional fields over the total six-year period. Their pay rose about 22 percent from 1961 to mid-1967, less than any of the other surveyed groups. Chemists led the list with a 28 percent raise, followed by chief accountants.

Labor Law History In New Edition

"Labor law was one of the original guns fired in the war on poverty and don't forget it."

That statement by the late, former Sec. of Labor Frances Perkins is highlighted in the revised edition of "Growth of Labor Law in the United States," a Labor Dept. study of laws that have affected American wages and working conditions.

Copies of the 311-page book are available from the Superintendent of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C. 20402, at $1.25 each.

The Consumer's Voice

HOUSE PASSAGE of a strong "truth-in-lending" bill and the President's special consumer message to Congress underscore the high priority finally being given to protecting the interest of Americans as consumers.

The strong House vote in plugging the gaps in the Senate-passed measure was new evidence that the voice of the consumer is not only being heard in Washington but is being heeded.

The AFL-CIO has been a leading voice in seeking legislation to protect the hard-earned dollars of the wage-earner—union member and non-unionist alike. It has been involved in the "truth-in-lending" battle for eight years since former Sen. Paul H. Douglas first undertook the struggle. It led the fight for a more effective meat inspection law in the last Congress.

The scope of labor's consumer interest ranges across the entire spectrum of problems facing the ordinary American in today's complex marketplace. The recent AFL-CIO convention spelled out the extent of labor's involvement when it called for the following actions:

More inspection legislation. The AFL-CIO hopes that enactment of the new meat inspection law is the harbinger of needed federal legislation to provide effective inspection of poultry and fish and additional measures to protect the consuming public.

An effective truth-in-lending law. Effective legislation in this area would require complete disclosure of finance charges on all forms of consumer credit, both in dollars and true annual interest rates.

Enforcement of truth-in-packaging. Effective enforcement of this federal law is needed and it should be amended to make mandatory the present voluntary procedures for weight and quantity standards.

A full study of the credit field. Congress is urged to undertake or authorize a study of consumer credit laws and practices as well as unfair and harsh debt-collection procedures.

A federal anti-garnishment law.

Investigation of the insurance industry. Congress should undertake a general investigation of the insurance industry in all its aspects, with a view to enacting remedial legislation for abuses and bringing the entire industry under federal regulation.

Laws to curb excessive drug costs. Labor supports legislation to curb the excessive costs of prescription drugs to the buying public through patent reform and through encouragement of drug prescriptions by generic name rather than brand name. Special legislation is needed to bar physicians from selling products they prescribe.

A continuing review of food prices. Congress should maintain a review of food prices, with special attention to cost effects of advertising excesses, games, trading stamps and other devices. Congress should investigate discriminatory pricing practices in ghettos.

Unbiased product information. Legislation is required to provide consumers with unbiased information and to end misleading or fraudulent information, including that on the sale of land.

Tighter drug and cosmetic controls. The Food, Drug & Cosmetic Act should be tightened to ensure that drugs sold for human use meet standards of safety, quality and efficacy and that cosmetics are tested for safety before sale.

Consumer representation. The consumer viewpoint should be represented at the highest level, through a Cabinet level post or an office in the executive branch.

Cooperation with consumer groups. The AFL-CIO salutes formation of the new Consumer Federation of America and pledges labor's cooperation towards common legislative goals.

Continued support for cooperatives. The AFL-CIO reaffirms its backing of the cooperative movement and commends its work.

Rail Unions Invite Management To Build New Era of Harmony

Text of a statement by the Railway Labor Executives' Association calling for the establishment of a joint labor-management committee.

WE ARE NEGOTIATING with the railroads, represented by the National Railway Labor Conference, a uniform national plan for improved health and life insurance benefits for the employes we represent. Last month the Association of American Railroads agreed with us to seek jointly from Congress substantial improvements in Railroad Retirement and Railroad Unemployment Insurance benefits.

We believe this approach should be carried further. Now is the time to build a new era of harmony and cooperation between labor and management in this vital industry. The industry needs it and the nation needs it.

To this end, we in railway labor call on management to appoint a committee of railroad presidents and other leaders to meet with us. The goal of these meetings should be new attitudes and new policies. In our view the proper new policies include:

● Negotiate prompt good-faith settlements of disputes over wages and working conditions in line with the employes' needs. Stalling instead of bargaining has been a frequent management strategy in past railroad disputes.

It is shocking that during the 1966-67 shopcraft dispute, extending over more than a year, less than seven hours of direct negotiations took place. In other current disputes, involving rail "operating" unions, the railroads have used injunctions suits as a stall, in ways that the U. S. Court of Appeals found were illegal refusals to bargain in good faith.

Good labor relations flow from honest bargains, not from court injunctions or government-imposed settlements.

● Implement in good faith the labor agreements that are signed nationally by the railroad negotiators. Except for the implementation of general wage increases, we have found for at least the past decade that as soon as a national agreement gets down to the individual railroads for implementation, management officials often start trying to chip away at it, instead of applying it in full. In many cases their aim seems to be to turn a "major" dispute, supposedly settled, into a host of "minor" disputes (grievances), in which the employes have no right to strike.

● Prompt and reasonable handling of grievances. Good employe relations are impossible unless grievances are speedily and fairly handled. In this industry many employe grievances remain unsettled for long periods of time.

● Advertise confidence in the employes. The railroads' indefensible "featherbedding" campaign of several years ago has worked like arsenic, a slow poison. Its effect on the employes remains devastating. It has also gravely harmed the public's image of railroading.

When the public thinks of "railroads" they think of railroad employes as well as trains. The employes and the industry are indissoluble. Surely no other industry in the 20th Century has so downgraded its own employes to the public whom it serves and on whom it depends. The railroad companies should begin to publicize the skill, the effort and the devotion of their employes.

● Find ways to support railway labor on legislation and other matters of mutual benefit. Several examples could be cited, but railroad safety is a good one because it illustrates both the positive and the negative. On the positive side, the railroads and the unions are fruitfully cooperating on a program to get states and localities to enforce better safety at grade crossings. On the negative side, the industry has so far taken a penny-wise, pound-foolish attitude in refusing to support an effort to give the Dept. of Transportation broader authority over railroad safety and to make the penalties for safety violations more realistic.

These five policies, if adopted and implemented, would bring a new era to labor-management relations in the railroad industry—an era of productive, uninterrupted and profitable service. The new leadership in the Association of American Railroads and the National Railway Labor Conference has a golden opportunity to work in this direction. More basically, however, progress depends on the presidents of the major railroads.

We hope our present appeal for a new top level labor-management committee in the railroad industry will draw a favorable response. Let us make 1968 a year of cooperation, not of strife, in this industry. The time to proceed is now.

Attorneys General Told:

'Surgical Attention' Required To Correct Insurance Abuses

The following is excerpted from an address by Betty Furness, special assistant to the President for consumer affairs, to a meeting of the National Association of Attorneys General in Washington.

ANOTHER CONSUMER ISSUE fast becoming a national scandal is insurance.

In his State of the Union Message, the President proposed a major study of automobile insurance.

There is no doubt in my mind that this is the consumer's greatest frustration—he is too often the victim of arbitrary or unjust cancellations, inadequate settlements, excessive premiums.

The stories are endless:

A 55-year-old driver who has been insured by the same company for more than 30 years is hit in the rear by another car. The accident is not his fault and yet his insurance company tacks a 30 percent surcharge on his premium.

"Why?" he asks. Because the public wants a risk-rating system that increases the premium of anyone involved in an accident, whether it's his fault or not, the insurance company tells him.

Does the public really want this? I doubt it.

A soldier serving in Viet Nam may come home to find that an added burden of national service is an insurance company that won't give him a policy because he's been out of the country for more than a year. His wife may well have lost her policy when he left because of "increased emotional strain."

Clergymen and divorcees and doctors may be turned away because they are "preoccupied." Clerics, insurancemen say, think God is watching out for them, and I guess they figure that divorcees think no one is watching out for them so it doesn't matter how they drive.

Automobile insurance offers the greatest number of consumer abuses, I believe, but it is not the only insurance problem that needs surgical attention.

Life insurance, health insurance, household, fire, flood and theft—there can be abuses in all.

Policies that are too confusing, premiums that are too high, settlements too little and too late.

And the insurance problems of the poor have been long neglected. It is obvious that insurance companies have made a common practice of avoiding poor neighborhoods.

If an insurance company uses its public franchise to serve only low-risk clients, is it worthy of that franchise? Clearly not.

I think it is the primary responsibility of state governments to root out all of these abuses, for the states have been the traditional regulators of insurance.

Another consumer issue I would like to bring to your attention is sales racketeering.

Door-to-door sales, referral sales and home improvement swindles are particularly bitter matters for the American consumer.

The unsolicited persuasions of crafty door-to-door salesmen cost American families over one billion dollars a year—for misrepresented products, for court costs and lawyer fees, for garnishments and job losses.

Their gimmicks are familiar to us all:

The model home pitch, the phony bargains and "free gifts and samples."

The "official inspector" and the "specially selected household."

The old bait and switch act, the phony guarantees, "factory deals" and bogus contests.

Millions are victimized by these techniques every year—especially the old, the poor and the undereducated.

Thousands of Americans are misled every year by salesmen who promise them quick profits or lower prices if they will merely recommend friends or neighbors who might make prospective buyers.

The hit and run nature of these schemes makes it difficult to determine their actual dollar cost but conservative estimates run into the millions.

HOME IMPROVEMENT swindles are even worse.

The Better Business Bureau estimates that fraudulent and deceptive practices in the home repair improvement field cause consumer losses between $500 million and $1 billion a year.

Home owners—especially poor ones—find they have unknowingly mortgaged their home for a set of shoddy repairs; summertime sales turn to frauds in the fall; houses, jobs and lifetime savings are lost.

The President, in the State of the Union, proposed new powers for the Federal Trade Commission to stop those who defraud and swindle the public.

This will help.

But we need increased state protection as well.

Protecting consumer interests is one area in which the federal government and state and local government can work easily and constructively together. The interests of the consumer are common to all levels of government. So is the need to protect honest businessmen from the fraudulent practices of those who are not.

More must be done by state government—in the issues I have discussed today, in the whole area of consumer interests.

I am pleased to see that many states have already designated consumer counsels or opened consumer affairs offices.

These offices are helping greatly in bringing about state action for the consumer. I would like to see all the states do the same.

I would also like to see state consumer programs include consumer education, for public protection alone will not insure full justice for the consumer.

The consumer must know what his rights are, he must know how the marketplace works.

Tax Rebates, Low Wages:

Mexico's Border Industry Plan Called 'Invitation to Runaways'

TAX BREAKS and cheap labor are luring U.S. employers to Mexico and hurting communities and workers on both sides of the border, a top union officer charged today in a nationwide radio interview.

Howard D. Samuel, vice president of the Clothing Workers, labeled Mexico's border-industrialization program "an invitation to runaways." Some 100 plants financed by American capital are now operating just below the border, he said, and the number is growing. He made the statements on Labor News Conference, heard Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Such plants do little to improve standards and conditions in the border areas of Mexico, Samuel said. He charged that "they get all kinds of tax rebates," while they pay sub-standard wages.

"In effect, it is introducing a sort of colonial situation into the area," he said.

Samuel declared that the program has "cost American workers jobs" and compounded the difficulties of workers trying to improve their conditions on the U.S. side of the border.

Most of the runaway plants are in the electronics, apparel and food processing industries, he said. Finished products are sent to U.S. markets, but despite wage differentials that run as high as four to one, he noted American consumers aren't getting any price breaks.

"In almost every case where we have this situation, the manufacturer, and sometimes the retailer, make the difference—the bigger profit," he asserted.

SAMUEL SAID that a four-member AFL-CIO Executive Council committee is looking into ways to protect the wages and working conditions of U.S. citizens and the operations of U.S. employers who abide by U.S. labor standards. The program should be "regulated and modified," he said, and "we hope to persuade our government to impress upon Mexico the need to moderate" it.

Reporters questioning Samuel on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News and Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

By Press Associates, Inc.

AFTER AT LEAST five years of training and retraining programs, it has become clear that a top priority on the domestic front still is getting jobs for America's hard core body of unemployed.

Pres. Johnson, in his 1968 budget message to Congress has called blunt attention to the fact that jobs are denied "those who are ill-equipped through lack of education and job skills and those who are handicapped by the effects of discrimination and slum environment."

In many ways we have still to find the way to reach this hard core of unemployment and bring the men, women and youngsters who compose it into our national economic life. It is this hard core that haunts the nation still stung by the riots of last summer and frankly apprehensive of what will happen this summer. Their number is estimated to run anywhere from 500,000 to 1 million.

The Federal Reserve report points out that 1967 began with a a generally tight labor market where jobs were available. One result was that the unemployment rate for males was close to 2 percent. This is virtually accounted for by the normal flow of workers in and out of jobs that takes place even in the most affluent times.

During 1967, the jobless rate fluctuated within fairly narrow limits and the year ended with a 3.7 percent rate, the same that it had been at the beginning of the year. We had neither gained nor lost ground. But within this 3.7 percent unemployed there remained a hard core of workers who were unable to find jobs due to the kind of handicaps cited by the President in his budget message: Lack of education and job skills, the handicaps of racial discrimination and the oppressive environment of the slums.

The groups within these categories that suffers the heaviest are the teenagers, the nonwhite and the unskilled. The jobless rate for teenagers when 1967 ended was 12.8 percent. As the Federal Reserve report pointed out: "The experience of 1967 emphasizes again the extreme vulnerability of untrained, inexperienced, youth in the labor force and underlines the need for continuing an expanded program of education and training."

Among nonwhite workers, the unemployment rate was 6.9 percent, almost double the white rate. "Because they are concentrated in relatively unskilled occupations, nonwhite workers are particularly vulnerable when available openings in blue collar occupations are reduced," the Federal Reserve report commented.

IN THE LIGHT of what has become a monotonous pattern of unemployment among the unskilled and among the victims of poor educational background and advantages, it becomes almost inescapable that there are thousands of jobless who are not going to fit into the training and retraining programs that are now in operation. Rather, jobs will have to be fitted to them.

In this sense, the government eventually will find itself compelled to provide jobs that can fit the skills and educational attainments of those who too long have been left out of the mainstream of American economic life.

The Urban Coalition, composed of business, labor, religion and local officials, recently said:

"Congress must pass legislation in this session to provide government-generated employment to every citizen able and willing to work but unable to find private employment."

Surely there are plenty of "meaningful, socially useful jobs" to be done in the United States well within the capabilities of the vast majority of the hard core unemployed. We have only to look around at the condition of our cities, notably the slums, at the shabby countryside and its roads, at the poorly done public services of a dozen kinds—from miserable garbage collection to under-manned hospitals and other public institutions.

What is needed is a census of the vast job that ought to be done in our cities and in our rural areas. Such a census would surely turn up a vast amount of worthwhile work to be done.

MEXICO'S border-industrialization program is "an invitation to runaway" U.S. employers and hurts workers and communities on both sides of the border, Clothing Workers Vice Pres. Howard D. Samuel (center) charged on Labor News Conference. Questioning him on the public affairs program aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on Mutual radio were William Eaton (left) of the Chicago Daily News and Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

AFL-CIO Sets Mar. 29 Parley On Election

The AFL-CIO announced it will hold a special, one-day national conference in Washington on Friday, Mar. 29 to discuss plans for the 1968 election campaign.

Letters announcing the conference have been sent by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to the leaders of all national and international unions, the 50 state central bodies of the AFL-CIO and major city central bodies.

Sessions of the conference, which will be closed, will be in the Washington Hilton Hotel.

"The 1968 national election will be a choice between liberalism and reaction—not only at the presidential level, but in every Senate race and in every congressional district," Meany said in his letter.

"The recent AFL-CIO convention clearly set its sights on progress . . . We will never be content to allow a Coalition of Retreat to undermine gains we have already made.

"We want progress for our nation and its people—and we intend to achieve it."

'Labor Looks at Congress' Published in New Edition

The AFL-CIO's legislative report on the first session of the 90th Congress—and on the unfinished business facing the second session—is now available in pamphlet form.

The title is "Labor Looks at Congress—1967." It is available at 15 cents a copy or $13.50 per hundred from: AFL-CIO Pamphlet Div., 815 Sixteenth St., NW, Washington, D.C. 20006.

A foreword by Federation Pres. George Meany evaluates the first session, noting "limited progress" in a few areas, "inadequate funding" of major federal programs and "shocking" lack of action in many areas of importance to labor and the nation.

The pamphlet contains a detailed summary of the progress of the major bills considered in the first session.

90th Congress Lag Laid To 47 New Republicans

A leader of the liberal Democratic contingent in the House told labor's legislative representatives that there is "a very simple explanation" why progressive legislation is in difficulty in the 90th Congress.

Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) noted that "learned columnists" have speculated at length about the "mood of the country, the party's congressional leadership and the vigor of the Administration in pushing its programs."

In fact, O'Hara said, the only difference between this Congress and the "outstanding" 89th Congress is the fact that 47 new Republicans replaced Democrats in the House.

With few exceptions, he said, they have proved to be at least as conservative as elder House Republicans. The "new breed" GOP congressmen, O'Hara declared, "only sound different; they don't vote different . . . It's the same old dinosaur after dropping off his old skin."

O'Hara is the chairman of the Democratic Study Group, the caucus of liberal Democratic congressmen. He addressed a meeting of legislative representatives of AFL-CIO affiliates.

O'Hara stressed that there has been no change in the voting pattern of House Democrats. The northern and western Democrats, he said, have supported the Administration program to the same extent as they did in the 89th Congress. The pattern of southern Democratic voting hasn't changed either, he said. The Republican votes have made the difference, O'Hara contended, "and if we had today's Congress in the 89th" medicare and other breakthroughs would have been beaten or cut back.

O'Hara said the DSG is trying to overcome in part the loss of liberal congressmen by stepping up its efforts to assure a bigger attendance of liberals on the House floor when key teller votes are taken in the Committee of the Whole.

A large number of congressmen on both sides of the issue are normally absent on these non-record votes, he pointed out.

Curb on Tax-Free Bonds Endorsed by Treasury

The Administration has taken a clear-cut stand for ending the tax exemption of state and local industrial bonds—an increasingly common method of luring industry through low-cost financing of new plants. The AFL-CIO has condemned industrial bonds as a "vicious" practice that "threatens workers' job security."

Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff (D-Conn.), who has sponsored legislation to end the misuse of tax-free bonds to benefit private industry, made public a letter from the Treasury Dept. expressing "strong support" for his bill.

An accompanying report by the department said there has been a "geometric growth" in the issuance of industrial bonds and an increasingly heavy drain on federal tax revenues.

In 1960, only 13 states authorized such bonds and most of the $70 million in bonds issued that year were to build plants for small manufacturers.

Currently, the Treasury Dept. said, 40 states authorize communities to issue industrial development bonds and more than $1 billion of such bonds were publicly marketed last year—including hundreds of millions of dollars to benefit some of the nation's largest corporations.

The report said the government doesn't have exact statistics on the tax-exempt industrial bond issues privately marketed "but they may involve more than twice the amount of publicly sold issues."

AFL-CIO 'Steadfast'

Ribicoff told the Senate the AFL-CIO "has been steadfast in urging federal legislation to end the misuse of tax-free state and local bonds to build plants for private industry."

He put into the Congressional Record the text of a resolution adopted at the federation's last convention asking "legislation that will finally close the federal tax loophole."

The tax exemption for state and local bonds, the AFL-CIO resolution noted, was intended to help communities "provide schools and other public services—not to build plants for private use."

Purdy of CWA Heads Labor's Voter Drive

LaRoy H. Purdy, Communications Workers civic affairs director, has been named by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to head the federation's national registration and get-out-the vote drive for 1968.

Purdy, who has been given a leave of absence by CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne through the November election, will begin working out of the COPE office in Washington on April 1.

He fills the registration post held in two previous campaign by the late Roy Reuther of the Auto Workers.

A native of Grand Junction, Colo., Purdy has been CWA civic affairs director since 1955 and under his direction the union has set new highs year after year in its voluntary contributions to COPE.

Purdy has been active in CWA since 1938. He was elected head of the union's Division 17 in 1947 and director of CWA's District 8 in 1951. He served in the Colorado State Senate from 1948 to 1952.

J. B. S. Hardman Dies, Edited ACWA's Advance

New York—J. B. S. Hardman, an editor, writer and lecturer in the labor field for more than 40 years, died in his sleep at his home here. He was 85 years old.

Hardman was editor of The Advance, official publication of the Clothing Workers, from 1920 to 1944. He also served as the ACWA's education director and editor-in-chief of its publications. He helped organize and was president of the American Labor Press Association during World War II.

Born in Russia, he was harassed and jailed for his Social Democratic and labor activities. He came to the U.S. after being exiled in 1908.

Economic, Racial:

LBJ Asks Removal Of College Barriers

"A new and sweeping national goal" of making higher education available to all qualified high school graduates was urged by Pres. Johnson in his education message to Congress.

Removal of economic and racial barriers to college, the President said is the key to assuring citizens of a fifth freedom—"freedom from ignorance."

This fifth freedom, he added, is as "essential" as the four basic freedoms proclaimed by Pres. Roosevelt in 1941: freedom of speech and worship, from want and fear.

Johnson also called for further aid for elementary, secondary and vocational education as a means of helping the nation's youth get as much learning as they can absorb. But he acknowledged that his proposals included reduction or deferral of programs for school construction and equipment in the face of "stringent" budget requirements.

The President emphasized, however, that programs directly affecting educational opportunity "cannot be deferred."

Commissioner of Education Harold Howe II said that the President's proposed total federal expenditure for education in the fiscal year starting July 1 is $11.6 billion, compared to $10.8 billion for the current year.

Of the proposed amount for fiscal 1969, the Office of Education would get $4.1 billion, compared to $3.9 billion this year.

In the area of higher education, the President called for passage of an Educational Opportunity Act of 1968 to help 1.5 million students attend college next year through guaranteed loans and other forms of aid—an increase of 20 percent.

The legislation would simplify student aid programs to assist colleges in developing plans tailored to each student's need. It would also provide $15 million for new programs of tutoring, counseling and special services for needy students.

Johnson asked Congress to extend and strengthen "three vital laws" which have served the nation well in support of higher education—the National Defense Education Act, the Higher Education Facilities Act and the Higher Education Act.

The President also proposed a "networks for knowledge" law to set up a pilot program of new financial incentives for college and universities to pool resources by sharing facilities, equipment, faculties, libraries and educational television.

He recommended new measures to increase federal funds for graduate schools and underwrite their efforts to expand; more government sponsored research in universities; and appropriations to help universities' international programs.

These programs, the President observed, "will by no means solve the problem of higher education in America." What is needed, he said, is "a comprehensive set of goals and a precise plan of action." He announced that he has directed the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare to begin developing these goals.

In the field of elementary and secondary education, the President urged Congress to appropriate funds "well in advance" of the school year so that state and local school officials can plan "with a clear idea" of resources available.

To "focus our aid where the need is greatest," Johnson called for:

- Increasing funds for the Head Start pre-school and follow-through programs for children of the poor from $340 million this year to $380 million in fiscal 1969.
- An initial $5 million appropriation to launch a new bilingual education program. to help Mexican-American, Puerto Rican and other children who are separated from good education by a language barrier.
- Providing $85 million in fiscal 1969 for special programs to educate mentally retarded and physically handicapped children, compared to $53 million this year.
- Appropriations of $30 million for the program which helps schools develop plans to reduce dropouts, $50 million for adult education and $177 million for research into teaching and learning.
- Sufficient funds to help 30,000 poor but talented students prepare for college education under an Upward Bound program.
- Money to permit the training of 45,000 teachers, administrators and other professionals under the Education Professions Development Act of 1967 and appropriations to train 4,000 in the Teacher Corps.

In another area, Johnson recommended passage of a Partnership for Learning and Earning Act to strengthen vocational education.

It would consolidate three existing laws, give new flexibility to a system of matching grants "so states can concentrate funds where most needed" and encourage long-range planning, the President said.

COMMUNITY SERVICES of the Communication Workers was the subject of a three-day conference in Washington attended by CWA's district representatives. CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne (center, far side of table) and CSA Dir. Leo Perlis (at Beirne's right) were principal speakers at the meeting. The representatives set plans for increasing CWA's participation in youth, consumer and community projects.

Warnings Prove False:

Increase in U.S. Wage Floor Taken in Stride by Economy

groups, topped by those 16 to 21 (6.8 percent).

- Manufacturing jobs increased by 121,000 workers. Fourteen of 21 major manufacturing groups employed more workers, with the increases concentrated in such relatively low-wage groups as tobacco, textiles, apparel and food.
- In the retail and service industries for which data are available, employment was greater in September 1967 than in January 1967, and also than in each line of retail trade a year earlier. In hotels there was a 1.4 percent increase in jobs but in laundries a 1 percent decline.

The chief explanation for the relative ease of adjustment to the law changes "lies in the nature of the changes," the report stated. It said the basic philosophy underlying minimum wage changes has always been that the rate at which substandard living conditions can be eliminated "must be based on the ability of industry to adjust" to the changes.

"For the first time in the history of the FLSA, the statutory minimum wage ($1.60) will yield an above-poverty wage to a full-time year-around worker," the report said of the latest increase. "It has taken almost 30 years to achieve the goal" set when the basic law was enacted in 1938.

Three special studies by the Wage-Hour Division showed that workers at the bottom of the wage ladder were the chief beneficiaries of the FLSA amendments. In restaurants, employment increased among covered workers but declined among those not protected by the law. In hotels, jobs increased in both covered and noncovered sectors.

Most of the employment increases in both hotels and restaurants, the study showed, were in the South, where the minimum wage "had the greatest impact."

On farms, productivity continued to increase and net farm income remained at near-record levels. Employment continued its long-trend decline but the drop in hirings on covered farms was only a third as great as on farms exempt from the minimum wage law—generally the smaller, family-type farms.

The study noted that a concerted effort was made by the Labor Dept. to encourage reports of adverse effects. A small number of such reports was received, but more than half of the reported plant closings or layoffs were "found to have no substance."

The Labor Dept. said specific reports involving only 235 business places were received from February through August 1967, out of 700,000 newly covered establishments. Of nine plant closings reported, four never occurred; two plants reopened after temporary shutdowns, and three plant closings affected only 33 workers.

A special study of the effect of the wage-law changes on prices showed that the Consumer Price Index rose 1.1 percent in a six-month period after the changes compared with 1.7 percent in the previous year. Retail prices of goods produced by relatively high-wage industries increased more than prices of goods produced by nondurable goods industries, where the minimum wage has the greatest impact, the study found.

In hotels and motels, almost all the wage increases were concentrated among workers at the lowest end of the scale—those earning less than $1.05 an hour. There was little evidence of secondary or indirect wage increases to maintain wage differentials, the report said.

A study of the law's workings in Puerto Rico showed that the economy "adjusted well" to the automatic wage increases required last year, and employment island-wide has increased. But employment declined 36 percent in the handkerchief industry and a special industry study committee was named in 1967.

Findings in a special overtime survey indicated that 29 percent of all workers covered by the law as of May 1964 worked overtime. But the effectiveness of the law's overtime pay requirements as a deterrent to long hours was reduced by the increased value of fringe benefits, which are not included in computing overtime pay.

Minimum Pay Job Cutbacks Found 'Myth'

A newspaper columnists' myth-busting on the minimum wage won the praise of the House sponsor of the 1966 wage-hour legislation.

Rep. John H. Dent (D-Pa.) called his colleagues' attention to a recent column by Sylvia Porter, which he set "most effectively" dispels "the myth of job losses" resulting from increases in the minimum wage.

Mrs. Porter's widely syndicated column quotes a business organization as charging that hundreds of thousands of jobs were lost last year because minimum wages were raised and that the latest increase, on Feb. 1, might price another million jobs out of the market.

In fact, the column points out, the number of employes in fields covered by the minimum wage "actually increased by hundreds of thousands of workers."

Despite expansion of coverage, only about half the labor force and less than half of all employers in the nation are affected by the Fair Labor Standards Act.

And finally, the column stresses, even those brought up to the $1.60 level will still be "on the brink of poverty."

The column concludes: "It is difficult, if not impossible, to argue that the health of the U.S. economy demands that wages of the bottom-scale worker be depressed below these levels."

GROUNDBREAKING ceremonies were held by the Greater New Haven Central Labor Council for Trade Union Plaza, a 77-unit non-profit cooperative housing development. From left, Business Agent Andrew Sacco, Carpenters Local 79; Council Sec. Dante J. Bartolini; Council Pres. Vincent J. Sirabella; Gen. Chairman Joseph E. Burns, Machinists Lodge 1112; Business Mgr. President Asks Package Of Crime Control Laws

A package of tough new laws to combat crime and drug abuse, coupled with stepped-up federal aid to local law enforcement agencies, has been proposed by Pres. Johnson.

Some of the President's 22-point program is a repeat of legislative proposals Congress ignored last year—such as gun control. Part of it is an expansion of pending legislation—including a doubling of the $50 million Johnson asked last year for his proposed Safe Streets & Crime Control Act. And some of the proposals are new, such as a stiff drug control bill that would make the sale of LSD a felony and possession a misdemeanor.

Johnson asked $557 million in appropriations for an expanded federal crime-busting effort, about 28 percent more than last year's budget. Part of the increase would go to expand Justice Dept. anti-racketeering teams in major cities, along with increases in the number of FBI agents, assistant U.S. attorneys and Justice Dept. criminal division lawyers.

He proposed a new federal anti-riot law making it a felony punishable by up to five years in prison for any person crossing state lines to intentionally incite or organize a riot.

Johnson stresed that the proposed legislation is "narrowly and carefully drawn" so as not to impede free speech or peaceful assembly.

"It is not a solution to our urban problems," he said. But it is intended to protect society "against those who would tear it apart."

The President also called for passage of an Alcoholism Rehabilitation Act "to help provide more effective treatment — rather than simple detention — of alcoholics."

Johnson renewed his proposal for a "privacy" law to outlaw electronic eavesdropping. He asked a ban on advertisement and mailing of automobile master keys as a means of cutting down on car theft.

The President also proposed that the model cities program include a "model precincts" program with the goal of assuring "safe streets in safe neighborhoods through more effective crime prevention and law enforcement."

Johnson noted that "crime victimizes most severely and most directly those in poverty and those in minority groups." He declared: "No people need or want effective and fair law enforcement more than those who live in our crowded inner cities."

Canadair Pact Takes Big Step Toward Parity

Montreal—A four-step increase averaging 66.6 cents an hour over 33 months has been won by the Machinists for 5,400 production and maintenance employes of Canadair, Ltd., big aerospace subcontractor owned by General Dynamics.

The IAM said the settlement, its first 1968 aerospace contract, represents a "long step toward parity" for Canadian workers with aerospace rates in the U.S., and reflects an improved climate of relations as compared with 1965, when union members stayed on strike for eight weeks.

Members of IAM Local 712 voted by an 84 percent margin to ratify the new pact, which includes a first-year increase averaging 45 cents, or 19 percent.

The settlement provides for a new productivity improvement plan that could pay up to 12 cents an hour in addition to the agreed-on wage increases. Under the new plan, payment will be computed on a cents-per-hour index based on the "on time" completed schedule of orders each month.

The IAM said the new Canadian rates, though still below union goals for U.S. contracts this year, will bring tool and diemakers up 89 cents in four steps to a rate of $3.77 an hour. By June 1970, journeyman machinists will have their rate jumped 91 cents to $3.66 an hour, and laborers, at the lower end of the wage scale, by 59 cents to $2.57.

The new pact, retroactive to last Dec. 2, provides initial hourly increases ranging from 27 to 60 cents with additional raises of 8-13 cents next December, again a year later and finally in June 1970.

Health insurance, life insurance and pension benefits were increased and premiums reduced. Life insurance was increased from $6,000 to $7,000 and up, based on wage rates. Retirees after Dec. 1, 1969, will be entitled to $1,000 life insurance coverage.

The Canadian pension plan was overhauled to provide 100 percent vesting rights after 10 years' service at age 40. Starting Jan. 1, 1969, pensions will be fully vested after 10 years of service.

As a first step toward eliminating time clocks, punching out at the end of a shift will be eliminated.

January Jobless Rate Declines to 3.5 Percent

ary 1967. The rate for teenagers, 11.3 percent, was two-tenths of 1 percent higher over the year.

The unemployment rates for white workers and non-white workers were 3.2 and 6.4 percent, respectively. These represented drops of one-tenth and three-tenths percent since last January. Thus, despite the relative improvement, the non-white unemployment rate was exactly double the rate for whites.

Last month, in its year-end summary, the department said that the rate of unemployment among nonwhites — with Negroes comprising 92 percent of the total—was never less than double the white jobless rate during 1967.

On the jobs side, total employment in January was 73.3 million. Seasonally adjusted, the figure was up only slightly from December. Over the year, total jobs were up by 1.1 million.

Employment in manufacturing, trade, service industries, and state and local government continued to move up as in recent months, but construction employment dropped from December.

The Labor Dept. attributed the drop to "extremely cold and snowy weather." The jobless rate among construction workers in January was 8.3 percent, up six-tenths of 1 percent over last January.

These were employment figures in January on an industry basis, seasonally adjusted.

Manufacturing, 19.5 million, up 43,000 from December; transportation and utilities, 4.3 million, down 2,000; wholesale and retail trade, 13.9 million, up 32,000; finance, 3.3 million, up 8,000; services, 10.4 million, up 34,000; government, 12 million, up 44,000, and construction 2.8 million, down 324,000.

In another area, the Labor Dept. reported that average hourly earnings for workers on private nonfarm payrolls were $2.75 in January—up three cents from December and 14 cents from last January.

Because of a decline in the workweek, however, weekly earnings at $103.40 were down 50 cents from December. Their workweek averaged 37.6 hours in January, a decline of six tenths of 1 percent from December.

For factory production workers the workweek dropped from 40.8 hours in December to 40.5 hours.

Walsh Elected To ULLICO Post

New York City—The Union Labor Life Insurance Co. executive committee elected Theatrical Employes Pres. Richard F. Walsh as ULLICO secretary, succeeding Harry C. Bates, Bricklayers' president emeritus, who has resigned the post.

Presidents Thomas F. Murphy, Bricklayers, and George L. O'Brien, Railway Carmen, were elected directors, and Pres. Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers was named to the committee.

ULLICO Pres. Edmund P. Tobin reported that the company had $1.9 billion of life insurance in force in 1967 and assets of $77 million.

Harvester Official Appointed to EEOC

The Senate confirmed Pres. Johnson's appointment of Elizabeth Jane Kuck of Chicago as a member of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission succeeding Commissioner Aileen Hernandez, resigned. Miss Kuck has been supervisor of personnel policies for Intl. Harvester Co.

The appointment is for a term expiring July 1, 1970. The new commissioner has been a Harvester employe since 1941.

Filibuster Continues:

Senate Rejects Move To Dilute Rights Bill

Supporters of the Administration's civil rights bill forced a test vote after more than two weeks of fruitless debate, and by a 54-29 majority sidetracked a Southern substitute which would have seriously diluted the bill's protection for Negroes and civil rights workers.

The bill before the Senate—one part of the civil rights package Pres. Johnson has termed "essential"—would make it a federal crime for private citizens to interfere by violence or intimidation with Negroes exercising specific legal rights, such as attending non-segregated schools, voting, using public accommodations or having equal opportunity in employment.

A substitute, sponsored by Sen. Sam J. Ervin, Jr., would have taken the specifics out of the bill and replaced it with generalized language which civil rights supporters say would have been of little value in dealing with the vigilantism the legislation seeks to prevent.

Although Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen joined with the Dixie bloc in opposing the motion to table—and thus kill—the Ervin substitute, a majority of Republicans refused to follow his lead.

Motion Carries

The successful motion to table was sponsored by Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) and Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.). It was supported by 35 Democrats and 19 Republicans. Opposed were 16 Democrats, all from the South, and 13 Republicans, nearly all hard-core conservatives.

Immediately following the tabling vote, Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) and Sen. Edward W. Brooke (R-Mass.), introduced the Administration's open housing bill as an amendment—thus moving on the offensive for the first time during the debate.

The open housing bill has been before the southern-led Banking & Currency Committee and Mondale told the Senate that eight of the 14 members of the committee are cosponsors of the amendment.

During the week before the vote, Dirksen had sought to work out a compromise version of the Ervin Amendment with Senator Majority Leader Mike Mansfield in an effort, he said, to avoid a filibuster and pass some sort of legislation.

Dirksen asked the Senate to defeat the tabling motion on the Ervin substitute to allow more time for negotiations, but Mansfield joined in supporting the move to kill the Ervin bill.

The Senate vote—considered a general test of support for civil rights legislation—was possible because a motion to table is nondebatable. There was no indication, however, that the Dixie bloc will relent in its opposition and permit the main bill to come to a vote.

On past civil rights filibusters, the two-thirds vote to limit debate has been accomplished only with Dirksen's support and has failed when the Republican leader joined with the Dixie bloc—as he did in 1966.

Mansfield in the past has supported cloture, but when cloture votes have failed he has moved to sidetrack the legislation and go on to other business rather than seek to wear down the opposition.

The House approved a bill extending the life of the Export-Import Bank and increasing its lending authority, adding a curb on transactions with Communist countries. A similar bill had passed the Senate earlier and the measure now goes to conference.

The House Ways & Means Committee tentatively approved a bill to continue the present 10 percent telephone and 7 percent auto excise taxes. They otherwise would drop to 1 percent and 2 percent on Apr. 1. The extension has been sought by the Administration.

Travel Tax Pushed

Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) indicated at hearings that he is inclined to go along with the President's request for a special tax on travel abroad as an emergency method of slowing the dollar drain. The proposed tax on tourist spending that exceeds $7 a day would not apply to Western Hemisphere countries.

However, Mills again all but ruled out committee action on the 10 percent income tax surcharge which Pres. Johnson has repeatedly sought from Congress.

A replay of the sharp House battle over meat inspection appeared in the making over poultry legislation. House Agriculture Committee Chairman W. R. Poage (D-Tex.) introduced a bill offering grants to states that voluntarily adopted federal standards for poultry inspection—but not requiring them to do so. Last year the House approved this toothless approach for meat inspection, but then voted to go along with the stronger Senate bill which imposed federal inspection if the states did not act.

Boston Newsman Named Democratic PR Chief

The Democratic National Committee has announced the appointment of William F. McSweeny, a former newsman with the Boston Record-American, as its director of public affairs.

John M. Bailey, committee national chairman, said McSweeny will assume the post held by Albert Mark, who has been named director of the committee's research and information division.

United Funds Expand Staff Of CSA Aides

Appointment of four AFL-CIO Community Services liaison representatives on the national staff of United Community Funds & Councils of America was announced by Leo Perlis, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services.

The appointments include William A. Davies, Ralph C. Smith, Francis J. Sugrue and Herman J. Yekel.

Davies, a member of the Steelworkers, was formerly director of community services for the Ohio State AFL-CIO. He now coordinates the CSA training program.

Smith, a member of the Rubber Workers, was formerly AFL-CIO-CSA representative with the United Fund in Akron. He is now CSA regional representative for the South.

Sugrue, a member of the Newspaper Guild, was formerly a reporter on the staff of the New York Herald Tribune. He is in charge of special projects.

Yekel, a member of the Steelworkers, was formerly AFL-CIO-CSA representative with the United Fund in Warren, Ohio. He is now CSA regional representative for the Midwest.

POSTAL CLERKS legislative conference brought 2,000 delegates to Washington to push for a federal law governing union-management relations in the government service. UFPC Pres. E. C. Hallbeck is shown opening the three-day rally.

Postal Rally Asks Federal Labor Law

Two thousand postal clerks from all sections of the nation held a three-day rally in the nation's capital to press for a union recognition law "to carry out the intent" of the presidential executive order which now governs employe-management relations in the federal service.

They opened with an enthusiastic, standing-room only session at the Willard Hotel to cheer pledges of support from key members of both the House and Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committees. Speakers included the two chief sponsors of the union-backed legislation—Sen. Daniel B. Brewster (D-Md.) and Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.).

Lawmakers Visited

Then they moved over to Capitol Hill, visiting their home state congressmen and senators in their offices, or meeting with them at breakfast and lunch sessions.

A Cabinet-level task force is currently considering revisions in the 1962 executive order, including proposals advanced by the AFL-CIO and its affiliates for more meaningful collective bargaining, improving representation procedures and providing methods of resolving bargaining deadlocks.

Postal Clerks Pres. E. C. Hallbeck told the rally that legislation is preferable to a rewriting of the presidential directive because policies and attitudes of top government administrators are subject to change with changes of administration.

seek congressional authority for a comprehensive study of auto insurance by the Dept. of Transportation—a long term investigation of 18 to 24 months on top of preliminary studies the department has already made.

Auto insurance premiums have been mounting, lawsuits have clogged the courts and, Johnson noted, complaints of arbitrary cancellations and discrimination in issuing policies have been widespread.

In two areas not requiring congressional action, the President announced a high-level study of warranties, guarantees and appliance repairs and reiterated his intention to appoint a special counsel at the Justice Dept. to be the "consumer's lawyer."

Betty Furness, the President's special assistant on consumer affairs, will work with the secretaries of Commerce and Labor the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission and industry representatives to seek improvements in the quality of service and repairs, "assure that warranties and guarantees say what they mean."

Johnson also urged Congress to complete action on pending consumer legislation, including the truth-in-lending bill which awaits a House-Senate conference agreement, the Senate-passed pipeline safety and fire safety bills, measures to guard against fraud in land sales and regulate mutual stock funds, and the electric power reliability bill to seek to prevent regional power blackouts.

Johnson also used the consumer message to reiterate his plea to Congress to act on a tax increase to prevent inflation and to repeat his call for wage and price "restraint and responsibility."

The President and his top aides have made it clear that a hefty package of consumer legislation is a top Administration goal in this session of Congress.

On hand for a White House briefing on the consumer message were not only Miss Furness but a lineup of Cabinet members and commission chairman to discuss and answer questions on portions of the program with which their agencies will deal.

While the President's message merely urged the House and Senate "to resolve their differences promptly and to give the consumer a strong truth-in-lending laws," Miss Furness made clear her satisfaction with the "very strong" House version. She said the Administration is "delighted" at the inclusion of revolving credit by the House.

Wirtz Calls for Federal Standards To Insure Worker Safety on Job

ers, or over 550 percent higher."

Wirtz also noted that the strengthening amendments to the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act led to Labor Dept. regulations that helped reduce the injury rate in shipyards by 44 percent over a seven-year period and the longshore injury rate by 38 percent. The direct saving in injury costs was more than $33 million, he said. "In addition, individual employers have reported millions of dollars in insurance rebates from reduced injury experience."

The Administration bill would permit the secretary of labor to cede jurisdiction to states with adequate enforcement machinery with the federal government paying the cost.

It would also direct a comprehensive research program in occupational health and safety under the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

Wirtz noted that currently the government spends the equivalent of $6.57 on research for each work-related death, as compared with $95 per death for traffic accident research and nearly $415 for each cancer death.

The Administration bill provides for three methods of enforcement of federal safety and health regulations.

Normally, if a violation is found the Labor Dept. will hold hearings and if the finding is confirmed, issue a "cease and desist" order which an employer can appeal to federal court.

The bill would allow the secretary of labor to go directly to federal court for an injunction to halt a serious violation, pending a full hearing.

In the most urgent situations, where an inspector finds violations which threaten "imminent harm to the safety and health of workers," he may issue an "instant" order requiring that employes be kept away from the hazardous areas until safety has been restored.

The House Labor subcommittee, after hearing Wirtz, planned to hold hearings on a separate construction safety bill and then return to further hearings on the overall legislation.

Building Trades to Extend Training, Jobs Programs

FARM WORKERS carrying Delano, Calif., grape strike banner join 2,000 New York City unionists on demonstration picket line in support of copper strikers at entrance to Third Avenue headquarters of Anaconda Co. Next stop was a copper support rally by Local 3, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, at Manhattan Center.

Big Copper Refinery Signs Pact

Carteret, N.J.—The nation's largest copper refinery broke away from the Big Four-led industry combine and agreed to give 1,500 striking union employes a wage-pension-insurance package valued at $1.07 an hour over a 40-month contract term.

Members of Steelworkers Local 837 voted to accept the offer from the U.S. Metals Refining Co., a subsidiary of American Metal Climax, Inc. It will place refinery workers "in the forefront of the nonferrous metals industry," the union reported, with gains that "compare favorably with any existing benefits in American industry."

U.S. Metals is the third "independent" firm to reach agreement with a union since more than 50,000 members of 26 unions walked out, starting July 15, at 61 properties in 23 states. The White Pine (Mich.) Copper Co., settled with 1,800 strikers Jan. 25 and Pima Mining Co., Tucson, Ariz., reached agreement for 650 workers in October without a strike.

Meanwhile the AFL-CIO's strike relief fund passed the $850,000 mark and the Big Four companies made no move toward settlement as the strike entered its eighth month. Three members of a federal panel, in talks at New York and Washington, D.C., continued trying to unlock the logjam of company resistance to meaningful negotiations.

Companies Involved

The Big Four companies are the Anaconda Co., Kennecott Copper Corp., American Smelting & Refining Co. and Phelps Dodge Corp. Following their lead are smaller firms—Cerro Corp., Hecla Mining Co., Inspiration Consolidated Copper Co., Magma Copper Co., Miami Copper Co. and New Haven Copper Co.

The value of the U.S. Metals settlement, the Steelworkers reported, is substantially more than twice the level of proposals made before the mid-July walkout by any company, and still being adhered to by most of the larger and more profitable firms.

Federal mediators assisted in the settlement talks.

The new pact calls for gains of nearly 51 cents an hour in wages and other cash benefits; 31 cents in the pension program; and additional improvements in health and welfare plans. The latter included elimination of all employe payments for health coverage.

Plan Joint Effort With Negro Groups

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Presidents of the 18 AFL-CIO building trades unions adopted a blueprint for "affirmative action" to bring more Negro and other minority group workers into apprentice training.

They also pledged cooperation with efforts to use the model cities program as a means of opening up job and training opportunities for residents of the inner-city slums.

In both programs, the Building & Construction Trades Dept. and its affiliates will work closely with government, employer and civil rights organizations.

BCTD Pres. C. J. Haggerty said the action programs are a follow-up to the policy resolutions adopted at the department's convention last December. The convention said the building trades "will not tolerate discrimination" and will work to expand jobs for minority groups.

The department's executive council, joined by the presidents of all 18 affiliates, voted a strong endorsement of the cooperative programs planned for 48 cities. These programs are already in progress in 31 cities.

They typically involve government financing with sponsorship by unions and groups such as the Workers Defense League-A. Philip Randolph Institute and the Urban League. They seek out qualified candidates for apprenticeship programs and provide "catch-up" classes to help otherwise qualified applicants overcome educational deficiencies.

The union presidents called on local unions to work actively with these programs and others that will be started. They urged locals to "explore mutual problems" with organizations representing minority groups in the community.

In a letter to Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Haggerty said the building trades policy is one of "full and voluntary support of government efforts to eliminate, once and for all, discrimination on the basis of race, creed, color or national origin."

Haggerty said the building

Vocational Funds Hike Called Vital

A federal advisory commission proposed a sixfold increase in federal spending for vocational education—to $1.56 billion a year—and declared that "no sounder investment can be made by the citizens of the United States."

The advisory council, established under the 1963 Vocational Education Act, said at least 25 percent of vocational education funds should be earmarked for training beyond the high school level and adult programs.

Goal Defined

It said the national goal should be free, post-school training for everyone.

The report to Congress and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare noted progress that has been made under the 1963 law—the first congressional updating of federal aid to vocational education since 1917.

But it stressed that the availability and quality of vocational education is poorest "for those who need it most."

In areas of rural poverty, it noted, "high schools tend to be too small to offer more than agriculture, home economics and office education. Most of their students will ultimately seek urban jobs but

Over McCarthy Endorsement:

3 Union Presidents Withdraw from ADA

Charging that Americans for Democratic Action has become a "single issue" organization and has split the liberal coalition by its endorsement of Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy (D-Minn.) for President, three AFL-CIO union presidents have resigned from the ADA board.

The board's 65 to 47 endorsement of McCarthy for the Democratic presidential nomination was assailed by the union leaders as a repudiation of Pres. Johnson on the issues of Viet Nam while overlooking his overall record of accomplishment.

Resigning were I. W. Abel, president of the Steelworkers; Joseph A. Beirne, president of the Communications Workers; and Louis Stulberg, president of the Ladies' Garment Workers. Abel and Beirne are members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council. All three indicated their unions would withhold any further financial support from ADA.

A number of unions helped found ADA in 1947 as an organization bringing together democratic liberals to help achieve liberal programs and support liberal candidates.

The board's endorsement of McCarthy brought the resignation also of a number of individuals including John P. Roche, an adviser to Pres. Johnson and a former national chairman of ADA, and Leon H. Keyserling, a vice chairman, member of the board since 1953 and former chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers.

Abel, in a wire to John K. Galbraith, ADA national chairman, declared that "the board's repudiation of Pres. Johnson on the basis of a single issue in a time of national concern and commitment, while ignoring the President's overall record of accomplishment in areas of traditional concern to ADA, is unwarranted, unrealistic, shortsighted and ignores the realities of

Soaring Profits Head Toward Record Year

Profits are moving toward a record annual rate of $51 billion after taxes in 1968, the Wall Street Journal predicts on the basis of its own survey of earnings.

Business appears to be on "the track that leads straight from one quarterly profit record to another," the Journal declared.

The business paper's own compilation of reports from 581 companies reporting on earnings for the last three months of 1967 showed an increase of 5.2 percent over the same period in 1966.

If the government's survey on fourth quarter earnings for all U.S. corporations "shows a year-to-year gain as large as that posted by the 581 early reporters, it will mean that total corporate profits after taxes have hit an annual rate of over $51 billion," the paper said.

Even a gain smaller than 5.2 percent "would lift corporate profits above the previous record annual rate of $49.4 billion reached in the third quarter of 1966," the Journal concluded.

The outlook for the first three months of 1968, the paper said, "is for a bigger year-to-year gain in profits than was achieved in the fourth quarter."

Most industries expect sharp improvement in the first quarter of 1968, the Journal said, and the auto and rubber industries which "turned in a good profit per-

Labor Bids U. S. Ban Foreign Farm Workers

The wages, working conditions and job opportunities of American farm workers are hurt whenever foreign agricultural workers are brought into the United States, union spokesmen testified at Labor Dept. hearings.

Purpose of the hearings is to determine the "adverse effect" wage level—the amount that growers must offer U.S. workers before the Labor Dept. will certify that there is a shortage of farm labor and permit the importation of seasonal workers across the border.

Arnold Mayer, legislative representative of the Meat Cutters, testified for the AFL-CIO at Labor Dept. hearings in Washington, D.C.

He told the hearing panel that "U.S. workers will do any and all work in American agriculture if the wages and working conditions are right."

Similar testimony was given by the California State AFL-CIO at regional hearings in San Francisco.

Michael Peevey, the state federation's research director, said the ending of the large-scale bracero program three years ago led to substantial improvement in condiwage hike of 10 cents an hour was won, with further hikes of 10, 10 and 12 cents each year starting Dec. 1, 1968.

The union hailed as a major gain a job-class restructuring, effective at once, which reduces 74 different job grades to 17 classifications, with increments of 6 or 7 cents between each classification. The minimum rate was hiked from $2.66 an hour to $2.69 and the top rate from $3.67 to $3.74 an hour.

Two increments of a fourth of 1 cent each, effective now and on Dec. 1, 1969, plus the general wage increases, will bring the minimum and top rates to $3.11 and $4.24 respectively by Dec. 1, 1970, the USWA said.

Among pension improvements was an increase in the monthly benefit from $2 to $2.50 to $5 per year of service; full pensions at age 60 after 30 years of service, and $130 monthly supplements for disability or 30 years of service.

Widows' pensions were added, and the requirement for vesting was reduced to 10 years. The formula for actuarial reduction of early pensions was lowered, and present retirees will have their monthly benefit raised to $350 times years of service.

In the health and welfare area, weekly sickness and accident benefits were increased to a top of $75 for up to 52 weeks. Major medical coverage was increased to a top of $10,000, renewable by $1,000 yearly.

Other contract gains include improved vacations starting Apr. 1, 1969; a two-step increase in security-severance benefits to a total of $100 per year of service; an additional holiday for a total of nine; a shift differential boost and time-and-a-half pay for Sunday work as such.

Management agreed to cover clerical workers by the production workers' pension plan to to give them cash from the former company plan ranging from $2,000 to $9,000.

The unions pressing the strike in the balance of the nonferrous metals industry, besides the Steelworkers are the Auto Workers, Boilermakers, Bricklayers, Carpenters, Chemical Workers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Iron Workers, Laborers, Locomotive Engineers, Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, Machinists, Molders, Office & Professional Employes, Office Employes Independent Union, Operating Engineers, Painters, Pattern Makers, Plumbers, Railroad Trainmen, Railway Carmen, Railway Conductors, Sheet Metal Workers, Switchmen and Teamsters.

Students Back Strikers And Earn Extra Credit

Carlisle, Pa.—Political science students at Dickinson College here were given a choice of staging a mock Republican convention or actively supporting a local strike for extra credit. They chose the strike.

Now Dr. Lawrence Warner's students are strong allies of 450 members of Rubber Workers' Local 794 on strike at Carlisle Tire & Rubber Co., according to AFL-CIO Staff Representative Ben Stahl.

The students started things off, Stahl reported, by organizing a student-striker march through downtown Carlisle during Saturday shopping hours. They have since walked picket lines, worked in a strike kitchen and edited strike bulletins. Students not in Dr. Warner's classes have joined the activity.

Pres. Alfred Logan of Local 794 and Stahl have explained the strike issues to the political science classes, and the college is making arrangements for them to address other classes.

The union seeks wage increases, improved benefits, a union security clause and arbitration procedures, Stahl reported. Workers left their jobs on Jan. 29 after lengthy negotiations broke down.

The company's best offer has been an increase of 10 cents an hour over two years with no improvements in other benefits. "The union found the proposal completely inadequate," Stahl said.

The firm, one of three makers of bicycle tires in the nation, pleads hard times. But the union "won't take that from a company that recently bought out two firms in Ohio," Stahl reported.

The Rubber Workers won bargaining rights at Carlisle Tire & Rubber in 1966, but has been locked in tough battles ever since. The union beat back a decertification move last April.

Labor leaders here charge that Charles Kothke, the company attorney and an active leader in the National Association of Manufacturers, has master-minded the campaign against the local.

The employer obtained a court injunction limiting picketing. Stahl reported that the Salvation Army was pressured into removing its aid in a strike kitchen and police have escorted strikebreakers through picket lines.

"Dickinson College has been described as a conservative institution in a conservative community," he said, "but the action of the students may be just the thing to swing Carlisle citizens behind the strike."

Wallen to Direct New York Coalition

New York — Saul Wallen, a prominent labor-management arbitrator, has been selected by the New York Coalition to head its drive to bring jobs, job-training and better housing into the city's slum areas.

The coalition, formed in October, is composed of 100 leaders from labor, business, education, religion, civil rights and slum neighborhood groups. It is a local version of the national Urban Coalition.

New York Coalition Chairman Christian A. Herter, Jr., said Wallen would assume his post as executive director on Mar. 1.

Walsh-Healey Pay Floor Set at $1.60 an Hour

A minimum wage of $1.60 an hour has been determined for all industries under the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act, except those where the present determined minimum is higher, the Labor Dept. announced.

The determination under the law, which applies to employes working on government supply contracts in excess of $10,000, applies to contracts for which bids were invited, offers solicited or negotiations otherwise commenced after Feb. 1.

Guild Bids Hearst End Union-busting

Los Angeles—The Newspaper Guild's top leadership charged the Hearst Corporation with a systematic nationwide "assault against employe rights" and urged the company to bring an immediate end to newspaper strikes in both Los Angeles and San Francisco.

Disputes in the two cities have idled 5,000 newspaper workers, members of 12 AFL-CIO unions.

The Los Angeles fight centered on use of more than 100 professional strikebreakers imported by Hearst management to help operate the Herald-Examiner, which claimed to be the nation's largest afternoon newspaper prior to the strike Dec. 15 by members of ANG and the Machinists.

Hearst's "assault . . . against employe security, integrity and livelihood is being made while the Hearst Corporation is in the strongest financial position in its history," the Guild's executive board said after a four-day extraordinary meeting here.

The board announced it had authorized augmentation of a $1 million defense fund by arranging loans of "whatever size and at whatever cost" to win the fight with Hearst.

Guild local officials from cities where the union has contracts with Hearst attended the sessions.

ANG executives said Hearst's use of strikebreakers demonstrates the company's "contempt for the entire labor movement and the American system of free collective bargaining."

"An objective analysis of the facts . . . can only lead to the conclusion that Hearst is indeed embarked on a program to destroy his employes' rights to advance and protect their interests in the established American way," the ANG board said.

Hearst's California employes launched a massive mail campaign in support of state legislation to outlaw use of professional strikebreakers in industrial disputes.

Legislation was introduced Feb. 5 by Los Angeles Assemblyman Edward E. Elliott.

California labor for several years has unsuccessfully sought passage of such a law. It usually gets lobbied into limbo by employers, led by a strong newspaper publisher contingent, union sources explained.

Fourteen states and nearly 100 cities have laws banning use of professional strikebreakers.

The ANG board statement said the Hearst "anti-employe" campaign has a "single common denominator: emasculation of the locals' effectiveness at best, their total destruction at worst."

"Indeed, Hearst's action prior to and during the Herald-Examiner strike, together with its intransigence and harassments elsewhere, threaten nothing less than a return to the 1930s when Hearst fought the organization of the Guild with strikebreakers, private police and court orders in city after city," the statement added.

Guild officials cited four cities—San Francisco, Albany, N. Y., San Juan, Puerto Rico, and Milwaukee—in addition to Los Angeles where Hearst Corp. practices have indicated threats to job security and the union's ability to defend it.

IUE District 3 Elects Officers

New York—Delegates from local unions representing 105,000 members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers elected new officers of IUE District 3 to serve until regular elections next June.

Elected without opposition were Pres. William Bywater, who had been co-administrator of the district; Executive Sec. Jack Suarez, the other administrator; Marty Veneri, vice president, and Trustee Charles Folks. Edward Miller defeated one opponent for treasurer, 106-2.

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings previously had lifted the administratorship imposed on District 3 last July 17, when the union executive board removed former District Pres. Milton Weihrauch and Treas. Joseph Iozzi on charges involving their use of district funds and the 135 locals voted 98 percent to oust them.

'The Four Horsemen'

Boost for Bargaining:

5-Day Strike Yields Trainmen's Accord

The Railroad Trainmen hailed the settlement of a five-day strike against three major railroads as a boost for collective bargaining in the industry.

BRT Pres. Charles Luna said the agreement proves that bargaining will work "if the principals to a dispute are given the opportunity to work out their problems face-to-face without influence of others."

Companies struck by 6,000 BRT members were the Missouri Pacific Railroad, Texas & Pacific Railway, a MoPac subsidiary, and the Atlantic Coast Line section of the Seaboard Coast Line Railroad.

The walkout began Feb. 5 after the union charged the carriers with refusing to negotiate on train and yard crew sizes and arbitrarily changing work rules.

The Southern Railway and Union Pacific Railroad also unilaterally reduced train and yard crews, but the union chose not to enlarge the strike. Instead, it secured a court injunction in Lincoln, Nebr., requiring the UP to rescind its cutback. The BRT initiated similar court action against Southern in Washington, D.C.

Meanwhile, management spokesmen charged the strike was interfering with supplies for Viet Nam and urged appointment of a Presidential emergency board, which would have halted the strike for at least 60 days.

'No Emergency'

Luna immediately pledged that union members would help move all shipments for Viet Nam. He maintained that there was "no national emergency" in view of this offer and the availability of other forms of transportation in the areas served by the struck railroads.

When the Administration did not act to create an emergency board and Congress showed no inclination to legislate an end to the strike, the managements decided to negotiate, the union reported.

On Feb. 9, Pres. W. Thomas Rice of Seaboard asked Luna to meet with him and Presidents Downing Jenks of MoPac and W. Graham Claytor Jr. of Southern in Rice's Jacksonville, Fla. headquarters.

In a single day of bargaining, the railroads and the union reached agreement on a "memorandum of understanding" that ended the strike.

The railroads agreed to withdraw their unilaterally-imposed work rules and to increase 50 percent of the present one-brakeman and one-conductor crews to two-brakemen and a conductor no later than Feb. 15.

Further Talks

The carriers also agreed to further negotiations in line with the BRT's notice calling for minimum crews of two trainmen and a conductor on all runs.

The union served notices on railroads back in 1960 calling for two-and-one crews on all trains and it has since reached settlements on 34 railroads to provide for such crews.

However, after the compulsory arbitration award on train crews expired in 1966, eight railroads—including the four that signed the Feb. 9 interim agreement—delayed bargaining by litigation on the issue.

Recently, the U.S. Supreme Court refused to review an Appeals Court ruling that the BRT is free to bargain with individual carriers on the issue and cannot be compelled to bargain nationally.

Luna said negotiations are also being pressed on the four companies not involved in the interim settlement—Union Pacific, Gulf, Mobile & Ohio, Chesapeake & Ohio and Boston & Maine.

3 Union Presidents Resign ADA Offices

the present political situation.

"It is extremely unfortunate that the board's action endangers the long-standing coalition of liberal forces dedicated to liberal objectives. This coalition has served the principles of the ADA and the nation well, but because of the decision to abandon ADA's general purpose and objectives over an issue for which there is no evidence of opinion to vindicate the decision, I can no longer serve. . . ."

Stulberg termed the action "irresponsible" noting that "it is without precedent for ADA to make such endorsement prior to its own convention and to the nominating conventions of both major parties. The only exception was the ill-fated effort of ADA to dump Truman in 1948 and draft Eisenhower to run as the Democratic candidate."

The endorsement of McCarthy "is a repetition of the Eisenhower fiasco repeated at a perilous moment for American liberalism. . . . ADA's decision obviously arises from the fact that it has narrowed itself down to a one issue organization ready to endanger campaigns against poverty, for civil rights, for social security, for education, for urban progress, for labor standards in order to escalate its war against Johnson.

"In backing a 62 percent liberal (ADA World's listing of McCarthy's voting record in 1967) against Johnson, ADA raises questions as to its political credibility and motives."

Beirne declared that "for some time ADA has shown signs of becoming a single issue organization. Now that fact is established." The McCarthy endorsement, he said is "merely the last straw."

David Dubinsky, an AFL-CIO vice president, announced his "total disagreement" with the board's action but said he will stay on the board so that he can participate in the decision ADA takes "when Pres. Johnson is renominated."

Trades Sign No-Strike Pact With Brewery

St. Louis—The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Council of St. Louis and a St. Louis brewery issued a joint announcement of a proposed $10,350,000 expansion project at the brewery and a no-strike pledge from the building trades unions for the duration of construction.

A resolution, adopted by the 26 unions in the council, pledged that no work stoppage "due to strikes or jurisdictional disputes" would occur during the construction of the new facility for Anheuser-Busch, Inc.

In return, August A. Busch, Jr., president and board chairman of the brewery, will furnish plans for the new buildings and other construction to the various building trades involved so that jurisdiction may be determined before the work begins.

The company also agreed to put into effect all wage and fringe gains obtained for other construction workers in the area, whether through negotiations or strike.

"This is no ordinary agreement, and we believe that it is the first of its kind in this area," said Joseph Cousin, executive secretary of the labor council.

"When a labor union gives up its right to strike, we all know that it is giving up one of its most potent tools or weapons to assure labor's rights. Frankly, it is an experiment in mutual agreement and understanding," Cousin said.

New York Labor Blasts Mayor's Bid for Troops

New York—The New York State AFL-CIO supported a plan proposed by Gov. Nelson Rockefeller (R) for settling the New York City garbagemen's strike and urged the state legislature to pass enabling legislation.

The governor proposed that the State Dept. of Health take over the duties of the city Sanitation Dept. as a temporary emergency measure.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Raymond R. Corbett sent Rockefeller a message saying "you were completely right in rejecting the use of bayonets as a method of solution" and concluding "we heartily approve your program."

Earlier the New York City AFL-CIO condemned Mayor John V. Lindsay's request that the governor call up the National Guard to collect refuse piled up in the streets. The central body declared in a resolution "under no conditions will we tolerate the use of the National Guard against striking workers in New York City."

The resolution set up a special committee, headed by Pres. Peter J. Brennan of the New York Building & Construction Trades Council, to take any action deemed necessary to demonstrate labor's abhorrence of the use of troops in strikes.

The Central Labor Council urged Lindsay to reverse himself and accept the plan for ending the strike recommended by a mediation panel named by Rockefeller.

Further, the resolution pledged labor's full support of the 10,000 members of the Uniformed Sanitationmen's Association, a local of the unaffiliated Teamsters, in their contract dispute with the city.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, the dispute was still unresolved.

The sanitation workers, who struck on Feb. 2, returned to their jobs Feb. 10 under a settlement announced by Rockefeller.

The governor had rejected Lindsay's appeal for use of the National Guard, declaring such a move would cost the city far more than the proposed settlement with the union and create "real risks as far as the stability and structure of organized labor and organized community life are concerned."

Rockefeller announced that he would ask the legislature to take over the city's Sanitation Dept. temporarily while the workers returned to their jobs under terms proposed by the mediators.

These called for a $425 increase in annual wages that ranged from $6,424 to $7,956. Lindsay said the city's top offer was $375 annually, but Rockefeller contended the city had offered $400 in mediation sessions.

The legislature, however, delayed voting on the measure to give the city another opportunity to settle the dispute.

Meanwhile, State Supreme Court Justice Saul S. Streit fined the union $80,000 and suspended its dues checkoff for not obeying an anti-strike injunction issued under the state's Taylor Law which bans strikes by public employes.

Earlier, the local's president, John J. DeLury, was sentenced to a 15-day jail term by Streit after being held in criminal contempt for refusing to obey court mandates to order strikers back to work.

DeLury said the union would appeal the court decisions. Although embittered by the developments, the sanitation workers continued to remove the thousands of tons of piled up debris from the city's streets and sidewalks, working in shifts of up to 11 hours.

Contracts, New Strikes Mark Auto Bargaining

Detroit—The Auto Workers scored major gains in four new contracts covering 36,700 workers but took strike action to achieve union goals for 38,800 other workers in U.S. and Canadian auto plants.

The settlements were won by UAW negotiators for 17,000 strikers at the Pontiac, Mich., plant of General Motors; 7,500 strikers at seven plants of the Continental Motors companies in four states; without strikes for 8,500 at Chevrolet's metal fabricating plant and parts warehouse in Flint, Mich., and for 3,700 Champion Spark Plug workers in six U.S. and Canada locations.

Nearly 25,000 members of the UAW walked out Feb. 10 at six Canadian GM locations after rejecting the corporation's offer for conditional wage parity with U.S. workers. Committees resumed negotiations on local issues after the strike but no "master table" talks had been scheduled as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Two UAW locals in Flint struck Feb. 13 at the Chevrolet assembly and V-8 plants but returned after intensified talks brought an agreement on local contract supplements. To date 117 of 168 GM plant managements have come to terms with UAW locals on strictly local conditions. Strike deadlines have been set at some of the 51 remaining plants.

A strike that started Jan. 8 at the St. Louis plant of Chrysler Corp. continued, with 3,300 union members on the picket line.

The UAW reached agreement weeks ago with auto's Big Three on national contract terms but many local plant issues remained unresolved.

Union negotiators notified American Motors Corp., smallest of the major U.S. auto makers, that they will set a strike date in March if no company-wide contract is agreed to by Feb. 29.

Contract Ratified

UAW Sec.-Treas. Emil Mazey reported that a new three-year agreement with Champion Spark Plug Co. has been ratified by vote of union locals with 3,700 members. Plants involved in Detroit, Toledo and Cambridge, O., Burlington, Ia., Hellertown, Pa., and Windsor, Ont.

An outstanding feature, Mazey said, is wage parity for Champion's Canadian employes—one of the first parity agreements in the auto parts industry.

The Continental settlement involved 7,500 workers who had been out since Jan. 31 at plants in Detroit and Muskegon, Mich., Chicago, Toledo, and Milwaukee, Wis. Local issues are still unresolved at several locations, the union said.

Gardner to Head Urban Coalition

John W. Gardner will become chairman of the Urban Coalition when he steps down as secretary of Health, Education & Welfare on Mar. 1.

Announcement of Gardner's selection was made by Andrew Heiskell, chairman of the board of Time, Inc., and AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph, the co-chairman of the coalition's 37-member executive unit.

The coalition is an alliance of mayors, labor, business, church and civil rights groups dedicated to overcoming the massive problems of America's cities and the millions trapped in its slums.

Gardner said he discussed the offer of the chairmanship with Pres. Johnson "and he urged and encouraged me" to accept the post.

Ancient Myths

THE U.S. LABOR DEPT. has given the lie once again to the ancient mythology that an increase in the minimum wage spells ruination for American business and industry.

Labor Sec. Wirtz, in a report to Congress on the 1966 increases in the wage floor from $1.25 to $1.40 an hour and extension of coverage to 9.1 million workers, declared flatly that "there is little or no evidence of layoffs or plant shutdowns related to the minimum wage increase."

When the minimum wage moved up to $1.60 an hour on Feb. 1, 1968, it was accompanied by the predictable chorus of dire warnings of ruination. There were additional warnings that bringing the pay floor for American workers to slightly above the poverty level would be inflationary!

The Labor Dept.'s report has effectively demolished these arguments—as the reports have in every past year when the minimum wage was increased or coverage expanded. But this will not destroy the perniciously spread mythology nor stop those who are willing to exploit workers in the name of free enterprise.

PRES. JOHNSON'S proposals for federal standards on occupational health and safety to protect the thousands of workers who needlessly die or are maimed each year has already drawn opposition from some sectors of business and industry.

The cry is always the same—wage floors and measures to protect a worker's health and prevent accidents are added costs that will force a business to close its doors. It's not true about the minimum wage and it's not true about safety and occupational health!

Safety and occupational health protection has been left to the states and by and large they have failed miserably in this area. The need now is for meaningful federal standards for all those working in plants or shops in interstate commerce and for federal aid to states in areas not subject to federal regulation.

Wirtz told a House Labor subcommittee that the annual death rate from on-the-job accidents can be reduced from the present level of 14,500; that the number of workers suffering disabling injuries can be reduced from the current level of 2.2 million a year.

Occupational health hazards resulting from exposure to radiation, various chemicals and other materials used in a modern economy can also be reduced and the long-term danger to workers eliminated.

SOME OF THE more enlightened sectors of American business and industry have come to understand the importance of an increasing minimum wage in terms of greater purchasing power and as a basic aid to a growing and expanding economy. They understand also that a plant or shop relatively free of accidental deaths and injuries is a more efficient operation that will reduce their costs.

This understanding unfortunately is far from pervasive in the American industrial world. But there is continuing hope that sooner or later the lesson will be learned that a decent wage and safe working conditions are basic to the progress of the nation as well as to the self-interest of business and industry.

Equality and Opportunity:

Civil Rights Coalition Stresses 'Urgency' for Legislative Action

The following statement was adopted at the annual board meeting of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, a group composed of labor, church, civil rights and liberal organizations.

AT THIS TIME of racial and social crisis, the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, on the occasion of its annual board meeting, reaffirms its conviction that solutions to our nation's domestic problems can and must be achieved through peaceful, democratic means and within the American political system.

It is a reaffirmation made with a sense of burning urgency. For unless this Congress and this Administration act quickly, our reaffirmation may become empty rhetoric.

The bill the Senate is now debating, the civil rights protection act, would do much to protect citizens from violence in the exercise of such elementary rights as serving on juries, going to school, getting a job, using public transportation, visiting a restaurant or movie or enjoying the parks or other facilities paid for with their taxes. It would protect those working to help people achieve and exercise the rights to which they are constitutionally entitled.

But this bill alone will not advance us very far toward full equality. It does not address itself to two glaring injustices—the denial of equal access to housing and jobs. If the Fair Housing Act and the bill to strengthen the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission now before the Congress are added to the civil rights protection bill, we would then have legislation that would at least offer hope that Congress means to continue the work it began in 1964 and 1965 of correcting injustices through law.

We therefore call upon the Senate to combine the three bills into a single measure and to keep the Civil Rights Act of 1968 the pending business of the Senate until the filibuster is broken and this broader bill is passed. We call upon the President to exert the utmost influence in support of this course of action.

We deplore current efforts that tend to compromise the civil rights protection bill rather than strengthen it. The debilitating compromises being circulated are unnecessary and unacceptable retreats from the 14th Amendment. We urge the shelving of these proposed compromises and the return to the civil rights offensive through the passage of the fair housing and equal employment amendments.

BECAUSE WE BELIEVE that civil rights require not only the establishment and enforcement of rights in law, but also the realization of social and economic conditions in which alone the fulfillment of these rights is possible, we reaffirm our support of a legislative program that will guarantee decent jobs to all who are able to work, adequate housing, full education and a living income to all citizens mired in poverty.

We support the President in his call to private industry to help find 500,000 jobs for the hard-core unemployed. But it is a task that cannot be left to private industry alone. We urge enactment of legislation already before this Congress that would oblige the government to act as employer of last resort by channeling workers into needed public service jobs.

We also support the President's call for "a 10-year campaign to build six million new decent housing units for low and middle-income families."

The announced cuts in anti-poverty programs underscore the need for this Congress to provide adequate funds for the welfare and education programs it has already authorized. We know too well the disillusionment created when a program of promise is held out to desperate people and then withdrawn. We call on this session to vote sufficient funds to enable threatened programs to continue.

The first session of the 90th Congress committed a crime against the poor when it adopted welfare provisions that force mothers to take jobs, often wretched ones, or lose their benefits, and that put severe limits on aid to children in fatherless homes.

We therefore call upon this session to repeal these provisions and upon the President and the Department of Health, Education and Welfare to see that defenseless people do not suffer.

The goals we set forth tonight are modest, minimal and necessary. We shall do all in our power to fulfill them in 1968. We cannot and must not falter in our drive toward full equality.

President's Message:

America's Foreign Aid Program Best Hope for Peaceful Change

The following is excerpted from Pres. Johnson's special message to Congress on foreign aid entitled "To Build the Peace."

PEACE WILL never be secure so long as:

● Seven out of ten people on earth cannot read or write.

● Tens of millions of people each day—most of them children—are maimed and stunted by malnutrition.

● Diseases long conquered by science still ravage cities and villages around the world.

If most men can look forward to nothing more than a lifetime of backbreaking toil which only preserves their misery, violence will always beckon, freedom will never be under siege.

It is only when peace offers hope for a better life that it attracts the hundreds of millions around the world who live in the shadow of despair.

Twenty years ago America resolved to lead the world against the destructive power of man's oldest enemies. We declared war on the hunger, the ignorance, the disease, and the hopelessness which breed violence in human affairs.

We knew then that the job would take many years. We knew then that many trials and many disappointments would test our will.

But we also knew that, in the long run, a single ray of hope—a school, a road, a hybrid seed, a vaccination—can do more to build the peace and guard America from harm than guns and bombs.

THIS IS THE GREAT TRUTH upon which all our foreign aid programs are founded. It was valid in 1948 when we helped Greece and Turkey maintain their independence. It was valid in the early Fifties when the Marshall Plan helped rebuild a ruined Western Europe into a showcase of freedom. It was valid in the Sixties when we helped Taiwan and Iran and Israel take their places in the ranks of free nations able to defend their own independence, and moving toward prosperity on their own.

The programs I propose today are as important and as essential to the security of this nation as our military defenses. Victory on the battlefield must be matched by victory in the peaceful struggles which shape men's minds.

In these fateful years, we must not falter. In these decisive times, we dare not fail.

The foreign aid program for fiscal 1969 is designed to foster our fundamental American purpose: To help root out the causes of conflict and thus ensure our own security in a peaceful community of nations. For fiscal 1969, I propose:

● An economic aid appropriation of $2.5 billion.

● A military grant aid appropriation of $420 million.

● New and separate legislation for foreign military sales.

● A five-year program to develop and manufacture low-cost protein additives from fish, to help avoid the tragic brain damage now inflicted on millions of children because of malnutrition in their early years.

● That the United States join with other nations to expand the Intl. Development Association, the development-lending affiliate of the World Bank. For every two dollars the United States contributes, other nations will contribute three dollars.

● That the Congress authorize a contribution to new Special Funds of the Asian Development Bank.

● Prompt appropriation of the annual contribution to the Fund for Special Operations of the Inter-American Development Bank.

● A further authorization and appropriation of callable funds for the Inter-American Development Bank to stand behind the bank's borrowing in private money markets.

FOREIGN AID serves our national interest. It expresses our basic humanity. It may not always be popular, but it is right.

The peoples we seek to help are committed to change. This is an immutable fact of our time. The only questions are whether change will be peaceful or violent, whether it will liberate or enslave, whether it will build a community of free and prosperous nations or sentence the world to endless strife between rich and poor.

Foreign aid is the American answer to this question. It is a commitment to conscience as well as to country. It is a matter of national tradition as well as national security.

Last year some Americans forgot that tradition. My foreign aid request, already the smallest in history, was reduced by almost one-third.

The effects of that cut go much deeper than the fields which lie fallow, the factories not built, or the hospitals without modern equipment.

Our ambassadors all over the developing world report the deep and searching questions they are being asked. Has America resigned her leadership of the cause of freedom? Has she abandoned to fate the weak and the striving who are depending on her help?

This Congress can give a resounding answer to these questions by enacting the full amount I have requested. I do not propose this as a partisan measure. I propose it as an extension of the humane statesmanship of both parties for more than twenty years.

I said in my State of the Union address that it is not America's resources that are being tested, but her will. This is nowhere more true than in the developing countries where our help is a crucial margin between peaceful change and violent disaster.

I urge the Congress to meet this test.

Hazards Increasing:

Federal Job Safety Standards Urged to Halt State Failures

THE STATES have "failed miserably" to protect the on-the-job health and safety of workers, an AFL-CIO economist charged as he urged Congress to fill the void with strong federal safeguards.

New industrial methods and materials are increasing job hazards, said George Taylor of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, but there is "almost a total lack of effective state programs" to protect workers against them. He said that the Administration's proposed Occupational Health & Safety Act is a sound and economical approach to this long-neglected area.

Taylor pointed out that the pending legislation would provide effective safeguards for 50 to 75 million workers at a yearly cost of $2 or less per worker. He made the statements on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO-produced public affairs program broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Radio Network.

The labor economist said that some of the hazards workers face in the plant environment can also threaten the health and safety of people living in the general area of the plant. He cited the examples of radiation, carbon monoxide, carbon dioxide and sulphur, which "are released into the general atmosphere and never quite go away."

SUCH TOXIC MATERIALS build up, Taylor noted, and "become part of what you are exposed to day-by-day, whether you work in a particular plant or not." Therefore, measures that would make the workplaces safer and more healthful would "complement, rather than duplicate" legislative efforts to combat water and air pollution, Taylor asserted.

He said that the Administration's occupational health proposal provides for inter-agency cooperation that would add to the effectiveness of both efforts toward a common goal.

Reporters questioning Taylor were J. V. Reistrup of the Washington Post and Jerome Brazda of the Medical World News.

By Press Associates, Inc.

FOR THOSE CONCERNED with fair play for the consumer the passage of the truth-in-lending bill by the House of Representatives must be one of the brighter pages in the history of the 90th Congress.

Of course, there is no law yet. The Senate could accept the far stronger House measure or the bill might go to a House-Senate conference and predictions on the outcome would be risky.

The strong House measure, however, and the strong position of the House members of such a conference committee are a tribute to the resoluteness of the bill's floor manager in the House, Rep. Leonor Sullivan (D-Mo.).

Shortly after the Senate passed its far weaker legislation in truth-in-lending, she announced that she would fight to shore up the loopholes in the House bill.

Many felt she was talking for public consumption. If they did, they did not realize Rep. Sullivan is a mighty determined legislator.

The House Banking and Currency Committee accepted some of Mrs. Sullivan's recommendations on the bill but, by close margins, rejected others. She carried the fight to the floor of the House.

When debate on the bill opened, Mrs. Sullivan rose in the well of the House and told her colleagues:

"We have a long afternoon ahead of us and it should be a lively one, and well worth the members' time on the floor. There is nothing they could do in their offices this afternoon which would be nearly as important to as many of the constituents and businessmen in their districts as this first major bill to come before the House, one which will directly affect every citizen in many ways for years to come."

Mrs. Sullivan noted that "there is a lot to understand about the bread-and-butter, meat-and-potatoes and keep-your-head-above-water family financial problems involved in this legislation."

After exchanges with some members and some parliamentary by-play, the Missouri congresswoman zeroed in on one key amendment she wanted to knock out of the bill—the exemption where service charges are $10 or less. This would cover most credit transactions up to about $110.

This exemption, Mrs. Sullivan said, hits the low-income consumer hard—"when he buys a toaster or a washing machine or dryer or a radio or a small television set or a kitchenette set or some chairs or a sofa."

She clarified another point, too, which has confused many in credit transactions. If you go to a loan company and make a $100 loan for three months and pay $10 a month interest the interest rate is not 10 percent. Since the loan is only for three months, over a whole year it would be the equivalent of 40 percent. Mrs. Sullivan hit hard, in point after point, and won—the $10 exemption was knocked out.

HER NEXT TARGET was the exemption of revolving credit. Mrs. Sullivan said "we have talked about it for eight years and now we come to the moment of truth in truth-in-lending."

Most consumers are told they are paying 1.5 percent interest a month. What consumer groups and Mrs. Sullivan sought was a spelling out of both the simple annual interest rate and the amount in dollars and cents. At 1.5 percent per month the annual interest rate would be 18 percent.

The argument on revolving credit was sharp and confusing—but in the end the congresswoman got her way.

She did not stop there. She led the fight for provisions to limit the garnishment of debtor's wages and to include first mortgage loans. Also, under the House bill, advertisements mentioning any credit terms would have to provide detailed information on annual interest rates, cash prices, incidental charges and other conditions.

Mrs. Sullivan was not alone. She had strong support from liberal colleagues.

BROAD-BASED federal standards are essential to the on-the-job health and safety of millions of American workers, AFL-CIO Economist George Taylor (center), declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Jerome Brazda (left) of Medical World News and J. V. Reistrup of the Washington Post. The public affairs interview is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on Mutual Radio.

Labor Urged To Press Role Of Aiding Poor

Woodstock, Vt.—Gov. Philip H. Hoff (D-Vt.) called on the New England labor movement to continue to speak out on behalf of the poor of the area, declaring "if you don't care, who will?"

Hoff's appeal came at an anti-poverty seminar conducted for union activists from Vermont, Connecticut, Maine and Rhode Island. The two-day program was one of a series arranged by the Office of Economic Opportunity's trade union leadership training program with the cooperation of the Labor Relations & Research Center of the University of Massachusetts and the New England AFL-CIO Council.

To date 126 unionists from a six-state area have attended seminars in anti-poverty techniques. Sessions have been held at Northampton, Mass., Niantic, Conn., Waterville, Me. and Woodstock. Topics include legal services for the poor, programs for which OEO funds have been allocated, regional problems and community action.

The Woodstock seminar drew 26 trainees from four states. All joined in a "problem clinic" led by Program Dir. William Kemsely.

Participants included Dir. Edward J. Reichert of the Tri-County Legal Services Program, Littleton, N.H.; Henry Becker of the Clothing Workers, Manchester, Conn., and Miles Holmes of Warwick, R.I., consultant.

Among the program planners were George T. Guernsey of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education and Julius Rothman of the federation's Social Security Dept.

Sugar Wage Hearings Set for Puerto Rico

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz named three labor members to a review committee for the sugar manufacturing industry in Puerto Rico and announced that hearings on minimum wage rates will start Feb. 19 in Santurce, P. R.

Worker representatives are Vice Pres. Russell Lasley of the Packinghouse Workers, Assistant AFL-CIO Research Dir. Marvin Friedman and Luis G. Estades, UPWA attorney in Santurce.

House Agriculture Unit Fights Bargaining Bill

The House Agriculture Committee adopted what the AFL-CIO termed an "astounding resolution" calling on the Education & Labor Committee to kill legislation giving collective bargaining rights to farm workers.

The almost unprecedented attempt to intervene in the deliberations of another congressional committee was sharply denounced by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller in a telegram to Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr.

Thompson is chairman of the House Labor subcommittee which —after extensive hearings—approved the bargaining rights bill sponsored by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.).

Biemiller said the Agriculture Committee's action "was obviously based on either ignorance or bias."

The Labor subcommittee hearings "prove conclusively that the denial of social justice to America's farm workers is unwarranted and results only from widely exaggerated fears trumpeted by large corporate farm owners," Biemiller said. He noted that similar outcries were raised against the 1966 inclusion of farm workers under the minimum wage law and the "predicted disaster" proved "baseless."

The Agriculture Committee said "unlike industrial employers, farmers are uniquely susceptible to strikes . . . because of the perishability of their crops" and complained that "farm employers are now caught in a vicious cost-price squeeze."

Biemiller suggested that Thompson send copies of the subcommittee hearings to members of the Agriculture Committee. The hearings included testimony that the principal cause of farm worker strikes has been the refusal of the big growers to recognize and bargain with a union—a cause of strike the O'Hara bill seeks to eliminate.

Thompson, a strong supporter of the O'Hara bill, has invited Agriculture Committee Chairman W. R. Poage (D-Tex.) to sit in with the Labor subcommittee for a discussion of the legislation.

Stress Cooperation:

Training Plans Set By Building Trades

trades will make "maximum utilization of responsible civil rights organizations willing to join in a cooperative effort" to make the program work "with full recognition of the necessity for industry to formulate its requirements for employment and entry in the trade."

In reply, Wirtz commended the unions for "the forthright position" they have taken in voluntarily "recognizing and meeting social responsibilities."

Wirtz indicated that Labor Dept. will continue the anti-discrimination regulations of the Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training and not seek to impose a numerical quota system, which the unions oppose.

He wrote Haggerty that the "affirmative action program" adopted by the building trades presidents would "represent a strong and progessive forward step toward answering, once and for all, complaints that building trades unions may not be exerting their best efforts in full support of private and public action to eliminate discrimination."

On the model cities program, the unions offered "full cooperation" to the rehabilitation of slum neighborhoods.

The law requires a "maximum opportunity" for residents of the areas being rehabilitated to obtain jobs and job training.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, his executive assistant, Lane Kirkland, and Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan joined the building trades presidents in a discussion of the city rehabilitation program.

Meany and Keenan are members of a presidential committee, headed by industrialist Edgar F. Kaiser, which is charged with determining how private resources can best be mobilized to wipe out slums.

A seven-member committee of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. was named to meet with the Kaiser committee to discuss how the goals can best be accomplished.

The union delegation will include Haggerty, Dept. Sec.-Treas. Frank Bonadio, Presidents Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, M. A. Hutcheson of the Carpenters, Gordon M. Freeman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers, and Sec.-Treas. Peter Fosco of the Laborers.

Contract Opening Sought in Wools

New York — The woolen and worsted advisory council of the Textile Workers Union of America voted to recommend that contracts in the industry be reopened or terminated to clear the way for the negotiation of substantial wage and fringe improvements in the spring.

The council represents 15,000 workers in 50 plants. It will submit its recommendations to an industry-wide union conference here Mar. 2.

9 Fired Farm Unionists Win Jobs Back, Damages

Salinas, Calif.—Nine California farm workers, who charged they were fired for union activity, have won back their jobs at a guaranteed minimum wage of $4,500 a year along with $750 each in punitive damages.

Martin Produce Co. of Salinas agreed to the terms in an out-of-court settlement of a case pressed by California Rural Legal Assistance, a legal aid group funded by federal anti-poverty grants.

The workers, members of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, said they were fired by Martin last summer after the company discovered they had joined UFWOC.

CRLA attorneys, taking up the workers' case, pointed to the State Labor Code which specifies that employes have the right to join a union "free from the restraint, or coercion" of employers.

Monterey County Superior Court Judge Gordon L. Campbell ruled that the code applied and that an employer who fires farm workers for joining a union must rehire them and pay punitive damages.

After that, the employer agreed by stipulation to rehire the nine workers at the above terms and not to fire them again as long as they do their jobs without "good cause" for dismissal.

As long as Martin has a gross income "substantially the same or higher" than its 1964-66 average, the workers will receive the $4,500 annual minimum.

The agreement also provides that if one of the workers is discharged, an impartial arbitrator selected by the American Arbitration Association will be chosen to resolve any dispute.

The court interpretation and settlement was viewed as a rebuff to Gov. Ronald Reagan whose Administration opposed CRLA's handling of the case. The state contended that the workers' total earnings of $26,000 in eight months—an average of less than $2,900 each—was too much to qualify them as "poor."

CRLA attorneys pointed out that the workers, each of whom had a number of dependents, were particularly suitable for the organization's help since all of them had been out of work since they were fired.

Higher Farm Wages Linked to Alien Ban

tions of domestic farm workers.

"No foreign workers will be needed to harvest California crops in 1968," he testified.

Both Mayer and Peevey urged a complete halt to importation of workers.

Availability of imported labor "cushions the growers against having to raise wages and improve working conditions to the point necessary to attract and maintain a sufficient labor force," Mayer said.

Both witnesses said that the "adverse effect" wage should be raised considerably if the government does not ban outright importation.

The rate in the lowest-wage states should be above $1.55 an hour, Mayer said, with a weekly guarantee of at least $63 a week during the period the employer expects the workers to be available to him.

In states with higher wage levels, he stressed, the adverse wage should be considerably higher. Mayer also urged a 25 percent premium rate for "difficult, arduous, hazardous and unpleasant work."

In California, Peevey said, the present adverse rate of $1.60 an hour should be raised immediately to $2.25 an hour, with a guaranteed 40-hour week and premium pay.

"In no event," he said, "should the hourly adverse effect rate be set below the highest hourly wage rate arrived at through collective bargaining between California growers and the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee," plus comparable fringe benefits.

The State AFL-CIO stressed that despite the recent improvement in farm wages, the average agricultural wage rate in the state is now about half that of industrial workers, while 25 years ago it was two-thirds.

Mayer described foreign farm workers brought into the United States as "semi-captives."

He cited as an example the experience of a group of Jamaican workers brought in to work in a Florida sugar cane field.

They held a spontaneous sit-down strike, Mayer reported, to protest that they were credited with fewer hours than they actually worked. Local police rounded up the strikers and 52 were jailed under $11,500 bail each, then given the "free" choice of staying in jail or being sent home, he said.

Sharp Aid Boost Urged For Vocational Training

have no preparation for urban life."

The report observed that vocational training also is generally inadequate in large city slums where schools suffer from "overcrowding, deficient personnel, inadequate budgets and deteriorated facilities."

For different reasons, more prosperous suburban schools also lag in the vocational field, the council noted. The reason is that "many suburban schools still assume that all students will pursue a four-year college degree."

A "substantial portion" of vocational education funds should be used for "the hard-to-reach and the hard-to-teach," the report said. It said "vocational education puts emphasis on doing, and provides strong motivation to learn those academic skills which are needed for occupational success. Here many students learn for the first time that reading, arithmetic and report writing have utility in the real world."

Otto Pragan, an assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, was one of the 12 members of the advisory council which conducted the year-long study.

The council urged expansion of vocational education enrollment from last year's 7 million students to 11 million. It said that some type of formal occupational preparation should be a part of every educational experience, with free advanced training available both to the student who continues beyond high school and to the adult who seeks to upgrade his skills.

Pragan noted the AFL-CIO's dissent from a council recommendation for a new Cabinet-level Dept. of Education & Manpower Development, which presumably would take over many of the programs now administered by the Labor Dept.

Social Security Hike to Aid 24 Million

Increase Due in March Checks; Other Changes Widen Coverage

Nearly 24 million Americans will have more money to live on when their next social security checks are delivered early in March—although not as much more as Pres. Johnson and the AFL-CIO had sought.

Benefit checks will be at least 13 percent higher than last month, reflecting the increases voted by Congress last year. Most of the individual monthly increases will be in the $10-$20 range. But the annual total will raise buying power about $3.7 billion—for the people who most need it.

Those on the social security benefit rolls include retired workers, widows and surviving children, disabled breadwinners and their dependents. Younger workers will benefit in future years by greatly increased insurance protection during their working careers and a higher retirement income. Higher-paid workers will be paying more in payroll taxes—as will their employers. But the increased wage base will mean bigger pensions, up to 30 percent more than the present maximum.

Neither the amount of the increase nor other provisions of the new social security amendments came up to the levels urged by labor and the Administration. And some of the changes, dealing with public welfare rather than earned social security benefits, were a step backward.

The total benefit increase, nevertheless, is the largest ever enacted under the social security program. The legislation also includes less-publicized changes in disability and medicare programs.

Following are major changes in the social security law:

BENEFITS: The minimum social security benefit was raised from $44 to $55 a month for an individual; from $66 to $82.50 for a couple over 65.

Above the minimum levels, the increase is 13 percent across-the-board.

The special benefit for persons 72 and over who lack the social security coverage to qualify for regular benefits was raised from $35 to $40 (to $60 for a couple.)

ELIGIBILITY: Nearly 500,000 more persons are eligible for social security benefits—but must apply in order to receive them. The breakdown is as follows:

- An estimated 65,000 widows, unable to work because of severe disability, will be able to get monthly benefits as early as age 50. Until now, the earliest a widow with no children in her care could qualify for payments was age 62. However the benefits will be less than the amount payable at age 62, the difference depending on the age at which benefits start.

The early benefit is also available to a disabled widower who had been dependent on his wife's earnings. A disabled woman who was divorced from her husband after at least 20 years of marriage may also be entitled to benefits if she had been receiving support payments from him at the time of his death.

- Another 100,000 younger people—disabled workers and their dependents—will become eligible under liberalized rules.

Under the old law, a worker needed social security credits for at least 5 of the 10 years before becoming disabled. Now a worker who becomes disabled between 24 and 31 needs credits for only half the time between age 21 and the time he becomes unable to work. And disabled workers under 24 need only 1.5 years of work under social security in the three-year period before disability.

- Some 175,000 children will be eligible for benefits based on the earnings of working mothers who died.

Previously, the mother would have had to work under social security for at least half of the three years before her death. Now benefits are payable to the child of a woman worker who has died, retired or become entitled to disability benefits if she had accumulated enough social security credits over her working life to be "fully insured," whether or not the credits were for recent work.

- A new, more restrictive definition of disability provides "that to be found disabled an individual must have an impairment so severe that he is unable to engage in any kind of substantial gainful work."

The Social Security Administration contends that the new definition is consistent with existing regulations. However the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security has urged unions to help workers appeal denials of eligibility benefits "to insure the most liberal administration of the new definition."

FINANCING: The amount of annual wages subject to social security taxes rose this year from $6,600 to $7,800. A worker earning under $6,600 will pay exactly the same amount of social security taxes in 1968 as he paid in 1967. A worker earning $7,800 or more will pay $52.80 a year more—the equivalent of about $1 a week.

The tax rate, including medicare coverage, is scheduled to rise from the present 4.4 percent to 5.9 percent of covered wages by 1987 under the new law. Under the old law, the scheduled increase was to 5.65 percent. The higher the taxable wage, the higher the insurance coverage and retirement benefits. Thus a 50-year-old worker paying taxes on $7,800 a year for the next 15 years would receive $188.80 a month on retirement for himself or $283.20 for himself and his wife—nearly 22 percent more than the benefits he would have received under present law.

RETIREMENT TEST: Persons over 65 will be able to earn more at part-time work without losing social security benefits. Starting this year, a person who makes as much as $1,680 can collect full benefits.

For amounts above that, $1 will be withheld from benefits for each $2 earned up to $2,880 and on a dollar-for-dollar basis above that. However, regardless of annual earnings, a person over 65 can receive the full monthly check for any month in which his earnings are under $140.

As in the old law, there is no restriction on earnings for persons 72 or older. About 760,000 persons will receive an estimated $175 million in additional benefits this year as a result of the change.

MEDICARE: An additional 60 days of hospital insurance is provided as a lifetime reserve, with the patient paying the first $20-a-day of the cost. This lifetime reserve is in addition to the 90 days per spell of illness already provided.

The voluntary medical insurance portion of medicare will now pay the full reasonable charges of radiologists' and pathologists' services for hospital patients. Previously, it paid only 80 percent of the charges, after the $50 deductible requirement had been met. Some X-ray and laboratory services previously not covered will now be paid for.

While the premiums for the medical insurance rise on Apr. 1 from the present $3 to $4 a month, this is not directly related to changes in the law. The rates were moved up because of the sharp rise in the cost of health care. The matching payment by the government is also raised to $4.

PAYMENTS TO DOCTORS: Many doctors have refused to cooperate with the medicare insurance program and have insisted on billing their patients directly.

Previously the patient had to pay the bill out of his own pocket and then send an itemized receipt to the medicare program. Now he is entitled to medicare reimbursement on the basis of the bill and can wait until he is paid before paying the doctor. However, the medicare program will only pay what it considers "reasonable" charges; the patient is stuck for the difference if the doctor bills him for a higher amount.

PUBLIC ASSISTANCE: Some persons on social security benefit rolls are also receiving public assistance payments under state-federal programs for the aged, blind and disabled. In most cases, the higher social security payments will bring a reduction in state welfare payments; in some cases it might raise the income above the eligibility level for public assistance.

The law permits—but does not require—states to waive up to $7.50 of social security payments in determining both eligibility and amount of assistance. The previous waiver permitted, under 1965 law, was $5.

The AFL-CIO has urged its state and local central bodies to take the lead in pressing their states to make it possible for persons on public assistance to retain part of the social security increase voted by Congress.

Major changes in the medicaid and public assistance programs are among the new amendments.

AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman has sent a detailed analysis of all the changes to affiliated unions and central bodies—along with recommendations for state action "to minimize some of the most harsh welfare and medicaid restrictions."

Sickpay Benefits Cover 29 Percent of Time Lost

Total value of time lost by workers through sickness was $12.2 billion in 1966 and about 29 percent of it—$3.6 billion—was replaced by sick-leave and insurance plans, the Health, Education & Welfare Dept. reported.

"This was no improvement over 1965 in terms of the proportion of lost earnings replaced," according to an article in a recent issue of the Social Security Bulletin.

In fact, the article, "Income-Loss Protection Against Illness, 1948-66," said benefits paid out through government and private plans amounted to precisely 29.4 percent of income loss in each year.

Nearly two workers out of every three in private industry had some type of formal protection against loss of income due to illness in the year.

In four states—California, New Jersey, New York and Rhode Island, it noted, some form of protection against lost income due to sickness was required by compulsory temporary-disability laws.

Under voluntary programs in the other 46 states, just over half of the workers—51 percent—had protection against lost income.

The $12.2 billion value of time lost by sickness in 1966, was an increase of $914 million over the total in 1965, the third largest annual increase in 18 years, the article stated. It reflected rising wages and employment and occurred despite a drop of about 1 percent in the average amount of sickness incurred per person.

The article estimated that wage and salary workers in private industry were off the job an average of 7 days because of illness in 1966.

Limited copies of the January Social Security Bulletin are available from the Office of Research & Statistics, Social Security Administration, Room 5628, HEW South Building, Washington, D. C. 20201.

Aged Benefits Go to 2,000 Centenarians

A former slave, a man who earned his first 50 cents minding the horses of Jesse and Frank James, and an ex-sparring partner of John L. Sullivan are among the 23.7 million persons who will receive bigger social security checks.

There are some 2,000 persons over 100 years of age on the benefit rolls, and the Social Security Administration takes a special interest in them. Each year it issues a collection of interviews with "America's Centenarians."

The agency says the oldest social security beneficiary is Charlie Smith of Bartow, Fla., who celebrated his 125th birthday last July.

He was brought to America from Liberia at the age of 12 and sold as a slave in New Orleans. He is receiving monthly benefits based on social security credits he earned beginning at age 113, picking oranges in Florida citrus groves.

Smallest in History:

Foreign Aid Request Keyed to Security

America's foreign aid programs are as important to the nation's security as its military defenses, Pres. Johnson told Congress as he asked approval of a $2.5 billion economic assistance program to carry on a worldwide struggle to overcome disease, hunger, ignorance and hopelessness.

In the developing nations, the President said, continuing help from the United States is "a crucial margin between peaceful change and violent disaster."

Johnson also sought approval of $420 million in military assistance to bolster "Free World collective security," plus an emergency $100 million in arms aid to threatened South Korea.

Overall, the President's foreign aid request was the smallest submitted in the 20-year history of the program. Even adding in companion programs such as Food for Peace and the Peace Corps brings the total request to only one-half of 1 percent of the gross national product. This contrasts with 2 percent the United States put into foreign aid in 1949 and the 1 percent goal set by the United Nations.

Nevertheless, the aid request faces an uphill course in the same budget-cutting Congress that last year slashed the foreign aid spending bill by one-third.

The President anticipated the argument that the dollar outflow of foreign aid spending worsens the balance of payment problem for the United States.

Not so, he told Congress.

He said 92 percent of Agency for Intl. Development funds in the next fiscal year will be spent on purchases of U.S. goods and services. This year, he said, the dollar outflow from AID operations has been reduced to less than $170 million. "Repayments of over $200 million on outstanding aid loans will more than offset this outflow," he noted.

"Ending foreign aid would not, therefore, significantly improve the U.S. balance of payments," the President observed. "But it would adversely affect the U.S. industries, workers and farmers who are manufacturing, producing and exporting aid-financed goods."

Johnson asked $625 million to continue the Alliance for Progress "partnership" in Latin America. More than two-thirds of this amount would go to projects in Brazil, Chile, Colombia and Central America.

He asked $706 million to strengthen the economies of India, Pakistan and Turkey and $179 million for development assistance in Africa, primarily for regional rather than single-country programs.

The AID budget request for economic assistance in Viet Nam is $480 million, with a major effort "to restore and reconstruct the cities and towns attacked in recent days."

An additional $277 million was asked for East Asia, including Laos, Thailand, Korea and Indonesia.

The President concluded his message with an appeal to Congress and the nation not to turn its back on the rest of the world—and on the nation's best traditions.

Foreign aid "may not always be popular, but it is right," he stressed.

"The people we seek to help are committed to change," Johnson noted. "This is an immutable fact of our time. The only questions are whether change will be peaceful or violent, whether it will liberate or enslave, whether it will build a community of free and prosperous nations or sentence the world to endless strife between rich and poor."

AFL-CIO Sets Conference on Social Welfare

Four regional conferences for officers of AFL-CIO state and local central bodies will feature workshops and discussions on five areas of social legislation.

The topics at the two-day sessions include social security, health care, workmen's compensation, unemployment insurance and labor's role in anti-poverty programs.

The first conference, with delegates from 12 Northeast states and the District of Columbia, will be held in New York City on Mar. 1-2.

Twelve states in the South will be represented at Mar. 15-16 conference in Memphis.

The Midwest conference, in Chicago on Apr. 19-20, will be for delegates from 13 states.

Western participants, invited from 13 states, will meet Apr. 29-30 in San Francisco.

AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman is coordinating the conference program, in cooperation with Stanton Smith, the federation's coordinator of state and city central bodies.

PLUMBING MERIT BADGE for AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany was accepted by Federation Vice President Joseph D. Keenan at a Boy Scout week ceremony. Eagle Scout Jack E. Cater of Waldwick, N. J., presented the award. Leo Perlis, director of AFL-CIO Community Service Activities (left) and Alden G. Barber, chief scout executive of the Boy Scouts, took part in the presentation. Keenan and Perlis were also honored with merit badges.

Meany, Randolph On Rights Year Unit

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph have been named to a new Presidential Commission for the Observance of Human Rights Year.

The worldwide observance will mark the 20th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the United Nations.

Pres. Johnson set up the U.S. commission to arrange the American observance of the anniversary. U.S. Ambassador at Large W. Averell Harriman was named chairman of the commission. The vice chairman is Anna Roosevelt Halsted, daughter of Pres. Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Post Office, Seven Unions Reach Pact

A new two-year contract has been signed by seven postal unions covering 625,000 employes of the Post Office Dept. It is the nation's largest single collective bargaining agreement.

A three-month deadlock in the negotiations was broken when Postmaster Gen. Lawrence F. O'Brien agreed to accept the recommendations of a mediator and drop a management proposal which the unions had strongly opposed.

The Department had sought authority to suspend employes on disciplinary charges for up to 10 days before, rather than after, they have exercised their appeal rights.

O'Brien said he disagrees with the mediator's opinion but would go along with it because he favors the principle of mediation and arbitration of disputes in federal employe-management relations. Agreement was reached that the disputed issue could be reopened on 60 days notice.

The national agreement, which includes improvements sought by the unions, will be followed by negotiation of local-level agreements with individual post offices.

Unions signing the national agreement were the Letter Carriers, Postal Clerks, Maintenance Employes, Mail Handlers, Special Delivery Messengers and Motor Vehicle Employes, all AFL-CIO affiliates, and the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers.

Boy Scouts Cite Labor For Aid, Leadership

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany received a merit badge in plumbing and a report of appreciation from the Boy Scouts of America in ceremonies marking the annual observance of Boy Scout week.

A group of 13 Eagle Scouts from across the nation made the presentation in Washington.

AFL-CIO Vice President Joseph D. Keenan was presented with a merit badge in electricity. He is secretary of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. A merit badge in citizenship was awarded to Leo Perlis, director of AFL-CIO Community Service Activities.

Merit badges are earned by Scouts for achievement in specific skills or services. The symbolic merit badge plaques presented to Meany and Keenan recognized their craft backgrounds, while the award to Perlis related to his current CSA post.

The appreciation report cited the AFL-CIO for its friendship and cooperation.

"This partnership has helped make scouting possible for 44 million boys and adults," the report said.

The number of Cub Scout packs, Boy Scout troops and Explorer posts sponsored by unions increased during 1967, it noted. Union members serving scouting in leadership capacities also increased.

AFL-CIO central labor bodies supported a program that enabled 26,000 boys—scouts and non-scouts—to attend Boy Scout camps during 1967, the report added.

Union members were lauded for their contributions to scouting—both in money through United Fund contributions, and in manpower. Many craftsmen "generously assisted in development and maintenance of camps," the report noted.

Keenan, a board member of the National Capital Area Council of the Boy Scouts, asked the Eagle Scouts to "go into the slums in your home towns and visit. See how some people live here in the United States."

He added that the AFL-CIO is dedicated to the support of youth "so every kid can exploit himself to the limit."

New York State Raises Pay Floor

Albany, N.Y.—The state minimum wage rose from $1.50 to $1.60 an hour Feb. 1 for practically every worker, including those subject to the federal Fair Labor Standards Act and eight groups not protected by federal law.

The increase also will raise the state's overtime hourly rate for covered workers from $2.25 to $2.40, the part-time rate from $1.55 to $1.65 and the weekly guarantee from $52.50 to $56.

formance" expect to do still better.

The article declared that "many industries expect their profits to rise even faster than sales" because of fuller use of capacity which spreads fixed costs over a greater output.

In many industries, the Journal added, a combination of higher prices and fuller capacity utilization "promise to outweigh the added costs" of union contracts.

The paper singled out the auto industry as having "just about everything going for it this quarter" with a huge increase in profits anticipated. This is expected to give a boost to sales and profits in many industries, especially steel and aluminum, the paper declared.

Terror Attacks on Cities Denounced by Viet Labor

Saigon—The Vietnamese Confederation of Labor (CVT) has condemned Viet Cong terrorist attacks in Saigon and other cities as "criminal actions" against the Vietnamese people.

A statement adopted by CVT's bureau at a meeting here denounced the Communists for breaking the Tet (New Year's) truce and called upon CVT members "to tighten their ranks in these troubled and perilous days."

CVT Pres. Tran Quoc Buu pointed out that the Viet Cong not only broke the truce but seized workers' homes and "treacherously" used them "for concealment and as a battle ground" to wage its war.

These tactics, he added, were used to make "the workers and their families . . . the miserable victims of street fighting inside the cities."

The CVT appealed to the South Vietnamese government "to apply suitable measures to protect the lives and property of the people" against the terrorist attacks and restore the general security and public order.

'Strengthen His Hand':

Public Urged to Speak Out For LBJ's Viet Nam Policies

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council unanimously and strongly reaffirmed its all-out support for Pres. Johnson's policies on Viet Nam and "his persistent efforts to end the war through negotiations."

The council appealed to the "millions in our ranks, to workers everywhere, to the entire American people to strengthen the President's hand." (Excerpts, Page 6.)

The statement reviewed the recent Communist offensive against the cities of South Viet Nam, pointed up the terroristic tactics employed, pointed out that it had resulted in no "decisive military value to Hanoi" and had failed in its major purpose of undermining U.S. support for the democratic forces in the country.

The attacks on the cities, the council said, resulted in the slaughtering of thousands of innocent civilians and turned the streets into bloody battlefields.

The statement recited the clearly stated goal of the Communists that the struggle in Viet Nam "forms the spearhead of the world revolutionary tide," making clear, the council said, "the austere and painful reality of Viet Nam."

The Communists failed dismally in appealing for a popular uprising by the people in the cities, the council stated, but it is too early to estimate the extent of damage on the pacification and redevelopment programs.

In face of the Tet offensive, the council warned "there is a paramount urgency" to avoid overconfidence and to expand social, economic, political and military moves to deter and defeat aggression while "persisting in efforts to negotiate peace."

Noting reactions by critics of the war that the new Communist offensive is grounds for getting out of Viet Nam and all of Southeast Asia and that U.S. policy has been defeated, the council asserted that "this hasty conclusion is without foundation in fact." Viet Nam is only the latest place where Communists have resorted to so-called wars of liberation, the statement observed, noting that since World War II they have tried and failed in many countries and they have not gotten very far in Viet Nam.

The council welcomed the "assurance of our CVT (Vietnamese Confederation of Labor) colleagues that the 'terrorist cam-

'Adopt-a-Striker' Drive Backs Copper Workers

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Organized labor will not allow the courageous copper strikers to be starved into submission by the "barons of the copper industry," the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared as it launched a nationwide local union "adopt-a-striker" program.

The determination of the companies to "relentlessly prolong" the eight-month-old strike, the council said, calls for an expanded pledge by the AFL-CIO to assure the workers of "adequate sustenance" for "the duration of this battle."

The council called on all branches of the labor movement and especially local unions to adopt one or more striking families on a "personal, name-to-name basis" for the duration.

The council also strongly supported the decision of the strike coordinating committee to reject a government panel's recommendations because they did not "develop a workable and acceptable collective bargaining formula."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told reporters that letters are going to 60,000 local unions of federation affiliates as well as to all state and local central bodies on the adopt-a-striker plan, with follow-up meetings scheduled to get all possible local resources into the struggle.

"If we have to fight we are prepared for a long fight," he asserted, charging the copper companies with losing all sense of responsibility to their workers and the country.

The federation has raised over $850,000 for the workers starting with the recent convention and more funds are coming in, Meany

Focuses on Issues, Voter Registration

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO geared up for the crucial 1968 elections with an information and register-and-vote drive designed to bring the basic issues to all union members and the public at large.

The federation's Executive Council at its mid-winter meeting here at the Americana Hotel voted a five-cent per member voluntary assessment to finance the register-and-vote drive, a step recommended to it by the COPE Administrative Committee.

It reviewed and voted to make as widely available as possible a film of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Pres. Johnson discussing the basic issues confronting the nation, titled "Conversation at the White House."

And as it did at the recent AFL-CIO convention, labor strongly reaffirmed its all-out support for Pres. Johnson's policies on Viet Nam and "his persistent efforts to end the war through negotiations."

The council made clear, however, that in some areas such as education it felt that the President's message to Congress was only a beginning and that the AFL-CIO would go further to meet the urgent needs in this area.

The council voiced its determination to help the striking copper workers in their eight-month struggle and launched a nationwide "adopt-a-striker" program involving the 60,000 local unions of federation affiliates. It supported the striking unions also in their rejection of a government panel's recommendations on dividing bargaining into three parts. (Story, this page.)

It gave its full support also to the nine unions fighting the strike-breaking and union-busting of the Hearst Corporation at its papers in Los Angeles and San Francisco. (Story, Page 3.)

The council was scheduled to act on a number of other statements involving the economy, health and welfare, occupational health and safety, and congressional budget slashing before the conclusion of the sessions here.

The five-cent assessment for the register-and-vote campaign has successfully raised funds in previous election years to assist union members, their families and friends to become registered voters and get to the polls on election day.

Meany told the COPE Administrative Committee meeting that there has been a steady improvement and effectiveness in COPE operations and that it is in good shape for 1968 when the choice before the country will be between "liberalism and conservatism." He cited the four-year record of the Johnson Administration as equal to or better than the first four years of the Roosevelt Administration and stressed the need to maintain progress at home and abroad.

Earlier, the council had heard a report from Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey on the general programs and policies of the Administration and the general direction the country will take in the next four years.

The Vice President later told a press conference that the issue in 1968 is whether to continue the enlightened policies of Pres. Johnson or run the risk of the election of a "predictable reactionary." A defeat for the Administration in 1968, Humphrey warned, could

Senate Majority Insists On Strong Rights Bill

A solid majority of the Senate demonstrated support for a strong civil rights bill—including an open housing provision—in two key votes.

First the Senate voted 55-37 to halt a filibuster against the legislation.

That was seven votes shy of the two-thirds needed under the Senate's cloture rules. But it was the biggest vote for cloture since the breakthrough Civil Rights Act of 1964. Counting the four senators paired for cloture and the two paired against, the Senate divided 59-39 on the issue.

A day later, by an even stronger 58-34 vote, the Senate refused to table—and thus kill—an open housing proposal strongly supported by labor and civil rights groups. (Rollcalls, Page 10.)

On this key ballot, 39 of the 57 Democrats present for the vote rejected the advice of Majority Leader Mike Mansfield, and 19 of 35 Republicans present refused to follow the lead of GOP Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen.

Dirksen opposed both cloture and the open housing provision. He indicated that he would support only a watered down version of a bill that would make it a federal crime to interfere violently with Negroes and civil rights workers exercising legal rights, such as voting or using public accommodations.

Mansfield supported the cloture motion and said he personally favors the open housing provision.

U.S. Shipping Revival Sought By Sea Unions

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Strong support for legislation aimed at reviving American-flag shipping and shipbuilding has been voted here by the executive board of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.

In two separate resolutions—one dealing with Navy vessels and the other with merchant ships — the MTD recorded its continuing opposition to foreign building, noting that the use of shipyards overseas "has the effect of siphoning off the growth potential" of U.S. shipbuilding.

Since 1946, the department went on, nearly 1,200 vessels have been built in foreign yards for U.S. shipping interests. This has cost the nation $6 billion which has been drawn out of the domestic economy, and has resulted in the loss of 1 billion man hours of direct shipyard labor and another 1 billion man hours of work in supporting trades and industries, the MTD asserted.

The MTD board also urged passage of legislation that would bar the use of foreign-built offshore drilling rigs, warning that the purchase of such equipment abroad adversely affects the balance of payments and cuts U.S. employment.

'Right-to-Work' Petitions Invalidated in Oklahoma

Oklahoma City—Oklahoma's secretary of state—for the second time in less than three months—ruled that sponsors of a "right-to-work" petition hadn't collected enough signatures to get their proposition on the ballot.

This time it appeared that the turndown would stick.

The first turndown came when Sec. of State John Rogers said he had counted 102,996 signatures on the petitions to outlaw the union shop. This, he said, was nearly 2,000 short of the number required—even if all were valid.

Later the state attorney general ruled that only 101,589 valid signatures were needed to get on the ballot. However, a partial check by the Oklahoma State AFL-CIO uncovered 16,548 signatures of persons who were not registered voters, as well as numerous cases of duplicate signatures. The state federation presented its evidence at hearings.

On Feb. 21, the secretary of state handed down his ruling. The petitions were invalidated on two grounds: the form was improper and, after hearing all the evidence, the secretary of state was convinced there weren't enough valid signatures.

Humphrey Cites Choice Of Progress, Reaction

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey told a press conference here that the issue in 1968 is whether to continue the enlightened policies of Pres. Johnson or run the risk of the election of "a predictable reactionary."

Humphrey met reporters after addressing the AFL-CIO Executive Council and the COPE operating committee on the programs and policies of the Administration and the general direction the country will take in the next four years.

The Vice President warned that cessation of hostilities in Southeast Asia does not necessarily insure a new era of social progress. He pointed to the reactionary record of the 80th Congress after World War II and the general neglect of progress following the war in Korea.

A defeat for the President in 1968, Humphrey warned, could result in another reactionary Congress similar to the 80th and a sharp setback for the social progress made under Democratic administrations since 1960.

He listed as some of the achievements that will play a role in the 1968 elections civil rights, federal aid to education, medicare and air and water pollution measures.

The Vice President voiced confidence that the war in Viet Nam will result in eventual victory for the democratic forces and that the Communist Tet offensive had failed in achieving either its military or political objectives.

The offensive, he said, demonstrated to the people of South Viet Nam the terroristic nature of the Viet Cong and reinforced the strength of the democratically elected government with formerly dissident elements now strongly supporting the elected regime.

Humphrey stressed that South Vietnamese army troops did most of the fighting in the last few weeks and proved to be an effective military force. He pointed out that not a single South Vietnamese unit or senior officer had defected to the Viet Cong during the offensive.

Disaster Aid Urged Regardless of Cause

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Community agencies can be more effective if they provide assistance in all disasters, man-made or natural, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

The council adopted a statement urging public and private agencies to adopt policies to meet need regardless of the cause and and to plan programs that can be put into action during an emergency.

"Victims of man-made disasters, such as riots, are no less human than the victims of natural disasters, such as floods and earthquakes," the council said. These victims are in need of the basic necessities as well as "human concern and care," the statement added, citing the "irrational human behavior" that causes man-made disasters.

The AFL-CIO believes all agencies should provide assistance to victims of disasters and it is pleased that many agencies gave speedy and effective service to the victims of recent riots.

Formalization of this policy is now needed, the council said, offering its cooperation to achieve this objective.

The council adopted also a statement calling for expansion of food stamp and donated food programs to all needy persons and declaring that these programs should not be considered a substitute for adequate public welfare.

Food stamps should not supplant the donated food program but should be used to supplement it, the council said, urging also that the stamps be donated to the needy who cannot afford to buy them.

The council also approved creation of a special awards program for AFL-CIO affiliates and state and local bodies to recognize community service contributions and to encourage other units to follow suit. The program would involve certificates for affiliates selected for outstanding contributions in the field.

NLRB Affirms Single Store Unit Decision

The National Labor Relations Board has ruled unanimously that a single store or restaurant in a retail chain operation is an appropriate bargaining unit.

The Board, in a 4-0 decision, reaffirmed its policy in reviewing an appeal by the Haag Drug Co., which runs a chain of 35 full line and six discount drug stores in Indiana and Ohio.

The Board then ordered its regional director to proceed with the representation election sought by Hotel & Restaurant Employes Local 58 at the Indianapolis restaurant involved.

The Board recalled that its policy for many years was to find that an appropriate unit in retail chains was one which embraced all the employes in an employer's administrative or geographic area. This policy was revised, the Board observed, because it was judged to impede the workers' rights to self-organization and it overemphasized the employer's administrative role.

The present policy regards a single store in a retail chain as similar to a single plant in a multi-plant company in other industries, the Board said, adding it sees no reason to make an exception in the Haag case.

paign has only hardened the resolve of Vietnamese labor to resist terror and oppression.'"

The council pointed out that the "free people of Europe should have no difficulty in understanding our country's current Viet Nam policies and the urgency of their supporting the struggle against Communist aggression in Viet Nam" in light of the bitter struggle against Nazi aggression and the U. S. involvement.

The council reaffirmed its "full support to the President in his determination to achieve our country's sole aim in the Viet Nam conflict—to halt Communist aggression against the people of South Viet Nam."

It pledged its support also to help the CVT "enhance its effectiveness and enable it to play an increasing role in defeating Communist subversion and promoting social justice, the development of democratic institutions and a viable economy."

Congress Asked to Act:

Drug Firms Charged With Gouging Public

Bal Harbour, Fla.—American labor charged the nation's big drug companies with "betraying the public interest" and called on Congress to pass strong legislation to force down the price of prescriptions.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council handed down a five-point indictment accusing the major pharmaceutical companies of:

- "Promoting the sale of 'new' patented drugs which are less effective than established drugs not so protected.
- "Promoting the widespread sale of drugs of unproven clinical value thereby endangering the lives of persons afflicted with conditions for which there would be an effective cure if they were treated with available effective drugs.
- "Promoting over-use of drugs, particularly antibiotics, in spite of the accompanying danger of the development of resistant strains of disease organisms.
- "Promoting the sale of drugs having serious side effects when there are equally effective, less toxic drugs available.
- Promoting the sale of drugs which have dangerous side effects for minor conditions that do not require drug therapy.
- "Confusing the practicing physician with a multiplicity of over 18,000 trade names."

The Executive Council statement charged that no major industry has been more "socially irresponsible" than the large pharmaceutical manufacturers.

Evidence Cited

It cited evidence uncovered at congressional hearings, first by the late Sen. Estes Kefauver (D-Tenn.) and more recently by Senators Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.) and Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.).

"The hardest-hit victims of the price gouging," the council said, "are the chronically ill aged" who find the cost "a crushing burden"—especially since prescription drugs are excluded from medicare.

The council praised Food & Drug Commissioner James Goddard for his efforts to administer existing legislation in the public interest but stressed that his legal authority is limited because "the law is not as strong as it should be."

Declaring that "the American people will never accept their health as a legitimate area for commercial exploitation," the Executive Council called for legislation to:

- Include prescription drugs under medicare, provide a national drug formulary, limit reimbursement for drugs under any federal program to the price for the generic—rather than brand name—product. Physicians should be required to prescribe by generic name when there is no question of quality differences, the council said.
- Give the Food & Drug Administration authority to compare the relative effectiveness of similar drugs and disclose the information.
- Reduce the price of drugs now kept artificially high by exclusive patents, and amend the patent laws to reduce the number of years a drug may be granted a monopoly.

The council statement noted that the major brand drug companies spend some $600 million a year—or $3,000 for each doctor—trying to influence physicians to prescribe by brand name.

"The advertising pays off," the statement noted. "A great majority of physicians prescribe by brand name and the patient has to buy the expensive brand name drug. Organized medicine itself takes no responsibility for evaluating the relative effectiveness of drugs. Drug advertising revenues are an important part of the total budget of the American Medical Association."

The result of all this, the Executive Council charged, "is gouging of the customer."

Victory Rate Holds In NLRB Elections

AFL-CIO unions won 54.5 percent of all the National Labor Relations Board elections they entered in the six months ending Dec. 31, the board said in a report of secret-ballot voting for the last half of 1967.

During the same period affiliated unions won 54.9 percent of elections involving newly organized workers, where 198,000 workers were eligible to vote.

Comparable figures for the last half of 1966 gave AFL-CIO unions a winning margin of 54.6 percent for elections in which an incumbent union was on the ballot, 54.4 percent among newly organized units.

AFL-CIO unions won 1,431 of the 2,618 elections they took part in for the last half of 1966. For the same period a year later, the figures were 1,291 victories out of 2,351 elections.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Budget Dir. Charles Zwick met with the council on the legislative program of the Administration with Zwick spelling out the details of the President's budget and the basis for the Administration's income tax surcharge proposals.

In its opening sessions the council adopted statements that:

- Appealed to the "millions in our ranks, to workers everywhere, to the entire American people (to) strengthen the President's hand" in Viet Nam. (Story, Page 1.)
- Called on Congress to go further than the proposals contained in Pres. Johnson's message on education, declaring that the message should be the "starting point for a legislative program rather than the outer limits of one." (Story, this page.)
- Urged the Senate to defeat the filibuster against the civil rights legislation before it, and allow a vote on a measure that contains "irreducible rights" that Congress should guarantee. The bill calls for full federal protection for civil rights workers and a fair housing law. (Story, Page 1.)
- Asked for strong legislation to force down the cost of prescription drugs, charging the nation's big drug companies with "betraying the public interest." (Story, Page 2.)
- Proposed a formal policy by community agencies of providing assistance on the basis of need regardless of the cause of the need, including man-made disasters resulting from "irrational human behavior" such as last summer's riots. (Story, Page 2.)
- Selected former Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) as the recipient of the 1969 Murray-Green Award for his outstanding services to the nation and humanity.

On internal federation affairs the council:

- Approved the merger of the Journeymen Stone Cutters and the Laborers Intl. Union. The Stone Cutters, with about 3,000 members, will become part of the 500,000-member Laborers ending a 115-year history as a separate organization. (Story, Page 12.)
- Voted to approve a change in name for the Building Service Employes Intl. Union to Service Employes Intl. Union with no change in jurisdiction, and gave tentative approval to the Commercial Telegraphers Union to change its name to United Telegraph Workers.
- Set up a subcommittee to report back during the meeting on the question of exonerating unions from payment of dues to the federation with directions to explore the need for more specific guidelines.
- Received a financial report from Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler showing the federation to be in good financial shape despite exoneration of dues to the Rubber Workers and Auto Workers during their strikes of about $426,000.

At press conferences held at the sessions, Meany, in reply to reporters' queries, said:

- The AFL-CIO encourages voluntary mergers of its affiliates and talks are currently under way between unions in the meat, shoe, paper, stone and glass, railroad and printing industries. He noted that unions in different fields can also merge under the provision of the federation's constitution.
- Strikes of public workers pose very difficult questions, but in a democratic system the individual worker has the right to quit his job, whether by striking or resigning, and passing punitive legislation is not the answer.

He suggested that some study might be given to a system of voluntary arbitration that would allow impartial and knowledgeable persons to enter the disputes and come up with terms for settlement. But he stressed that such arbitration must be of a voluntary nature.

- Anyone who disagrees with the policies of the AFL-CIO or the conduct of its officers should use the established machinery of the federation to air charges or grievances. He restated a policy statement adopted by the council in February 1967 in answering a query about a charge levelled by Auto Workers Sec.-Treas. Emil Mazey on a comment about Viet Nam made by Meany at the recent convention. The council presently has no complaint or charge before it, Meany pointed out.

REPORTERS REPRESENTING the press, radio and television media gathered daily for news conferences at which AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany reported on actions taken by the Executive Council at its meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla.

Full Support Pledged to Unions Battling Hearst Strikebreaking Bid

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO threw its full support behind nine unions battling the Hearst Corporation's assault on trade unionism in Los Angeles and San Francisco, singling out the company's union-breaking tactics and its use of professional strikebreakers.

The federation's Executive Council voiced its support in a statement after receiving a report on the West Coast strikes from the unions involved declaring that they are preparing a "program of maximum effort" to defeat the Hearst attack.

The council, citing the legitimate trade union objectives of the unions and the use by the company of imported strikebreakers, reiterated its "determination to achieve legislation, already on the statute books in 14 states and 95 cities, forbidding the recruitment and importation of strikebreakers."

The nine unions met here earlier in the week to plan implementation of a program to counter the Hearst attack. The strikes, the report said, involve 4,500 union members in the two cities and "have in them the seeds of a coast-to-coast confrontation with Hearst."

At stake, the unions declared, "is the survival of viable trade unionism in an enterprise Forbes magazine has said has as its major problem 'an embarrassment of riches.' "

The strike against the Los Angeles Herald-Examiner started on Dec. 15, 1967, when members of the Newspaper Guild and the Machinists struck for a new contract. Hearst, the unions said had "programmed his response" with plans for strikebreakers, guards, food, etc., and immediately put the plan into operation with limited editions of the paper produced ever since.

On Jan. 5, 1968, the Mailers struck the jointly owned production company which prints the San Francisco Chronicle and Hearst's Examiner. Neither paper has since published.

The unions reported that no industrial dispute in recent memory "has attracted the concern and provoked the response of the California labor movement" to the extent of the Hearst strike. Labor in the state has given the strikers wide support and assistance, the statement noted.

Present at the conference were representatives of the Pressmen, IBEW, ITU, Building Service, Newspaper Guild, Lithographers and Photoengravers, Stereotypers, IAM and Teamsters. AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Anthony J. DeAndrade, president of the Pressmen, presented the unions' report to the executive council.

The unions said they were "not unmindful" that in San Francisco "meaningful collective bargaining has been underway for about 10 days" with the aid of mediator Sam Kagel.

"We are following these developments with close interest," the union statement said. "We trust and hope the Hearst Corporation is as well. Surely the format of bargaining now appearing, and producing progress, in San Francisco, is its own recommendation as an instrument worth examining for application in Los Angeles.

This possible path to industrial peace must be preferable to the industrial warfare events to date surely will otherwise produce."

Sharp Expansion of Federal Aid Urged at All Levels of Education

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A sharply stepped-up program of federal aid to education at all levels was called for by the AFL-CIO to carry forward the outstanding achievements of the past few years.

Pres. Johnson's education message to Congress should be considered "as the starting point for a legislative program rather than the outer limits of one," the Executive Council declared. In many regards, the AFL-CIO "would go further than the President's proposals," the council said. (Excerpts, Page 6.)

The council singled out higher education as one of the areas for going beyond the Administration's recommendations, calling for restoration of a proposed $500 million cut in construction funds in addition to an increased student aid program.

The funds cut means that "thousands of young people who stand ready for higher education will be denied it by simple lack of space," and that student aid programs will be of little help if there is no room at the colleges and universities.

The council urged a return to the principle of government students loans rather than increasing the government subsidized and guaranteed private loans. The results of the latter program "have not been promising" and the latest proposals would only make the loans more profitable to the banks. Government loans are surer to get to the student who needs them and are less expensive in the long run, the council said.

The successful Head Start program, the council noted, needs to be expanded and placed on a year-round basis "and far more federal support" is required.

The council welcomed the changes recommended by the President in vocational education, noting that more than one-half of high school graduates do not go to college and that three out of every 10 students fail to complete high school.

"Vocational education must prepare every boy and girl who does not go to college with the necessary skills to obtain and hold a job," the council declared.

It supported the finding of the National Advisory Council on Vocational Education that the promise of the 1963 vocational education act "has not been realized," and called for greater flexibility in federal matching grants "and a much higher appropriation of funds than is presently authorized."

The council called also for expanded programs of adult education adequately funded and administered to reach the 23 million adults who have not completed the eighth grade. These programs reached only 330,000 last year, the council noted, commenting that this "is hardly a cause for rejoicing."

The council renewed its call also for federal support for university labor extension programs with funds to help in the "training and education of union members, stewards and officers in the same way as federal grants are made available to farmers and business."

In terms of national priorities, the council concluded, the urban crisis presents the greatest challenge, and quality education at every level for all Americans is the most essential tool in meeting this challenge.

"In our view," the council asserted, "the rate of improvement is still too slow and fails to meet the urgency of our times." It called for high priority to the "expansion of programs which compensate for the years of decay, discrimination and apathy experienced by those who dwell in the ghettos of our cities."

Pilots at United Boost Strike Fund

United Air Lines pilots, still working under a contract that expired nearly 14 months ago, took steps to see that their members don't run out of cash in the event of a strike.

The Pilots executive committee for United Air Lines authorized its finance committee to negotiate up to $30 million in bank credit to supplement the union's regular strike benefits "in the event of a work stoppage." The ALPA regular benefits of $300 to $450 a month go into effect after 30 days of a strike.

The union will be legally free to strike on Feb. 29 and issues still in dispute include the crew size on new short-range jets, salaries and job bidding and scheduling rules.

George Brayfield Dies, Stage Union Trustee

Denver—George W. Brayfield, a trustee of the Theatrical Stage Employes and secretary-treasurer of its District 5 (Wyoming, Colorado, Utah and New Mexico) died here following a long illness.

A one-time cowboy hero in early Western films, Brayfield joined IATSE's Local 7 here in 1916 and served for many years as its secretary and business agent. He also was a former president of both the Denver Trades & Labor Assembly and the Colorado AFL.

COPPER SUPPORT RALLY called by Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers' Local 3 in New York at Manhattan Center drew a turnout of 1,500 people. The main meeting was later divided into smaller sessions like this one at the Commodore Hotel, to discuss ways of mobilizing aid for the strikers. Local 3 Assistant Business Mgr. Farm Bloc Finds Labor Panel Speaks Softly, Carries Key Votes

Not a voice was raised in anger and disagreements were gilded with the most courteous of congressional language. But liberal Democrats on the House Labor Committee served clear notice to farm bloc congressmen that legislative cooperation is a two-way street.

They didn't actually tell Chairman W. R. Poage of the House Agriculture Committee that he would find it harder to pass future farm bills if his committee tried to kill legislation giving collective bargaining rights to farm workers.

But the meaning was clear.

Poage's Agriculture Committee had voted 22-2 for a resolution asking the Labor Committee to scrap the bargaining rights legislation because farmers had enough problems without worrying about unions.

This set up a few sparks. To begin with, no congressional committee in anyone's memory had ever passed a resolution telling another committee what it should do about a pending bill.

The legislation at issue, sponsored by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.), had been approved by a subcommittee headed by Rep. Frank Thompson (D-N. J.) after thorough hearings.

Thompson, a strong supporter of the labor-backed bill, couldn't have been sweeter in his letter of reply to Poage.

Cordial Invitation

"In view of the great interest of the distinguished Committee on Agriculture . . .," it began. It continued with an invitation to Poage to appear before the subcommittee at a special meeting to discuss the "unique" resolution from the Agriculture Committee. "We look forward, Mr. Chairman, to the honor of a visit from you."

A big turnout of subcommittee members was on hand for the confrontation. Poage allowed that he had been warned "that your members were but seeking the opportunity to get a helpless country boy before them to hold me up to ridicule," but he was sure that wasn't the case.

Nonsense, the subcommittee members assured him. Besides quite a few of them were just old country boys themselves, even if they did represent mostly urban districts now. Why, Rep. James H. Scheuer of the Bronx suggested, he would still match his cow milking skills against any member of the Agriculture Committee.

The warmth of his welcome assured, Poage went on to say that farmers "like to pay as high wages as they can" and the only reason "farm wages are low is because farm income is low."

A "third party" such as the National Labor Relations Board, "with no agricultural experience or orientation" just wouldn't understand such things. Besides, even if small farmers were exempt from the bill, it would be a "foot in the door" and there was no guarantee they would not be included in the future.

"My friends, I am imposing too long on your gracious hospitality," Poage concluded.

Not so, replied Thompson. What a welcome opportunity "to emphasize again the interdependent nature of our economy, how all of us rise and fall together."

Sheer Coincidence

And speaking of interdependency, he just happened to be checking the record and noted how consistently Democratic members of the labor committee—and northern Democrats from non-farm areas as a group—had voted for farm price supports and other key bills brought out by the Agriculture Committee.

It seemed that most of the other Democrats on the subcommittee had been doing similar record checking. Some of them confessed they had begun to wonder if they were right in supporting the farm bills when so many of the Agriculture Committee members seemed to vote against legislation to help the urban areas.

"Why there wouldn't be any farm bills if it weren't for the city votes," Rep. John Brademas (D-Ind.) observed. In tones more of sorrow than anger, he said there seemed to be "little awareness on the part of the Agriculture Committee as to where the votes come from."

It turned out that the Agriculture Committee's resolution was the idea of Rep. Thomas G. Abernethy (D-Miss.), whose record on farm legislation was somewhat poorer than that of most of the Labor Committee members.

And Poage, himself, wasn't too upset about the present bill. He was more concerned about what might happen in the future. After all, he said sadly, there are fewer congressmen from farm districts than when he came to Congress in 1936 and he can see the day coming when there wouldn't be many members of Congress who even knew how to milk a cow.

But since his good friends on the Labor Committee seemed so sensitive on the matter, he would suggest that in the future any Agriculture Committee members who want to express their views on labor legislation do so as individuals and not in the form of a committee resolution.

Anna Ornburn Dies, Union Wife, Mother

New Haven, Conn.—Mrs. Anna L. Ornburn, union wife and mother, died here at 75 after a brief illness and was buried in Cedar Hill Cemetery, Washington, D.C.

Mrs. Ornburn was the widow of the late Ira M. Ornburn, former secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. and past president of the Cigarmakers. She is survived by a son, Paul R. Ornburn of the Union Label Dept., and three grandchildren.

For many years Mrs. Ornburn was a member of Cigarmakers Local 39 here.

Copper Workers Backed:

60,000 Locals Urged To 'Adopt a Striker'

said. The new plan is designed to supplement this program.

The copper strike, he told reporters, "represents a challenge to the progress of the entire labor movement. . . . We have to bring the copper barons into the 20th Century."

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz at a news conference here had said earlier that he supported the panel's recommendations but that the strike is not presently "a Taft-Hartley situation" and that the national health and safety, the basis for a T-H injunction is not endangered "as of today."

The council declared that the panel recommendations would "have only perpetuated splintered bargaining."

The strike coordinating committee said earlier that the panel's proposal to divide bargaining with each of the Big Four copper firms into three parts "would not resolve any of the basic problems which caused the strike." The committee represents the 26 unions and 60,000 copper workers.

Joseph P. Molony of the Steelworkers, speaking for the committee, said the panel's recommendations came as something "of a shock."

Missed Issues

The statement voiced the unions' regret that the panel had failed to come to grips with the "basic issues in the copper strike," which the panel said were common expiration dates, a companywide economic package and settlement at all operations of a company.

"Members of the unions involved voted overwhelmingly to go on strike to eliminate the hundreds of existing inequities and injustices which prevail in this industry and in each of the companies," the statement declared. "They have suffered the strke for 221 days to obtain a measure of justice . . . a collective bargaining format which will insure equality of treatment."

The report, the unions continued, now suggests that the basic issues be shelved. The three-part suggestions "would perpetuate the outdated and one-sided method of collective bargaining long practiced by the copper companies. They would only formalize the fragmentation of collective bargaining into three categories with the pious hope that there could be 'discussion' of uniform expiration dates and equality of treatment within these groupings."

The concept that employe wage and work standards should be equal only within selected categories of production within a company "is not acceptable to us," the statement asserted.

"We cannot accept proposals leading to a hodge-podge of dissimilar agreements with attendant discrimination in wage and working conditions among employes doing similar work within the same company.

"We cannot tolerate any arrangment which would freeze indefinitely the inequities and injustices which employes in this industry have long suffered."

'Unworkable'

The report is unacceptable, the statement concluded "because it is unworkable and would not resolve any of the basic problems which caused the strike."

The unions called upon the companies to resume bargaining immediately.

Molony declared that the government in "good conscience" could not seek a Taft-Hartley injunction that would send the strikers back to work for 80 days because there is no danger of a shortage of copper or other metals in terms of the nation's defense needs. He said 30 percent of the total copper refining capacity was in production turning out 600,000 tons of copper a year.

The three-member fact-finding panel was appointed in January by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Commerce Sec. Alexander B. Trowbridge at the request of the Johnson Administration.

It included Prof. George Taylor of the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School as chairman; George Reedy, former White House press secretary, and Msgr. George Higgins of Washington, a veteran mediator.

After hearing witnesses from both sides, the panel issued a report proposing that bargaining be conducted for three broad groups of workers. One would cover those in mining, smelting and refining; the second, workers in other nonferrous metals, such as lead and zinc, and the third, fabrication of copper wire, cable and brass.

The strike began July 15, two weeks after the primary contracts expired at the four major copper companies. Contract settlements have been reached with several smaller producers, all calling for more than double any economic package that has been proposed by the Big Four of the industry—Kennecott, Anaconda, American Smelting & Refining and Phelps-Dodge.

CSA Staffer Named To Rehabilitation Unit

The National Institutes on Rehabilitation & Health Services of Washington, D.C. has announced the appointment of Edward J. Carlin, AFL-CIO Community Services field operations coordinator, to its board of trustees.

NIRHS is a non-profit organization, sponsored jointly by Group Health Association of America and the National Rehabilitation Association, to improve rehabilitation and health services for the chronically ill and disabled.

'Can't See The Blood':

Poor State Safety Programs Blamed for Deaths, Injuries

By David L. Perlman

The statistics are overwhelming. From every source—the federal government, the states, the National Safety Council, reports from AFL-CIO central bodies—they lead to an inescapable conclusion:

With rare exceptions, the states are not doing an adequate job of protecting workers against avoidable on-the-job deaths and injuries or job-related illness.

For the most part, they don't have the laws or regulations. Almost invariably, they don't have the money or trained manpower to enforce the laws which do exist.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, leading the fight for federal safety standards legislation, was able in testimony before a Senate Labor subcommittee to bring the statistics to life.

Perhaps "life" is the wrong word.

He brought with him pictures of death—and of partial death.

Wirtz showed the subcommittee "what a hand looks like lying alone by a power saw . . . what half a man looks like when a falling girder has cut him in two."

He half apologized for displaying pictures "which it takes a strong person to look at and not turn away from quickly."

But, Wirtz insisted, this is what the Administration's legislative proposal is all about.

'Clear Issue'

"The clear, central issue," he stressed, "is simply whether Congress will act to stop a carnage which continues only because people don't realize its magnitude, and can't see the blood on the things they buy, on the food they eat, and the services they get."

With urgency, Wirtz told the senators: "Every minute we talk, 18 to 20 people will be hurt severely enough to have to leave their jobs—some of them never to work again."

By day's end, he said, the industrial accident toll will be 55 dead, 8,500 disabled, 27,200 hurt.

Wirtz told the subcommittee that over 1,000 workers are expected to die from lung cancer contracted from radiation in uranium mines, that more than half of the 137,000 bituminous coal miners probably have some degree of pneumonoconiosis, a dust disease, and that studies are uncovering widespread cases of a lung disease among textile workers.

Reports to the AFL-CIO News from state labor federations show that only a corporal's guard of state inspectors oversees industrial safety. By contrast, an army of state game wardens protects fish and wildlife.

Unions Cut Toll

Safety statistics would be even more horrifying if it were not for union-management safety programs in most big industries—and the lack of state inspection shows up dramatically in the much higher injury rate of smaller, unorganized shops.

There is a wealth of documentation as to the difference an effective safety program can make in death and injury rates.

The National Safety Council is a volunteer organization, including both safety-conscious employers and unions. For the past 10 years, the work-injury rate for firms affiliated with the NSC has averaged 4.6 per million man-hours worked, compared with 15.6 for non-members.

In specific industries, latest available statistics show the injury rate in foundries operated by NCS members was 10.5 per million man-hours; for the industry as a whole, including both member and non-member firms, it was 25.6. In the machinery industry as a whole, the rate was 12.5; for NCS members, 4.2.

One of the few states with a relatively effective safety and occupational health program is New York—which incidentally has three times as many safety personnel as game wardens.

The New York State AFL-CIO says improved laws and an expanded state inspection force are needed. But its report on the present program is a bright contrast to those from most states. Here is what is being done:

"New York State has more than 600 persons engaged in its industrial safety program, expends above $5 million a year. Its 200 game wardens cost $1.5 million annually . . .

"Division of Industrial Safety Services has 255 factory and mercantile inspectors, 123 in construction, 51 for uninsured boilers (insurance companies inspect the 50,000 insured ones, state inspects 43,000 others).

"Division of Industrial Hygiene handles chemical - dust - radiation problems, has staff of physicians, about 25 engineers, 20 chemists . . .

Six-Month Inspections

"Foundries and places of public assembly inspected every six months; factory and mercantile employment units of 100 and up, annually; smaller units less frequently, depending on safety history.

"Construction projects inspected one or more times during life; most hazardous ones at one and two week intervals . . ."

Texas has about 40 percent less population than New York, and a lower percentage of industrial workers. Yet in the last year for which comparable statistics are available, it had more than twice as many on-the-job deaths. And the rate of work deaths per 100,000 industrial workers was 74 as compared with 17 for New York and 9 for Connecticut, which also has an above-average program.

The lagging state safety program in Texas is evidenced in a report from the Texas State AFL-CIO: "An inadequate occupational safety bill was passed in the 1967 session of the legislature, setting up an occupational safety division in the State Dept. of Health. The budget is only $200,000. . . . Until this year, there were no occupational safety inspectors or regulations."

Some states have not even taken the first steps towards safety and job-health standards that Texas has done. Mississippi doesn't even have a state labor department and has two people in the health department involved in safety work.

The Wall Street Journal reports that the U.S. Chamber of Commerce is seeking to enlist the aid of state industrial safety directors to defeat the Administration bill by warning that the legislation would be a federal "takeover" of the state functions.

Opposition Defined

Wirtz anticipated such a charge in his congressional testimony.

"The issue is not states rights," he stressed, although the legislation "will be opposed by those who confound that principle with their interest."

It is a "fair question," Wirtz said, to ask those claiming an invasion of states rights whether they will support legislation in their states to set up effective state safety and health programs. Or, he suggested, will they merely "hurry from opposing it here to some state capitol to oppose it there?"

Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.) is both Senate sponsor of the bill and chairman of the Labor subcommittee which is considering it.

Over a six-month period, Yarborough said, there were more disabling injuries and deaths on the job than as the result of highway accidents.

And he came up also with another grim comparison. During the same period, there were 30 times more people injured at work in the United States than there were battle casualties among U.S. troops in Viet Nam.

C. R. Smith Named To Commerce Post

C. R. Smith, who has been chairman of the board of American Airlines, has been appointed Secretary of Commerce to succeed Alexander B. Trowbridge.

Smith's appointment was announced by Pres. Johnson after the resignation of Trowbridge because of ill health after less than 13 months in office. Trowbridge, although only 37, has suffered several heart attacks.

Johnson told newsmen that Smith, 53, had been recommended by both Trowbridge and Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, "with whom he will be working very closely."

Still unfilled in the Cabinet is the head of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare. Johnson said he has no immediate plans to name a replacement for John W. Gardner. He said HEW has "a very outstanding man" as under secretary, Wilbur J. Cohen, who will continue as acting secretary "at least a few weeks."

COOPERATION of federal employe unions in encouraging purchase of U.S. savings bonds through the payroll savings plan was sought—and received—by Postmaster Gen. Lawrence F. O'Brien. He discusses the strictly voluntary campaign with John A. McCart (right), director of the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council.

U.S. Surveys Uncover On-Job Health Hazards

Millions of Americans are working under conditions that can lead to illness, disability or death, the head of the U.S. Public Health Service told Congress.

Surgeon Gen. William H. Stewart cited public health studies demonstrating the inadequacies of present occupational health programs and illustrating the magnitude of the problem.

A survey of 1,700 industrial plants in six mentropolitan areas showed that 65 percent of the 142,000 workers were "potentially exposed to toxic materials or harmful physical agents, such as severe noise or vibration."

Of these, Stewart said, "only 25 percent were adequately protected. The remaining workers were plainly unprotected or working in conditions which needed immediate attention."

He told a House Labor subcommittee that the "precise nature" of the analysis made it possible to apply the findings to 30,000 plants, covering 650,000 workers." A "conservative" estimate, he said, is that there are at least 336,000 cases of occupational diseases a year in the United States.

Research into industrial illnesses hasn't been able to keep pace with the new chemicals that come into commercial use each year—one reason, he suggested, why "there are 800,000 people who suffer from some form of occupationally-caused dermatitis every year."

Stewart strongly supported the Administration's occupational health and safety bill, which would assign a major research and training function in the health field to the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, with enforcement and safety responsibility in the Labor Dept.

The lack of trained experts in the industrial health field is critical, Stewart stressed.

"Illinois, the third largest of our industrial states, has only three industrial hygienists for the entire state," he noted. "Texas has two, one of whom is about to retire." There is an "immediate need" for at least 482 industrial health specialists in the states, he reported.

The costs of an adequate program are not easy to determine, Stewart conceded. But he cited as an example of the savings in workmen's compensation the $192 million paid out in compensation for silicosis cases between 1952 and 1962.

"I feel safe in asserting that we could have prevented such cases for less than a tenth of that amount," he declared.

Millions Available for Fish, Wildlife But Health, Safety Budget Is Slim

Ohio will have to move to the rear of the line when it comes to damaging comparisons between state expenditures for industrial safety and money spent for fish and wildlife conservation.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany earlier this year cited Ohio as a "horrible example" of state indifference to on-the-job safety. He noted that it had 109 state fish and game inspectors but only 79 industrial safety inspectors.

The Ohio State AFL-CIO had used this comparison in urging the legislature to expand the state's safety program. It shook up a lot of people to learn that their state put a higher priority on wildlife than on human life.

Now it turns out that Ohio's program—undeniably inadequate—is nevertheless better than average.

The AFL-CIO News asked other state central bodies for a similar comparisons between safety inspectors and fish and game wardens. In the first group of replies received were these reports of imbalances far greater than Ohio's:

Alabama has 12 safety inspectors and six other employes in the agency, compared with 105 employed in fish and game inspection.

Arizona has a six-man safety agency with a $52,000 budget, including elevator inspection. Its 219-man fish and game staff has a $2.75 million budget.

Colorado's 15 safety inspectors and $136,000 safety budget compares with 120 fish-game inspectors and a $1.55 million budget.

Idaho has three safety inspectors, 40 conservation officers.

Iowa's 14 safety inspectors work with a $331,000 budget; its 67 fish and game wardens have a $3.6 million budget.

Kansas employs 21 persons in the safety division of the State Labor Dept., with a $184,000 budget. The fish-game comparison is 181 employes and a $2 million budget.

Missouri employs 19 industrial and mine safety inspectors under a $340,000 budget—and 145 conservation agents at a $7.9 million budget.

Minnesota has 18 safety inspectors, only three more than it had 44 years ago. But it has 135 full-time and 65-part-time game wardens.

North Carolina has a better-than-average program, but the ratio is still 55 safety to 160 fish-game inspectors.

Nebraska has 10 safety inspectors, 50 game wardens.

Oklahoma's five safety inspectors compare with 150 fish and game wardens.

Utah has 8 safety inspectors, of which five are for mines, but 57 fish-game inspectors.

Virginia has 13 safety inspectors with a $165,000 budget and 117 fish and game wardens with a $1.2 million budget.

Wyoming has three mining inspectors, none for other safety areas, and 45 fish-game wardens.

A Starting Point

IN HIS EDUCATION MESSAGE to the 90th Congress, on February 5, 1968, the President expressed his belief that the mid-1960's "will be remembered as a time of unprecedented achievement in American education." The AFL-CIO shares this view, even as it recognizes that staggering problems still remain and that what has been accomplished must be regarded only as a beginning.

In many regards, however, the AFL-CIO would go further than the President's proposals. We urge Congress to take the message as the starting point for a legislative program rather than as the outer limits of one.

Particularly in the field of higher education there is need for going far beyond the Administration recommendations. The AFL-CIO believes that the proposed cuts in construction funds should be restored in addition to an increased student aid program.

The AFL-CIO welcomes the changes recommended by the President in vocational education. More than one-half of the young men and women who graduate from high school every year do not go to college. In addition, three out of every ten students fail to complete high school. Vocational education must prepare every boy and girl who does not go to college with the necessary skills to obtain and hold a job.

The Vocational Education Act of 1963 has provided our schools with new and modern tools to relate training and vocational education to the realistic needs of the labor market. A National Advisory Council on Vocational Education, established by the Act and appointed by the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, just completed an evaluation of the status of vocational education. The Council came to the conclusion that "the promise of the Act has not been realized." We in the AFL-CIO concur with that evaluation.

We believe that innovative programs, separately funded, must be encouraged to carry out the purpose of the Vocational Education Act of 1963. Work-study programs that combine education, training, work experience as well as income opportunities must become an integrated part of our overall vocational education system. In addition, residential schools should be constructed and operated to provide training opportunities away from an unfavorable home environment. Specific funds must be earmarked for the vocational education of persons with educational, social and economic handicaps.

To carry out the programs that are urgently needed now requires a much higher appropriation of funds than is presently authorized in the Vocational Education Act of 1963.

In assessing our national priorities, we need to maintain a keen awareness that everywhere across the nation the urban crisis continues to be America's greatest domestic problem. In responding to that crisis there is no more essential tool than quality education at every level for all. Much of the unrest in our cities can be related to the hopelessness manifested by those who cannot see any substantive improvement in the quality of education in our inner city schools. In our view, the rate of improvement is still too slow and fails to meet the urgency of our times.

To effectively address ourselves to this total problem, high priority should be given to the expansion of programs which compensate for the years of decay, discrimination and apathy experienced by those who dwell in the ghettos of our cities. We believe that meaningful efforts in this direction will ultimately give rise to new hope to those who have long since given up.

Executive Council Statement:

Labor's Support Reaffirmed As Viet Nam Crisis Sharpens

The following is excerpted from the AFL-CIO Executive Council statement on the crisis in Viet Nam adopted Feb. 20, 1968, at Bal Harbour, Fla.

FOR NEARLY three years, the U.S. has repeatedly offered to enter unconditionally into negotiations for ending the war in Viet Nam. These offers have fallen on deaf ears in Hanoi, Moscow, and Peiping.

To demonstrate further its earnest desire for negotiations, our government recently reduced considerably, for over a month, its bombing of the Hanoi and Haiphong military targets. But Ho Chi Minh interpreted these peace efforts as proof of American weakness. Then, under cover of the Tet holiday, Hanoi proceeded to escalate its aggression by launching an offensive against the main South Vietnamese urban centers, slaughtering thousands of innocent civilians, turning the city streets into bloody battlefields.

The Communists appealed for and counted on a popular uprising to welcome their raiders as liberators. In this, they failed dismally.

It is still too early to estimate the extent of damage which this fruitless Communist attempt to seize power has inflicted on the pacification and re-development programs or on the recent progress made by the South Vietnamese in building constitutional government and democratic institutions. Clearly, this aggression against the cities was an integral part of the Communist strategy aimed at undermining America's determination and at strengthening those in our country who, wittingly or otherwise, would have the U.S. submit to the dictates of Hanoi as the road to peace in Southeast Asia.

THE OPPONENTS of the Administration's tenacious resistence to Communist aggression have hastened to seize upon whatever initial political and psychological successes Hanoi may have scored in its latest escalation of the war as evidence that our country's policy is wrong.

In panic, some academicians have rushed to conclude that the time has arrived for U.S. policymakers to realize that we have been defeated in terms of our original object—to prove that so-called wars of national liberation do not pay and that we can stop them.

This hasty conclusion is without foundation in fact. Viet Nam is not the first or only place where the Communists have resorted to their so-called national liberation tactics. After World War II, they tried it in Greece and Korea and failed in both countries. They tried and failed in Malaysia and Indonesia, in Bolivia, Colombia, Peru, and Venezuela.

Nor have they gotten far in South Viet Nam, despite years of preparation, subversion, and aggression. They have already been driven out of most towns and the remaining fight in the cities is not going their way.

The Saigon CVT Council has pointed out that the "armed Viet Cong propaganda teams" which "toured the workers' neighborhoods, trying to hold rallies to influence the population against the South Vietnamese government and the U.S. did not attract crowds because of worker indifference and hostility to the Viet Cong." We welcome the assurance of our CVT colleagues that "the terrorist campaign has only hardened the resolve of Vietnamese labor to resist terror and oppression."

The Executive Council of the AFL-CIO appeals to the millions in our ranks, to workers everywhere, to the entire American people:—Strengthen the President's hands in his persistent efforts to end the war through negotiations.

We further pledge our full support to the President in his determination to achieve our country's sole aim in the Viet Nam conflict—to halt Communist aggression.

We pledge our all-out support to help the CVT enhance its effectiveness and enable it to play an increasing role in defeating Communist subversion and promoting social justice, the development of democratic institutions, and a viable economy.

We are confident that the CVT and all other democratic forces in South Viet Nam will do their utmost to have their government speed rural reforms which will immediately give land to the individual peasant. Coincidentally, we urge our government to provide the peasants with the fertilizers and technical assistance which will enable them to raise their agricultural productivity and improve their living standards.

Such reform measures, combined with an invigorated campaign against corruption, will facilitate the resumption of the pacification program on a sounder basis and firmer foundation. Such social and economic actions will rally the people of South Viet Nam and strengthen the determination of our country and the efforts of our allies to halt the Communist aggressors and promote peace in Southeast Asia and throughout the world.

'A Time for Testing':

Nation's Basic Unmet Needs Face New Congress Struggle

The following is excerpted from an article, "Congress—A Time for Testing," by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, in the current issue of the Federationist, the AFL-CIO's monthly magazine.

A DETERMINED ASSAULT on several decades of social progress made Congress in 1967 the battleground between a revived coalition of conservatives in the House and a thin liberal majority in the Senate. As the 90th Congress gets down to work in its second session, all signs point to an equally hard defensive struggle despite clear signs that the nation's need is for new and innovative remedies.

From the opening of the 90th Congress in January 1967 until the Christmas "truce" last December 15, there was a sustained drive by a coalition of Dixiecrats and conservative Republicans to erode the legislative landmarks of previous decades as well as cripple recently-enacted programs and halt their further expansion.

Early last year, when President Johnson proposed a fiscal 1968 budget of $141 billion, the cry rose immediately for heavy cuts. A reduction of only 5 percent would mean a saving of over $7 billion, the conservatives argued, but they knew $120 billion of the budget could not be touched, being marked for national defense, interest payments, veterans' benefits and various programs required by law. This left only $21 billion to suffer the slashes by the "economizers." This $21 billion was budgeted primarily for education, health, labor, welfare, anti-poverty programs, housing, transportation and conservation.

Even as programs survived the coalition's all-out assault, it was learned late in the session that they were to endure another mighty money whack.

The coalition declared further cuts in federal programs were necessary because of the nation's deepening deficit, but their true motives were closer to the statement by House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Wilbur Mills (D-Ark.), who said that he wanted "basic changes in federal programs, not merely appropriations cuts this year."

The Congress then enacted a flat across-the-board cutback of $4 billion in federal spending and $9 billion in federal obligations.

IN SPITE OF the limited progress achieved in 1967, in spite of the gains in meat inspection, in spite of the successful defense of school aid and anti-poverty programs, much unfinished business is still waiting action by the 90th Congress.

- High priority on the 1968 agenda goes to job creation for the hard-core unemployed. Representative James O'Hara (D-Mich.) and more than 75 other members of the House have sponsored a $4 billion "one million jobs" proposal to open up public service jobs in federal, state and local government and in private, non-profit organizations.
- Situs picketing legislation is long overdue to restore to building trades the same basic economic rights enjoyed by unions in other industries.
- Equal rights and equal opportunity must be assured in employment, housing, education and in the administration of justice.
- Farm workers need long overdue protection of their rights to organize unions and bargain collectively under the National Labor Relations Act.
- Truth-in-lending legislation, including coverage of revolving credit, must be enacted in 1968. In 1967, the Senate passed a weak truth-in-lending bill which exempted revolving credit, first mortgages and credit transactions where the dollar finance charges is less that $10. The House on Feb. 1, 1968, by a 382 to 4 vote, passed a bill which included all these safeguards.

AN OMINOUS SHADOW over the entire Congress is cast by the crisis of America's cities which will not await a slow evolutionary solution. The 1967 AFL-CIO convention approved a 10-point legislative "urban crisis" program to meet the immediate and long-range needs of the cities. In addition to the "one million jobs" program, the AFL-CIO is calling for construction of 2.5 million new housing units each year; improvement and expansion of mass transit; a $2 billion a year program of accelerated construction of public facilities; expansion of the Neighborhood Youth Corps to provide work and training for high school dropouts; special education aid for children and adults in slum areas; improved manpower training; improved and restructured public welfare assistance, including elimination of discriminatory and punitive restrictions; relief of rural poverty, including NLRA protection for farm workers; and sound economic planning under federal leadership with state and metropolitan participation.

In the second session of the 90th Congress, the AFL-CIO will not shirk its responsibilities. The American labor movement has consistently made it clear that it is willing to pay for the programs it supports—but it insists on equality of sacrifice.

In this respect, labor supports enactment of a temporary war surtax, but also insists on a surcharge on corporation incomes of at least twice the percentage on personal incomes. Corporation and personal income excluded from taxation by major loopholes in the tax structure should be subjected to the same tax rate as the surcharge.

The conservative coalition has seized on the war in Viet Nam as an excuse to cut back social progress at home, but this is the same anti-labor Republican-Dixiecrat coalition which fought against social progress even when it didn't have the Viet Nam war as an excuse.

The success and continuation of these vital programs for all Americans depends on the strength of the fight that liberals and moderates wage in the House and Senate in 1968. The defense of freedom in Viet Nam and social progress at home must proceed together.

Unfair Competition:

Congress Urged to End Abuse Of Tax-Free Industrial Bonds

MISUSE OF state and local tax-free bonds to finance private profit-making plants is "undermining the equity of the tax system" and boosting the tax load of million of citizens, a Steelworkers official charged.

Last year, more than $1.3 billion of tax-free bonds were issued to build factories and warehouses for private businesses, said Frank Fernbach, assistant for special projects to Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel.

The resulting annual revenue loss to federal, state and local governments runs to millions of dollars, Fernbach said, pointing out that "the rest of the American people have to make up" those losses. He made the statements on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO produced public affairs program broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. EST on the Mutual Radio Network.

Fernbach noted that the tax-free bonding privilege was granted to help state and local governments build and expand schools, libraries and other public facilities. But, he said, forty states now permit use of the privilege to entice private firms, often at the expense of workers and communities in other areas.

"The private profit advantages that result from this abuse are tremendous," he declared. Factory financing costs are lower under tax-free bonds than when a corporation issues its own bonds, he said, which creates hardships for other businesses that have to compete without benefit of the special privilege. In addition, he noted, industrial bond financing has also increased both the difficulties and costs of bonding for true public purposes.

FERNBACH SAID there is growing support from Democrats and Republicans in Congress to change the law and the U. S. Treasury Dept. has formally "urged Congress to end this malpractice."

Plugging the loophole would let all states and localities compete for industry on a fair and equal basis, he said.

Reporters questioning Fernbach were Alan Adams, Washington correspondent for Business Week magazine and Alex Uhl, editor of Press Associates, Inc.

By Press Associates, Inc.

WHEN THE MINIMUM WAGE was extended to farm workers two years ago, there were outcries that farmers would be ruined, that mechanization would take over and farm workers by the thousands would lose their jobs. Actually, Congress limited the minimum wage protection to $1 an hour and 45 percent of the 430,000 hired workers on farms that used more than 500 man-days of hired labor during a peak three-month period.

The Dept. of Labor has just published a study of the effects of the $1 minimum on farm jobs. It shows conclusively that while farm employment is continuing its long-run decline, the drop in jobs during the past years was actually greater on farms which did not come under the minimum wage than on farms which did. The statistics were: Jobs on farms affected by the minimum, down 11 percent; jobs on farm unaffected by the minimum, down 31 percent.

Another area in which the powerful farm corporations, particularly in California and Texas, have been predicting disaster is the termination of the Mexican farm workers program. For more than a decade this provided a source of cheap labor for some of the wealthiest corporations, farm or otherwise, in the country. Ever since Congress finally stopped the program, the farm corporations have sought by every possible means to get it restored.

They dug up a little-used section of the immigration laws which opens the door to the importation of labor whenever it can be shown that domestic labor is not available. Each year the Dept. of Labor has to battle the farm corporations—and sometimes the states themselves—to hold down the number of entry visas.

But here again the predicted disasters—the threats of valuable crops rotting in the fields, the shortage of food that would result—have proved mostly propaganda. It has been proved that domestic labor is available when decent wages are paid and that there is no excuse for hiring Mexican farm workers at one end of Texas or California streets while at the other end domestic labor stands idle.

AS PART OF THE STRUGGLE to bring farm labor into the mainstream of American economic life, union organization has become a major factor. It has been proved by the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee that farm workers can be organized and that organization can bring results. As the Labor Dept. minimum wage study noted, union contracts in California's vineyards have brought basic hourly rates of $1.65 and $1.75 cents an hour with further wage boosts scheduled this April.

These contracts have been won despite the fact that farm workers do not come under the protection of the National Labor Relations Act which gives the National Labor Relations Board the authority to hold secret representation elections, to certify unions as bargaining agents and to punish employers guilty of unfair labor practices.

Congress now has before it a bill that would correct this injustice. It would give farm workers under the protected rights assured almost all other American workers. The powerful farm corporations first sought to keep such legislation under the jurisdiction of the House Agriculture Committee whose membership is conservative and farm corporation-oriented. That maneuver failed and the legislation was referred to the House Education & Labor Committee where it belonged. Thwarted in its maneuver, the Agriculture Committee then adopted a resolution urging the Labor Committee to kill the bill.

Disaster for farming and notably for the family farmer was predicted just as it had been in the past when the Mexican program was killed and a limited number of farm workers placed under a minimum wage. All this is nonsense.

What is clear is that the new struggle is just a continuation of the long, stubborn and bitter battle that has been waged for the past years. Slowly but surely, the nation's conscience is being awakened to the tragedy of thousands of Americans who have been the victims of the grossest kind of injustice at the hands of one of the richest and most heavily subsidized segments of the American economy.

MILLIONS OF AMERICANS have heavier tax loads as a result of the use of state and local tax-free bonds to finance private profit-making plants, Frank Fernbach (center), assistant for special projects to the president of the Steelworkers, charged on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Alex Uhl (left) of Press Associates, Inc., and Alan Adams of Business Week Magazine on the Public affairs interview broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on Mutual radio.

How to Buy:

Easter Shoppers to Be Faced With Higher Clothing Prices

By Sidney Margolius

YOU'LL BE GREETED by higher prices, especially for shoes, when you shop for Easter clothing this spring. One of the problems is that a short cotton crop has pushed up prices of cotton textiles.

If you are looking for a house, you'll have to cope with rising mortgage interest rates and higher tags on the houses themselves to the extent that working people are being virtually priced out of the housing market.

In food, prices are moving up again this year. But there are several good buys in March that can help hold down the impact on your food budget for the time being. The real problem will come this summer when you will be hit by the highest food prices on record.

To cope with 1968's living costs, you have to be a careful buyer and pay as much attention to how you spend your money as how you earn it.

Shoes are the largest single expense in a family clothing budget, and one that cannot be avoided. The problem is that shoe prices have jumped 28 percent in the past decade, about twice the rise in other clothing. Shoes have gone up again this past year despite the fact that hide and leather prices actually have come down. While hide prices dropped 21 percent and leather 7 percent, wholesale prices of shoes actually rose 3 percent.

One help is the trend to lower prices on shoes with uppers made of Corfam, Aztran and similar synthetic leathers (called "poromerics"). Synthetic soles have been widely used for some time, but the newer poromeric uppers are being increasingly used. Actually there was no real reason for the original high price of the du Pont Corfam shoes. There is less waste in manufacture of these than in using hide leather.

Are the synthetic leather shoes worth buying at their lower price? People who have bought them report that you can expect more scuff resistance and better appearance over a longer period without frequent shining.

The new synthetics are more comfortable than older synthetics since they "breathe" (let in air). They also are lighter weight than leather, and water repellent, and retain their shape well. However, they do not "give" like leather. So you need to make doubly sure you have a roomy enough fit when you buy them.

In general, watch out for quality deterioration which tends to occur when shoe prices rise. Look for the label inside the shoe which tells you what materials are used. In leather shoes look for pliable, closely-grained leather. A well-constructed shoe has a thin strip of leather called a welt, to which both upper and sole are joined (not directly to each other). A welted shoe is smooth inside, and generally sturdier.

Prices of children's shoes are especially worrisome—as much as $10 for even little kids' footwear. Prices are lower at chain stores and discount houses but you have to be especially careful about fit. These retailers often do not do as painstaking a fitting job as the specialty shops selling the higher-priced shoes. When bought, children's shoes should be one-half inch longer than the foot and at least one-quarter inch wider at the toe. The ball of the foot should come at the widest part of the sole, and the heel should fit snugly but without binding.

Eggs are the buy for March. Prices are dropping as the result of increased production. You can use eggs in many ways during the spring flush season; as sandwich fillings, for salads, desserts, and to supplement smaller portions of meat.

Safety Council Reports:

Highway Death Rate Down Slightly in '67

Chicago—Although traffic accident fatalities in 1967 equaled those for 1966, American motorists drove more death-free miles last year, the National Safety Council said.

"These 1967 traffic statistics," said Howard Pyle, council president, "support our conviction that the tragic loss in lives and dollars on the highways is an unnecessary expense that the nation can control."

The council reported that traffic accidents killed 53,000 persons in 1967, the same number as in 1966. The cost of the accidents was estimated at $11 billion. Deaths for December 1967 alone totalled 5,210, up 3 percent from the 5,040 who were killed in December, 1966.

While the number of traffic deaths remained the same in 1967, vehicle-miles of travel rose, resulting in a lower death rate. The 1967 rate was 5.5 fatalities per 100 million vehicle-miles, a 4 percent decrease from the 1966 rate of 5.7 deaths per 100 million miles. The record low figure is 5.2 deaths per 100 million vehicle-miles in 1961. Ten years ago, in 1957, the rate was 6.0.

Mileage in 1967 rose to 970 billion from 930.5 billion in 1966, an increase of 4 percent. Increases in 1966, 1965, and 1964 had been 42, 41, and 42 billion miles respectively.

Pyle commented that the 1967 fatality figure must not be misinterpreted. "Any progress that has been made against the factors that produce traffic accidents will dissipate unless the nation strengthens its current efforts for traffic safety," he said.

"Coming months must see more motorists wearing their safety belts, a device that can save 8,000 to 10,000 lives each year. The nation must also work for increased safety inspection of automobiles, road improvements, and education of drivers—projects that can overcome problems created by years of inadequate attention to traffic safety. Only constant and long term effort can decrease the fatality figures."

In addition to the 1967 deaths, the council estimated that there were 1.9 million disabling injuries from traffic accidents last year. Of the total $11 billion economic loss, $3.5 billion came from damaged property, the remainder from wage losses, medical expenses, and overhead cost of insurance.

The nation's licensed drivers totaled 103 million at the end of 1967 while registered vehicles numbered 100 million.

Soup to Nonsense:

Grandma's Top Secret Recipe Now Part of the Public Domain

By Jane Goodsell

RECIPE-HOARDING has gone the way of smelling salts and whalebone corsets, and people today are baring their culinary secrets as freely and nonchalantly as they discuss their sex lives. And not just ordinary housewives, but opera stars, playwrights, famous hostesses, professional chefs, first ladies and U. S. senators.

It has become de rigeur for every political candidate to paper his constituency with printed copies of Ed's Favorite Hood River Apple Pie or Hazel's Hot'n Hearty New England Fish Chowder. The movie starlet whose favorite cookie recipe has never appeared in print had better switch to a new press agent; and the stand-up comedian who hasn't contributed his version of vichyssoise to the latest personality cookbook is simply not with it.

Celebrity recipes are excellent, make no mistake about that. Unlike great-grandma's vague, amorphous directions, they have been proofread for accuracy and carefully tested—although one might reasonably speculate by whom. (If that mezzo-soprano spends all that time in the kitchen making gnocchi, when does she practice her scales?)

Be that as it may, it is reassuring to know that a congressional candidate's recipe for Foolproof Seven-Minute Frosting really is foolproof. No politician is going to risk getting himself known as a man who doesn't live up to his promises. And when a famous chef releases his recipe for Poularde Pavillon, you can be sure you'll have a tasty dish if you follow to the letter his directions for chopping those truffles and measuring that dry French champagne.

Etiquette has changed since great-grandma's day when it was impolite to ask for recipes. Now it's rather rude not to ask your hostess for the recipe for that divine Indonesian casserole she served. Possibly, if the recipe is a spectacularly successful one that she created herself (well, anyway, it was her own idea to add slivered almonds), she may feel a bit reluctant to toss it into the common domain. Still, she's flattered to be asked and, no matter how she feels, she's in an indefensible position to turn down the request.

Didn't the Duchess of Windsor graciously share her apricot mousse recipe with millions of Sunday supplement readers? Aren't Lawrence Welk's vegetable croquettes and J. Edgar Hoover's popovers available to one and all? Why, guests at the White House are even handed xeroxed sheets listing the page numbers of the cookbooks where they can find recipes for the dishes on which they have dined!

IN THE PREVAILING ATMOSPHERE of ungrudging generosity, a hostess can hardly refuse to divulge her own recipe for curried meatballs which, more likely than not, came from a cookbook which has sold, to date, eight million copies.

There is an additional force at work in this situation which dispels any lingering wistfulness we modern housewives might feel about revealing that meatball recipe. We're willing—nay eager—to circulate the list of ingredients as evidence of our sophisticated and cosmopolitan tastes.

If our guests merely ate the meatballs, they might not realize how exotic a dish they were privileged to enjoy. Which would be a shame, considering the effort involved in obtaining coriander, cumin and cardamon seeds, not to mention turmeric, ginger root and mace.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Special Panel Reports:

Fire Fighters Urged To Revise Strike Ban

The Fire Fighters should change the no-strike clause in their union's constitution to give firemen more power to win grievance settlements, a 10-man fact-finding commission has recommended.

The commission, headed by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. George M. Harrison, proposed that the constitution be revised to provide that:

- In communities where "collective bargaining, conciliation, mediation, fact finding with recommendations or voluntary binding conciliation is available," the no-strike provision be continued substantially without change.
- In communities where such procedures are not available to fire fighters, IAFF locals "should not withhold fire protection service" but should refer the issue to the union's president and executive board for their further handling.

The commission—only three of whose members are IAFF members—was named by IAFF Pres. William D. Buck under a mandate of the union's 1966 convention, at which the long-standing no-strike provision was debated.

Since that time there have been work stoppages by fire fighters, or threats of stoppages, in a number of cities.

The commission suggested that some, if not all of these incidents, might have been averted if proper machinery had existed for redress of fire fighters' grievances.

It emphasized that the union, by waiving its right to strike, had reason to expect communities to deal fairly with fire fighters by providing such machinery. But that has happened in only some communities, the commission said.

Its proposed modifications, the commission pointed out, would reinforce IAFF's efforts to get "fair regulation and legislation" and awaken citizens "to the real danger inherent in the maltreatment of fire fighters."

IAFF officers who appeared before the commission's hearings or were interviewed "expressed with evident sincerity their belief that every effort should be made to avoid interruptions to fire fighting service," the commission said.

That belief, it added, rested upon "their strong sense of responsibility to their communities, and upon pride in and dedication to the service in which they are enlisted."

Panel Thanked

Buck thanked the commission for performing "public service of great value." The recommendations, he said, would be given "intensive study" by local, state, provincial and national bodies and the union's convention in Toronto in August.

Commission members, in addition to Harrison, were: Rev. Philip A. Carey of Xavier School of Industrial Relations; IAFF General Counsel Edward J. Hickey; Percy Bugbee, general manager, National Fire Protection Association; Exec. Dir. Ed. Johnson of the League of Wisconsin Municipalities, City Manager Thomas Kay of Flint, Mich.; Henry Nabers, former city manager of Grand Rapids, Mich.; IAFF Ninth District Vice Pres. Harry Williams; IAFF Sixth District Vice Pres. Gordon R. Anderson, and IAFF Local 587 Pres. Charles A. Hall.

IT'S COLD in St. Paul, but Minnesota state employes are hot under the collar at accumulated grievances, including failure to finance promised merit increases, hazardous safety conditions and refusal of the state's Dept. of Public Welfare to negotiate with the union, an affiliate of the State, County & Municipal Employes. Wirtz Says Jobless Data Hides Severe Problems In City Ghettos

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz has told Congress that "significant progress" is being made in identifying the hardcore unemployed in big city ghettos and in developing programs to help them get decent jobs.

But, Wirtz testified before the Joint Economic Committee, ghetto unemployment is greater in magnitude and more serious in nature than had been revealed in traditional surveys.

While the national unemployment rate was reduced to 3.5 percent by January 1968—the lowest rate since the Korean conflict—it is an average that obscures as much as it reveals, Wirtz noted.

More refined surveys taken city by city in the 20 largest metropolitan areas disclosed a jobless rate of 4.7 percent in the central cities and 3.1 percent in the suburbs during 1967. The chief reason for the difference, Wirtz said, is that most whites live in the suburbs while 80 percent of non-whites live in the city center.

Detailed figures released by Wirtz show that, for the 16 to 19-year old group, the jobless rate during 1967 averaged 15.7 percent in Philadelphia, 15.5 percent in Detroit, 19.6 percent in the San Francisco-Oakland area, 16.4 percent in the Los Angeles-Long Beach area, 12.9 percent in Chicago and 12.4 percent in New York.

Triple Rate

These teenage jobless rates are about triple the jobless rate in these metropolitan areas. The teenage group, in numerical terms, makes up about one-third of the unemployed in these areas.

Wirtz pointed out that considerable differences exist between cities. He said the unemployment rate ranges from 2.2 percent in Minneapolis-St. Paul and 2.3 percent in Washington, D.C., to 5.6 percent in Los Angeles-Long Beach and 5.4 percent in San Francisco-Oakland.

He described how the more refined methods now in use go beyond the recent emphasis on these facts: that Negro unemployment is twice that of white workers; that teenage unemployment is not much improved since 1961; that 3 million persons are jobless at any one time while about 11 million experience unemployment some time during the year; that a half million are jobless for at least half the year.

These traditional concepts are misleading with respect to the hardcore unemployed, Wirtz said, because they take no account of the fact that hundreds of thousands are not working due to remediable physical and emotional handicaps.

"Others are not looking for work because they lack the basic minimum of literacy or skill, or have been repeatedly rebuffed, or cannot find transportation to where the jobs are located, or cannot find child-care facilities," Wirtz declared, continuing:

"Still others have only part-time work although they need and are looking for full-time employment. Millions with full-time jobs cannot earn enough to support their families decently."

Wirtz told the committee that the Labor Dept. conducted experimental surveys in November 1966 in 15 slum areas of some of the largest cities to illustrate the problems of hardcore unemployment.

"In addition to an average 'unemployment' rate of 10 percent," Wirtz said, "we found another 7 percent of involuntary part-time workers; and, of those with full-time jobs, more than one-fifth were earning less than $60 a week.

"Outside the labor force, we found a large number of men so estranged from the world of work, and of women convinced that they will be barred from work, that they were not even seeking jobs.

"At least one out of three residents in these slums was found to have a serious problem related to employment."

The major redesigning of manpower statistics, Wirtz observed, will prove most useful to the citizens and public officials of individual cities who have so long worked in the dark without reliable information on their own jobless problems.

Specific Programs

The secretary spoke briefly about three special programs: the Concentrated Employment Program, the manpower aspect of the Model Cities Program and the new JOBS program. JOBS stands for Job Opportunities in the Business Sector.

CEP, aimed to help those in greatest need with counseling, training and job placement, will have been established in 76 urban slum and rural poverty areas by the end of this June, Wirtz said. In 1969, the objective is to have 99 urban and 47 rural area programs, he added.

The 65 model city grants approved in 1967, while involving a coordinated governmental attack on blighted city areas, all have manpower aspects, he noted. Work and training opportunities for neighborhood residents will be part of every plan, he said, and CEP will be wherever possible.

The JOBS program aims at involving private industry in training and employing the hardcore jobless in jobs with career potential. Of 113,000 trainees enrolled last year, he said, about two-thirds were disadvantaged.

Wirtz went on to describe other special training programs and concluded:

"All in all, programs administered by the Department of Labor will provide 1.3 million training and employment opportunities in 1969."

N.Y. Garbagemen, City Accept Arbitration Plan

New York—The garbagemen's union and the city have agreed to binding arbitration of their wage dispute that led to a strike and caused a public break between Mayor John V. Lindsay and Gov. Nelson Rockefeller.

The agreement followed three days of negotiations between city representatives and the Uniformed Sanitationmen's Association, a local of the unaffiliated Teamsters, representing 10,000 Sanitation Dept. employes.

The arbitrator is Vincent D. McDonnell, chairman of the State Mediation Board. He said he would have his decision Feb. 29 after both sides present their arguments.

The arbitration agreement, accepted by a meeting of 700 union shop stewards, provides that McDonnell will decide on wages and the length of a contract, which is to be retroactive to July 1.

The sanitation workers, who struck Feb. 2, returned to their jobs Feb. 10 under terms proposed by a mediation panel named by Rockefeller after rejecting Lindsay's request that he use the National Guard to collect piled up garbage.

Rockefeller also asked the state legislature to authorize the state to take over the city's Dept. of Sanitation temporarily. The legislature delayed voting on the measure to give the city another opportunity to settle the dispute.

Meanwhile, Rockefeller has reconvened a panel headed by Prof. George W. Taylor of the University of Pennsylvania to hold public hearings and propose changes in the Taylor Law banning strikes by public employes.

The panel, set up by the governor last year, made recommendations then that led to passage of the law in the closing hours of the 1967 legislature.

Law Invoked

The law was invoked to obtain an injunction banning the garbagemen's strike and later the local's president, John J. DeLury, was sent to jail for refusing to obey court back-to-work orders.

Rockefeller said that his main concern with the law was that it exempts New York City from its bargaining procedures which permits the state to intervene in a dispute prior to a breakdown in negotiations.

In another development, more than 70 unions leaders from local central bodies throughout the state, meeting in Albany, adopted a resolution condemning Lindsay's call for the National Guard as an attempt to "break a strike." A similar statement was adopted earlier by the New York City AFL-CIO.

H. B. Douglas Dies, Office Union Staffer

Ridgewood, N.J. —Henderson B. Douglas, director of organization for the Office Employes since 1953, died at a hospital here after a long illness. He was 53.

Born in Pittsburgh, Douglas became an organizer on the AFL staff in Washington in 1938 and was among those who helped organize employes of the Tennessee Valley authority when it was launched in the New Deal era.

Beirne Named To Non-Profit Broadcast Post

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne has been appointed by Pres. Johnson to a four-year term on the 15-member board that will direct the new Public Broadcasting Corp.

Beirne, president of the Communications Workers, was among 12 members named to the board by Johnson to serve with two members selected previously. Frank Pace Jr., former Army secretary and former Budget Bureau director, was named board chairman.

The semi-public, non-profit corporation and its board were created by the AFL-CIO-supported Public Broadcasting Act passed by Congress last October.

Financed by federal and private funds, the corporation will promote quality educational programs on radio and television, make grants for programming expenses and set up a broadcasting library and archives.

Two unions—the Auto Workers and CWA—were among the first private groups to pledge financial support. The UAW has pledged $25,000 and CWA $100,000.

The 1967 legislation authorized $9 million in first-year funds, although the money still must be appropriated by Congress. In addition, Johnson's budget for fiscal 1969 called for a $20 million appropriation.

Right Sought To Bargain on Scholarships

Labor and the Administration joined in supporting a bill that would allow unions to negotiate employer contributions to scholarship programs and child care centers for workers' children.

The Taft-Hartley Act stringently limits the purposes for which joint union-management trust funds can be used — as a safeguard against corrupt practices.

Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers told a Senate Labor subcommittee that the ACWA, in its forthcoming national bargaining, plans to seek both scholarship programs and day care centers. The union's Baltimore locals now have a child care center, but it had to be established as part of a physician-directed medical center in order to avoid conflict with the law.

Labor Dept. Solicitor Charles Donahue said the restrictions on employer trust fund contributions have proved to be "unduly rigid and narrow."

The proposed legislation, he said, "has two extremely worthwhile objectives." It would:

- "Broaden the horizons of our youth by providing increased educational opportunities.
- "Improve the caliber of child care centers available to working mothers."

The change in the law, Donahue noted, would merely permit "labor and management to use their own private funds for these purposes."

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. also testified in favor of the bill.

AMENDMENT of Taft-Hartley Act to permit employer contributions to joint programs providing scholarships and day care centers for children of workers was urged by Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers. With him at the witness table during Senate subcommittee hearings were Jacob Sheinkman (left), the union's general counsel, and ACWA Legislative Rep. Jane O'Grady.

Draft System Ends Job Deferment List

The Selective Service System has suspended the use of the "list of critical occupations and essential activities" as a basis for granting occupational deferments from the draft.

In a telegram to all state draft board heads, Selective Service Dir. Lewis B. Hershey said local draft boards would continue to have discretion to grant individual occupational deferments based on "essential community need."

Hershey also announced an end to deferments for most graduate students except those in medicine, dentistry and "allied medical specialties," and others in their second year of graduate study. The new rules are based on memorandum from the National Security Council, which was given the responsibility for making recommendations in the occupational and graduate areas when Congress extended the draft law in 1967.

Although it abandoned the "list," the council called upon the secretaries of labor, defense and commerce to "identify" particular skills and occupations that "may warrant qualifying for deferment on a uniform national basis."

The council noted that only about half of all present occupational deferments have been granted through the use of the "list" and that the other half were given at discretion of local draft boards.

The needs of neither the armed forces nor the civilian economy "now require" the listing of draft-exempt occupations, the council concluded.

A selective service official estimated that there now are about 340,000 men holding occupational deferments.

"Since we don't know how the local boards are going to rule on each case, we don't know how many men will lose their occupational deferments," he observed.

On the matter of graduate students, the council said that deferring them—except for those in medicine and dentistry — is "not now required in the national interest."

Here again, it said that if government agencies identify an essential need for graduate studies in any other field it will pass on such need and advise selective service.

Meanwhile, Hershey also called upon the local draft boards to continue the present "order of call" in drafting. This means that older men in the 19-to-25 age draft brackets are called first in chronological order of their birth dates.

The AFL-CIO has opposed all educational draft deferments—including the present deferment "freeze" for four-year college students—as "clearly discriminating against sons of low income families."

It also has supported draft priority for the younger men first because drafting from the top-down causes hardships by breaking up young families.

Major Study Planned Of Public Service Laws

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. has approved plans for an in-depth study of "unrealistic and unworkable" state and local laws restricting the collective bargaining rights of public employes.

Representatives of 40 national and international unions, attending the department's executive board sessions here, voted to create a legal panel similar to one which last year studied the impact of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

The MTD board approved a resolution that expressed concern over "mounting tensions between public officials and public employes"—tensions, the department said, which are the result of government's failure "to recognize the basic collective bargaining rights" of public workers.

The board gave unanimous approval to the resolution, submitted by the State, County & Municipal Employes, which affirmed the right of public employes to pursue the same legitimate trade union goals of workers in private enterprise.

But, the resolution went on, public employes are "hobbled" in their efforts by the "antiquated concepts" of public officials, who seek to impose legislation containing "restrictive clauses and punitive provisions" that render the bargaining concept "worthless."

The department sharply criticized existing laws that "encourage the public administrator in his refusal to engage in any meaningful bargaining with public employes." It added:

"These laws impose massive restrictions on the rights of employes and their unions, and provide for severe penalties in the case of union violations—but there are no corresponding penalties on the public administrator who may pay lip service, and nothing more, to the belief that 'public office is a public trust.'"

Attacking "administrative indifference and bureaucratic bungling," the resolution said that "the advantage is given to the inept or hostile administrator, and the burden falls unfairly on the union and its members."

The MTD said that the study of public employe legislation could "form the basis for a coordinated effort by the trade union movement to effect what changes are necessary in these laws to assure equity for millions of public employes."

Maritime Dept. Names Moody Administrator

Bal Harbour, Fla.—O. William Moody has been appointed Administrator of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., MTD Pres. Paul Hall announced at a meeting of the department's executive board here.

Moody also has been designated to serve on the department's board as the vice president representing the Seafarers, Hall said.

In assuming his new posts, Moody leaves his position as AFL-CIO Community Services liaison representative with the Boy Scouts of America. He took a leave from SIU to accept that assignment on April 1, 1965.

Prior to that, Moody served SIU in a variety of roles for more than 20 years, including posts as an organizer, public relations specialist, negotiator, international representative and legislative representative.

Senate Rollcall Votes On Rights Filibuster

The Senate on Feb. 20 voted 55-37 to end a filibuster which has blocked action on civil rights legislation. The vote for cloture fell short of the two-thirds margin required to limit debate under Senate rules. Labor supported the position of the 37 Democrats and 18 Republicans who wanted to let the Senate vote on the legislation.

The bottom rollcall shows the 58-34 vote on Feb. 21 against tabling an open housing amendment to the civil rights bill. Labor supported the position of the 39 Democrats and 19 Republicans who voted against killing the most meaningful part of the President's program.

Wirtz Cites 'Firmest Base':

Union Efforts Hailed In Apprentice Plans

New York—Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz credited the AFL-CIO supported apprenticeship training programs for minority youth with having "the firmest base" of all current job programs.

Wirtz addressed more than 200 representatives from 51 cities across the nation who gathered here for the "Minority Youth and Apprenticeship Training Conference." The three-day meeting was sponsored by the A. Philip Randolph Institute and the National Urban League.

Five speakers had preceded Wirtz—and each spoke of the potential and the sincerity involved in the recent adoption by 18 AFL-CIO building trades' unions of a blueprint for "affirmative action" to bring more minority group workers into apprenticeship training.

Wirtz added his endorsement, saying "we have found the key to the drawer that holds other keys that can lead to the job problem answer."

He said most action in the area of job development for minority workers "has been concentrated in the past two or three months, and, I feel, in the past week especially."

Good Results

Wirtz cautioned against playing with numbers in reporting successes but added:

"The statistics now are pretty blooming good."

He reviewed other programs which, like the apprenticeship training projects, are utilizing federal funds.

Wirtz said the cost of job-training programs is accelerating. The per capita cost of training or retraining a worker three years ago, he reported, was $475—less than half the current cost.

"We realize that if we mean business, it will have to be a lot higher," he said.

A person who is dependent on welfare costs the taxpayers about $1,500 a year, he added, or $60,000 during a 40-year working span. The nation not only loses those funds, he continued, but an additional $60,000 produced in various tax revenues by the average self-supporting individual.

He cautioned against programs that just provide jobs.

"If tomorrow every Negro had a job and still felt like he was a hired hand, we would be no further ahead than we are now," he told his applauding audience. "There exists a discontent that will not be satisfied by a job alone."

A. Philip Randolph, an AFL-CIO vice president and president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, termed "historic and memorable" the program adopted by the building trades' unions.

"We are going to lose no time in making it operative," he added.

William McSorley, assistant to the president of the AFL-CIO Building Trades Dept., said the craft unions would lay heavy emphasis on working with responsible civil rights groups in carrying out the commitment.

Dedicated, Committed

"We are dedicated and committed to this," McSorley said. "We are going to find the individual. If he doesn't come to us, we are going to go out and get him. And we want and need the help of responsible civil rights groups."

Donald Slaiman, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, told the group that "our goal is to have in every city in this country a full-time program where youngsters can be shown how and where to apply for apprenticeship training."

In noting that the AFL-CIO unions are cooperating in programs active or planned in 47 cities now, Slaiman said:

"We have had excellent cooperation among the leadership and the membership of the AFL-CIO building trades unions. Without their open advocacy of equal employment opportunity, I'm certain we would not be able to report the successes that today provide a foundation for even greater advances in the weeks to come."

Bayard Rustin, executive director of the Randolph Educational Fund, stressed the need for a political alliance between organized labor and the civil rights movement.

Only through a "basic alliance," Rustin said, can a Congress be elected that will provide the legislation and the funds for the construction and rehabilitation of homes and public institutions.

Florida Reporter Wins Guild's Broun Award

A series of articles on graft and corruption that resulted in the conviction of one county official and indictments against two others has won the Newspaper Guild's 1967 Heywood Broun Award for Robert Wyrick of Today, two-year-old Gannett daily in Cocoa, Fla.

The judges—columnists Rowland Evans, Jr., Bruce Biossat and Mary McGrory—picked Wyrick's entry over 93 others as the one that "best exemplified the crusading spirit and enterprise of the Heywood Broun tradition."

Wyrick will receive $1,000 and a citation.

The judges awarded an honorable mention to Haynes Johnson of the Washington Star for a series on life in Washington's Anacostia district, the most densely-populated area in the nation's capital. They termed his entry "the most illuminating of half a dozen submissions on the nation's Number One Problem."

Wyrick's stories exposed corruption at several levels of government in Florida's Brevard County, the nation's space capital, resulting in the grand-larceny conviction of the county school superintendent, bribery indictments against the county manager and a county commissioner, and the removal of a member of the county licensing board for builders on grand-larceny charges.

His disclosures of corruption and mismanagement also led to the elimination of $860,000 in waste money from school budgets, an overhaul of school purchasing practices and revisions in building-license procedures.

The Broun award has been presented annually since 1941 in memory of the noted columnist who was the founder and first president of the Guild, which now represents some 35,000 employes of newspapers, news magazines, news services and related enterprises in the United States and Canada.

Industry's Psychological Testing Causes Growing Union Concern

The rapid and widespread increase in industry's use of psychological tests to hire and upgrade workers has become a matter of "great concern" for organized labor, according to an article in the February issue of the Federationist, the AFL-CIO magazine.

Many tests are riddled with fallacies and threaten seniority, on-the-job performance and other proven ways of determining ability, the article points out.

It stresses that even though the tests are becoming " a fact of life," unions can take steps to prevent their misuse.

The article, "Psychological Testing and Collective Bargaining," is written by Reginald Newell, a Machinists economist who has specialized in the testing field.

Newell concentrates on what a union can do through negotiations to either prohibit promotional testing or keep it from undermining contract provisions and protections.

The article also analyzes tests and testing procedures, defines terms used in connection with them and deflates a number of claims made for the tests' value, validity and reliability.

Basic Questions

It is essential that unions "understand what tests can and cannot do, whether the specific test . . . can do the job the company says it can and, finally, to determine if the test is misused," Newell writes.

He defines a psychological test as "a systematic procedure for comparing the performance of two or more persons in the area of aptitude, achievement, intelligence and personality development."

But more important than the definition, Newell says, is the "validity" of the test. Does it do the job for which it is intended? He cites reasons why it often does not.

The article raises questions as to "whether or not characteristics being measured are required or even related to the job," the lack of standards which consider the "test-wiseness" of young persons compared to older workers, and the qualifications of those who give the tests.

Other Influences

There are many things that "may influence a person's score on an examination, quite apart from the actual aptitude and ability being tested," Newell observes.

Through collective bargaining, he points out, a union can bar an employer from using a test or negotiate a contract which "clearly indicates the relative weight" assigned to seniority, ability as related to promotion, layoffs or transfers.

In other areas, he suggests that the contract:

Indicate employes covered by a testing program, spell out its use, require proof of its validity, entitle a low-score employe to re-testing, assure the union of access to all pertinent data on the test, and provide for "the union's right to grieve on testing."

Since disputes regarding testing often end up in arbitration, Newell continues, it is important that a union insist on an arbitrator who has experience in cases involving tests.

Newell does not condemn tests per se. He acknowledges that they may be helpful in promoting individuals, provided they are "used in conjunction with other criteria."

The things to remember, he concludes, is that tests "are not sufficiently accurate to be the only device for selecting individuals for a particular job". . . "Above all, seniority should remain the main consideration for promotion."

The article notes that the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research has instituted an annual one-week seminar on testing which is open to any full-time union representative.

Bertram Gottlieb, AFL-CIO industrial engineer who has conducted the class, describes the seminar as "designed to give a union representative the knowledge he needs to successfully prevent test abuses through arbitration proceedings."

Details on this year's seminar, tentatively set for September, may be obtained from the Dept. of Research.

Open Housing Backed:

Senate Votes Show Solid Rights Majority

He told the Senate that he was "reluctantly" moving to table the open housing proposal because he did not think it would be possible to end the filibuster if a ban on discrimination in sale or rental of housing was included in the bill.

Supporters of the legislation said they will agree to modifications of the housing provision to lessen its impact. But Mansfield told the Senate he will call for another vote on cloture Feb. 26. If that also fails of the two-thirds margin, he indicated, he will favor putting aside the legislation and moving on to other business.

The civil rights coalition has served notice that it is not prepared to settle for a token protection bill.

In a resolution wired to all senators before the votes, the AFL-CIO Executive Council had urged support for cloture "to halt the filibuster."

Protection of persons exercising their civil rights and equal access to all housing, the council said, "are irreducible rights in this nation and Congress must guarantee them. Therefore it is vital that all members of the Senate be allowed to vote on these issues and that the undemocratic device of the filibuster be defeated."

The two Senate votes—particularly the decisive rejection of the attempt to table the housing provision—demonstrated more legislative strength than many observers had predicted. It was particularly impressive in view of widespread claims that the "mood" of the country has turned against further progress on civil rights.

In the two most recent tests in which civil rights were an issue, the Senate majority has been slimmer.

Two years ago, when Dirksen and the southern bloc joined in fighting a civil rights bill also including open housing, the vote for cloture was only 54-42.

Last year, when civil rights supporters sought to amend the Senate rules to allow three-fifths instead of two-thirds of the senators to impose cloture, a filibuster blocked a vote on the rules change. An attempt to invoke cloture and force a vote on changing the rules fell far short, with a 53-46 majority.

If the 60 percent rule had been adopted, the 59-39 margain for cloture on the current civil rights bill would have been sufficient.

On the other side of the Capitol, the House Ways & Means Committee dangled before the Administration the possibility that it might yet approve some form of the income tax surcharge Pres. Johnson has termed "essential" to the nation's financial health.

The committee approved an extension of the present 7 percent excise tax on automobiles and the 10 percent tax on telephone bills. Without legislation, the auto tax would drop to 2 percent on Apr. 1 and the telephone tax would end on that date.

The committee wrote into its report on the bill a statement that its action does not preclude future consideration of the income tax surcharge.

THE ELDERLY POOR in ten different cities will be recruited for part-time community service jobs under a program to be operated by the National Council of Senior Citizens. Pres. Johnson and Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz announced allocation of $1.1 million in federal funds for the project at a White House ceremony attended by members of NCSC's executive board.

Senior Citizens Receive Grant For Jobs Plan

The National Council of Senior Citizens has been awarded a $1.1 million federal contract to recruit the elderly poor for part-time jobs in public and non-private community agencies.

The demonstration project, financed by Manpower Training & Development funds, will seek out 400 of the aged poor in 10 cities, yet to be designated, as Senior Citizens AIDES.

Project Goals

The project's name relates to the work involved as teachers aides, clerical aides, recreation aides, custodial aides, library aides and day-care center aides.

The jobs will last a year. Wages will average $2-an-hour and those chosen generally will work about 20 hours a week. The council also announced that all aides will be over 55.

The contract to NCSC, along with two other demonstration projects to provide jobs for the elderly, was announced by Pres. Johnson and Labor. Sec. W. Willard Wirtz at a White House ceremony.

The National Council on the Aging of New York City received a $1.1 million grant also to recruit the elderly for part-time public service jobs and the National Farmers Union received $3.4 million to employ seniors on horticultural work in several states.

Unfit Poultry Found In Check of Markets

Twenty percent of chickens not federally inspected were found unfit for human consumption, the Agriculture Dept. reported to Congress after a spot check of retail markets in 16 states.

The survey was cited at House Agriculture subcommittee hearings on legislation to extend federal inspection standards to the 13 percent of poultry now exempt—in somewhat the same manner as the meat inspection law was extended last session to products not sold across state lines.

Dr. George L. Mehren, an assistant secretary of agriculture, said the same 16-state survey also checked on federally-inspected poultry being sold in retail stores. Not a single one of the nearly 500 chickens in the inspected sample showed signs of disease.

The subcommittee also heard a strong plea for expansion of federal inspection from the Meat Cutters, representing 30,000 workers in the poultry and egg industry.

Disease Reduced

Arnold Mayer, the union's legislative representative, said enactment of the poultry inspection law 10 years ago had greatly cut down the incidence of poultry-transmitted diseases among workers as well as safeguarding the health of the consumer.

He urged enactment of compulsory federal inspection of all plants slaughtering or processing poultry for human food.

Mayer asked, however, deletion of one section of the proposed bill that would permit state-inspected plants to ship into interstate commerce.

Even if state inspection is required by law to be "at least equal" to federal inspection, there will be variations in enforcement from state to state and "the tremendous pressures" exerted in a highly competitive industry "will not always be withstood."

Presently, 87 percent of all poultry sold is federally inspected and a large segment of the industry is supporting extension to the remainder.

Mayer strongly opposed a bill by Committee Chairman W. R. Poage (D-Tex.) which would offer federal funds to states that set up their own poultry inspection programs, but would not require them to do so.

Poage took a similar approach to the extension of meat inspection last year and the House initially passed his bill. But under a storm of consumer protest, the Senate adopted a stronger bill and the House went along with it.

NLRB Upholds Union In Time Study Dispute

The National Labor Relations Board has ordered Wilson Athletic Goods Mfg. Co., Inc., to permit a union of its employes at the Springfield, Tenn., plant to make its own time studies of a piecework pay system the company started unilaterally 20 months ago.

The board, disagreeing with a trial examiner, ruled that the information sought by the United Textile Workers of America, Local 233, was not only relevant but necessary to enable the union to make an intelligent decision on whether it should proceed to arbitration.

It is "well settled," a three-member panel of the board said, that the National Labor Relations Act "imposes an obligation on an employer to furnish on request all information relevant to the bargaining representative's intelligent performance" of its job.

In 1965 and 1966, the board decision related, Wilson began eliminating hourly paid work for most of its operations and established standard piece rates for various jobs after time studies.

In changing over from 1965 to 1966 models of Wilson golf bags, management established new piece rates for employes sewing zippers in golf bag pockets. When some employes found their total pay decreasing under the new rates the union filed a formal grievance.

The grievance was processed through the first four steps without being resolved satisfactorily and the union, preparing to ask for arbitration, advised management it did not want to proceed without first being permitted to make its own time studies of the new rates.

Wilson management denied the request on the ground that the union could not derive any "meaningful information" from a new study since the issue was one of contract interpretation. Examiner Eugene F. Frey ruled for the company but the board did not agree.

The time studies requested by the union, the NLRB reasoned, were needed to "police and administer" its contract. It was within the company's power to make such information available to the union, and the facts in the case require Wilson to cooperate with UTWA by making plant facilities available for the study, the board said.

AFL-CIO Clears Merger Of Laborers, Stonecutters

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A merger agreement between the 500,000-member Laborers and the 115-year-old Journeymen Stonecutters was approved here by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

Negotiations between Pres. Joseph V. Moreschi and Sec.-Treas. Peter Fosco of the Laborers, and Pres. Howard L. Henson of the Stonecutters led to the merger pact.

The stone union has some 3,000 members in the U.S. and Canada but large areas of its jurisdiction remain to be organized, the Laborers said. They announced plans for an extensive organizing campaign and a vigorously-supported union label program to encourage the use of union-made products in the construction industry.

Moreschi and Fosco said the merger takes the Laborers a step nearer to the goal of "organizing all employes in the concrete and masonry building materials field." Already a major force in the construction industry and in the production of building materials, the Laborers also seek to amalgamate many smaller unions whose members produce building materials in order to advance joint collective bargaining goals, the two men said in a statement.

The Stonecutters, formally established in 1853 with roots dating back to 1830, became the first craft to win a universal eight-hour day—in 1904. Three years later the union became an AFL affiliate. The Laborers were founded Apr. 13, 1903.

Canadian Unions Ask Network Pact

Ottawa—Three unions representing all performers in Canada's broadcasting industry, some 20,000 workers, have agreed to mutual cooperation in this year's negotiations with the Canadian Broadcasting Corp.

One of the unions, the Musicians, is now negotiating with CBC and the other two, Federation des Auteurs et Artistes and Canadian Television Radio Artists, will open talks in a few weeks.

All three are affiliates of the Canadian Labour Congress and it has pledged full support for their effort to get a greater share of CBC's budget allocated to performers' wages.

Mediators Call Joint Session In Glass Strike

Pres. Lee W. Minton of the Glass Bottle Blowers pledged full cooperation with the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service in their efforts to settle the glass container strike, now in its third week.

William E. Simkin, director of the service, scheduled a Washington meeting with both sides involved in the strike of 35,000 union members.

The strike is against 86 glass container plants east of the Rocky Mountains. They produce 90 percent of the nation's glass container output.

GBBA members continued to work a month after the contracts expired on Jan. 31 in an attempt to negotiate a settlement without a strike.

The union is also negotiating renewal of a National Automatic Machine Dept. contract with all manufacturers including those on the West Coast. That agreement expires. Mar. 1.

FILMED DISCUSSION of issues by Pres. Johnson and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, "Conversation at the White House," was viewed by the COPE Administrative Committee as the federation's Executive Council met in Bal Harbour, Fla. The movie is being shown at all 1968 COPE area conferences.

As Profits, Productivity Rise:

Higher Wages Held Essential To End Lag in Buying Power

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The trade union movement will continue to press for wage increases to offset rising living costs and improve purchasing power convinced that rising productivity and profits make these improvements possible within a relatively stable price level.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, setting out economic policy guidelines, declared that the "lag of real wages and salaries must be ended" and that workers deserve to "share equitably in the gains of the economy's progress."

Sustained economic growth to reach full employment and maintain it can be achieved, the council asserted, through an improved balance in the economy between wages, profits, dividends and other forms of income. The council declared that "rising business profits should be based on expanding sales volume rather than on swollen profit margins at the expense of workers and consumers."

The AFL-CIO reaffirmed its position that if the President determines that there is a national emergency "that warrants extraordinary stabilization measures with even-handed restraints on all costs, prices, profits, dividends, rents, corporate executive compensation as well as employe wages and salaries, he will have the support of the AFL-CIO."

But, it warned, "rigid application of a single 'magic number' based on one economic factor alone" is neither workable nor fair. "We are prepared to sacrifice," the council said, "as much as anyone else, for as long as anyone else, so long as there is equality of sacrifice." (Excerpts Page 7.)

Reviewing the gains and failures of the 1960s to date, the council came to the following conclusions:

- The American economy has the resources to extend and expand social advances at home while meeting requirements in Viet Nam.
- Full employment should be the top priority objective of national economic policy.
- Adoption of a program to create one million public service jobs for the unemployed and seriously under-employed is essential.
- Manpower training programs including literacy education, personal guidance and health rehabilitation are essential to aid the unemployed and under-employed.
- The lag of real wages and salaries must be ended.

On the record of the economy in the 1960s, the council pointed out that the economic advance has

Congress Urged to End Harsh Welfare Limits

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Legislation to remedy the "repressive and inhumane" restrictions on federal aid to families with dependent children received a strong endorsement from the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

Included in last year's amendments to the Social Security Act were a freeze on the number of children in any state who could be helped under the program and a requirement that mothers of small children take jobs or work training.

While labor strongly opposed these restrictions at the time they were being considered by Congress, "the cruel impact . . . on hundreds of thousands of the poorest and most disadvantaged people in America is only now beginning to be fully realized," the council said.

Its statement translated the "complex and technical" amendments, which take effect July 1, into "stark, human terms." (Excerpts, Page 6.)

It means, the council said, that states which cannot bear the additional financial burden themselves "will withdraw support altogether from sizeable numbers of needy children."

They will be forced to "slash assistance payments for those re-

Programs Stress Justice for Workers

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO put a top priority tag on programs to secure economic and social justice for American workers in both the legislative halls and at the collective bargaining table.

The federation's Executive Council spelled out the nature of the battle in a series of statements that stressed the unmet needs and the gaps in welfare, health, minimum wage, occupational safety, housing, the anti-poverty struggle and other areas.

Earlier at its mid-winter session at the Americana Hotel here it had pinpointed the deficiencies in education, civil rights, drug costs and other domestic problems and had geared up for the crucial 1968 elections by launching a register and get-out-the-vote drive.

It had voiced its strong support for Pres. Johnson's policies in Viet Nam and appealed to all workers and the American public to strengthen the President's hand.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at a series of press conferences held during the council sessions made clear his belief that the nation could continue to make progress at home while shouldering the burden of defending freedom in Viet Nam.

He stressed the strength and unity of the federation, pointing to the success of the internal disputes plan in reducing jurisdictional and other disputes and the efforts of all unions in aiding the long and bitter strike of the copper workers.

He made clear also his concern over the critical nature of the 1968 elections and the choice it posed between conservatism and liberalism.

At its concluding sessions the council took these actions on domestic policy:

- Declared that the trade union movement will continue to press for wage increases to offset rising living costs and improve purchasing power, convinced that rising productivity and profits make these improvements possible. (Story, this page.)
- Called the action of the conservative coalition in Congress "economically foolhardy and dangerous" for asking the Administration to slash budget requests before a tax increase is considered. (Story, Page 3.)
- Voiced its support for Pres. Johnson's urban crisis message, his call for full funds for the anti-poverty program and his plans for low and moderate income housing, but regretted the rise in interest rates that is indicated by the program. (Story, Page 4.)
- Urged further improvements in the minimum wage law to extend coverage to all workers, upgrade the pay scale of farm workers and set the wage floor at $2 an hour. (Story, Page 2.)
- Gave strong endorsement to legislation to remedy the "repressive and inhumane" restrictions on federal aid to welfare recipients, particularly families with dependent children, that were imposed with last year's amendments to the Social Security Act. (Story, this page.)
- Called on Congress to undo the damage it inflicted upon the medicaid program by repealing the sharp income restrictions and restoring the original matching grants provisions. (Story, Page 2.)
- Urged "the strongest support from all elements of organized labor" to win passage of the Administration's program for "long overdue" federal standards of job safety and occupational health protection. (Story, Page 2.)
- Voted full support for the President's proposed child health program and urged its extension to furnish health services from the

Senate Outlook Bright For Strong Rights Bill

By David L. Perlman

A strong civil rights bill, including a ban on discrimination in housing, appeared assured of Senate passage—despite a filibuster most observers had predicted would doom the legislation.

The last-minute conversion of Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen virtually guaranteed the two-thirds majority needed to limit debate and permit the Senate to vote on the bill.

Two years ago, Dirksen had helped block Senate action on an even milder bill, and just two weeks ago he was still saying "never" to fair housing legislation.

He had to do some running to catch up with a majority of Senate Republicans who had already—along with more than two-thirds of the Democrats—lined up for cloture on debate and for a fair housing bill.

But explaining to newsmen that he is now "older and wiser," Dirksen quickly reached agreement on a strong open housing provision and turned his back on the hard-core southern segregationist bloc.

Four years ago, in a similar switch, Dirksen joined in helping

Drive Launched to Win Job Safety Standards

Bal Harbour, Fla.—American labor opened a major drive for passage of federal job safety and occupational health legislation.

Action to protect the nation's 75 million workers from job-related hazards is "long overdue," the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

It urged "the strongest support from all elements of organized labor" to push the Administration's bill through Congress.

"The annual death and accident rate is a grisly reminder of national neglect," the council said. "Each year 14,500 workers are killed at their jobs; 2.2 million are injured; 250 million man-days of work, $1.5 billion in wages and more than $5 billion in production are lost."

The Executive Council proposed some strengthening amendments to the Administration bill and stressed the importance of "adequate appropriations" to carry out the goals of the legislation.

If this is done, the council statement said, it will mark "the first historic breakthrough toward the long neglected goal of a safe, healthy work environment for every American holding a job . . . And it will hopefully end an almost unbroken era of inadequate federal and weak, archaic and poorly financed state laws and programs."

As proposed by Pres. Johnson, the legislation would direct the secretary of labor to set mandatory safety and occupational health standards to protect the 50 million workers whose employment affects commerce.

He would have inspection powers, emergency authority to close down unsafe plants and to seek civil or criminal penalties against violators.

The Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare would launch a major research program into occupational illnesses, help train specialists in the field, assist states in setting up programs and work with the Labor Dept. in developing standards.

To strengthen the legislation, the AFL-CIO urged that the law establish a new Center for Occupational Health within the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare—along the lines of the present Center for Air Pollution Control.

The council said the secretary of labor should be specifically authorized to withdraw any delegation of authority to a state that fails to set up and enforce an effective program meeting federal standards.

The statement reiterated the AFL-CIO's long-standing support for "a strong, broad-based" federal job safety and health program. Pres. Johnson's legislative proposal, the council noted, was along the lines urged in resolution adopted at the last two AFL-CIO conventions.

Repeal Sought Of Restrictions On Medicaid

Bal Harbour, Fla. — Congress should undo the damage it did to the medicaid program last year and repeal the sharp income restrictions it imposed, the AFL-CIO Executive Council urged.

The original intent of medicaid, the council noted, "was to provide comprehensive health care to all persons who could not afford it."

The 89th Congress had broadened the medicaid program to make it possible for combined state and federal grants to be used to pay the medical expenses of persons of all ages whose incomes—although above the poverty or public welfare level—were too low to meet the expenses of costly illnesses.

Although sometimes confused by the similarity of names, medicaid is not directly related to the social security medicare program for the elderly.

Last year's amendments, which restricted eligibility to the lowest income groups "broke faith" with states that had tried to do the most in this area, the council charged, and "seriously compromised the program's goals."

The Executive Council statement urged Congress to eliminate all limitations on federal financial participation in state medicaid programs and "at a minimum" to repeal the 1967 amendments and restore the original matching grants provisions.

Distillery Workers Backed in Boycott

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council endorsed the boycott of Stitzel-Weller Co. products as part of the organizational drive of the Distillery Workers and called on all affiliates to give appropriate publicity to the action.

The Distillery Workers have been engaged in a struggle with the Kentucky-based company for over six years over arbitrary rejection of proposals previously accepted in the rest of the industry.

The company produces brand-name bourbons including Old Fitzgerald, Cabin Still, Old Elk, W. L. Weller in addition to countless private label brands.

As UN Conference Nears:

Senate Urged to End Delay, Ratify Human Rights Pacts

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The United States has an obligation to ratify long-pending human rights treaties if it expects to "participate effectively" in the forthcoming United Nations Conference on Human Rights, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

The council pointed out that Pres. Johnson had emphasized that ratification of the treaties was long overdue when he proclaimed 1968 as Human Rights Year. The UN conference is scheduled for April at Teheran, Iran, to mark the 20th anniversary of the proclamation of the Declaration of Human Rights by the UN General Assembly.

Noting that the initial drive for adoption of the declaration was provided by the American labor movement, the council pledged "to do its utmost" to help assure the success of the Teheran conference. (Excerpts Page 7.)

Its statement called on Sen. J. William Fulbright (D-Ark.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, "to cease all further delays" in holding hearings on three pending treaties:

A convention on freedom of association adopted by the Intl. Labor Organization in 1948, and conventions recommended by the UN General Assembly in 1948 and 1957 that condemn the crime of genocide and spell out political rights of women.

Further, the council said, the committee "cannot afford to lose any more time" in favorably reporting out a convention approved by the ILO in 1957 to abolish forced labor, which was the subject of Senate hearings last year.

The council noted that 76 nations have approved the freedom of association convention, 71 have approved the genocide convention, 55 have approved the political rights convention and 79 have approved the convention on forced labor.

Continuing delay by the Senate, which has constitutional responsibility for ratifying these conventions, will place the U.S. "in an entirely unnecessary and dangerously ambiguous position," the council said.

This is so, it said, because the inaction "plays into the hands of slanderers of the U.S. at home and abroad."

Since Americans now enjoy the rights and freedoms provided by each convention, the council continued, no one in the Senate can raise "the question of the so-called sanctity of states' rights as an objection to their ratification."

The statement recalled American labor's "unceasing interest in promoting and preserving human rights," including its action in 1947 "in placing the issue of forced labor before the entire world community." U.S. unions at that time called for a "comprehensive survey" by the ILO of the extent of forced labor and adoption of an up-to-date convention to condemn it, the council noted.

Senate failure to ratify human rights conventions is "especially distressing," the council stated, in view of recent evidence of "massive growth" in the practice of forced labor in Russia, Communist China and other totalitarian nations.

The Teheran conference gives the U.S. government a "unique opportunity," the council pointed out, to take the lead in seeking worldwide implementation of the Intl. Covenant on Human Rights, adopted by the UN general assembly in 1966.

It recommended that the U.S. seek:

- Full implementation of articles in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights declaring that all persons should have "the right to leave any country, including his own," and return, and "the right to seek and enjoy in other countries asylum from persecution."
- Creation of a permanent UN commission on the preservation and promotion of human rights with authority to name observation committees for investigation, surveillance and reporting.
- The elimination by UN members of all barriers among their peoples to the widest circulation of all UN publications, surveys, reports and other documents.
- Enforcement of effective sanctions against "repressive colonialist regimes" in Africa under Portuguese and Spanish administration and in Rhodesia and South Africa.
- Preparation of a program for a more effective solution to all Arab and Jewish refugee problems by ratifying the 1967 Protocol on Refugees which enlarged the scope of the 1951 Refugee Convention.

The Council also urged that the U.S. government include a representative of the AFL-CIO in the U.S. delegation to the Teheran conference.

Political Action Called Key to $2 Wage Floor

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Effective political action is the key to further improvements in the minimum wage law, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared, setting out as immediate objectives extension of the law's coverage to all who work for wages, an upgrading for farm workers and a $2 pay floor.

The council reviewed the improvements voted in the law by the 89th Congress which are still in the process of taking effect and declared "they demonstrate the lasting rewards of effective political action" stemming from the election victory in 1964.

But despite the recent gains, the Fair Labor Standards Act "remains far short of its stated objective of assuring a minimum standard of living necessary for health, efficiency and general well-being of workers."

The $1.60 an hour that went into effect Feb. 1, 1968, "still falls far short of providing adequate support for a family," and for newly covered workers the $1.60 floor will not be reached until 1971. For farm workers the upward movement will stop next year at $1.30 an hour, and "still worse," there are 11 million wage earners who are completely excluded from the law's protection.

Calling for complete coverage and putting farm workers on the same schedule as other workers, the council declared that "the AFL-CIO's objective of a $2 minimum wage can no longer be regarded as a long-range goal; it must be reached as soon as possible."

Noting the recent report by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz to Congress on the impact of the recent increases on the economy, the council stressed his finding that the impact has been "beneficial" and that despite efforts to encourage reports on adverse effects, out of 700,000 newly covered establishments only three plant closings involving 33 workers could be found.

Each wage-hour change "intensifies the importance of effective enforcement," the council said, pledging that the AFL-CIO will continue to press for thorough enforcement by the Labor Dept. and through the federation's state and local central bodies to assist workers to "receive their full due under the terms of the law."

The council deplored the delay in effective coverage for school and hospital workers of state and local governments by litigation initiated by Maryland and other states and expressed its hope that the Supreme Court "will shortly clear the way for effectuation of this much-needed coverage."

Congress Asked to Drop Harsh Welfare Limits

maining on the rolls which, on the average, are 44 percent below the minimum poverty level."

Corrective legislation introduced in the Senate—with 26 co-sponsors—and in the House would:

- Eliminate the "harsh freeze" on the number of children who can be helped. "This is absolutely essential to forestall the most cruel hardship for the poorest of the poor," the council said.
- Exempt from forced participation in work or training mothers of preschool children or children attending school except during their school hours.
- Require all states to make aid available to families with a jobless father living in the home, while maintaining the requirement for fathers to accept suitable employment or training. The council said this would eliminate the so-called "man in the house" rule effective in many states which forces fathers to leave their families to make them eligible for assistance.
- Establish meaningful financial incentives for aid for AFDC recipients to seek training and employment.
- Require payment of the minimum wage for newly-covered workers to those assigned to work programs set up under the new law.

The Executive Council noted that governors of 22 states have "already registered their alarm as to the terrible hardships that will be inflicted on poor children on AFDC in their states when the freeze takes effect."

The council urged Congress "to return to the path of compassion and decency by enacting without delay the corrective legislation now before it."

prenatal period to school age "as a matter of right" for all American families. (Story, this page.)

- Endorsed Project Transition, a program to help prepare veterans to take their place in the economy in good jobs at decent wages. (Story, this page.)
- Pledged its cooperation with the President's program to employ the hard-core unemployed through the National Alliance of Businessmen and its 50-city program.

The council heard a progress report on the NAB program, first set out in a special presidential message to Congress, from Joseph Califano, assistant to Pres. Johnson, and Leo Beebe, executive vice chairman of the business group on leave from Ford Motor Co.

Meany told a news conference that the federation will cooperate in the program, name a labor person to work with the business group at the national level and assure cooperation from central labor bodies in the 50 cities where the program will be concentrated.

In the area of international affairs, the council:

- Pledged "to do its utmost" to help assure the success of the forthcoming United Nations Conference on Human Rights at Teheran, and called on the United States to ratify long-pending human rights treaties to enable the U.S. to "participate effectively" in the conference. (Story, Page 2.)
- Noted that the Intl. Labor Organization, which has received "generous American support" from its earliest days, will observe its 50th anniversary in 1969 and invited the ILO to hold its jubilee conference in the United States. (Story, Page 4.)
- Voted a total of $35,000 to aid South Vietnamese workers through the Vietnamese Confederation of Labor (CVT), including $10,000 for emergency relief to aid victims of the communist offensive. The aid includes $25,000 to purchase vehicles and tractors for use in rice cultivation by cooperatives and for other uses by CVT unions.
- Approved the expenditure of $35,000 to build a labor center in Ethiopia with the help of matching AID funds and $50,000 for impact projects in Africa with $250,000 to be put up by AID. These projects are small, quickly finished undertakings that help workers and members of villages improve their standard of living.

On internal federation affairs, the council:

- Adopted a report setting guidelines for exoneration of affiliates from payment of per capita taxes to the federation. The report declared that good cause for exoneration exists "only when the financial stability of an affiliate has been or will be seriously endangered," and set up machinery to deal with cases as they arise. (Story, Page 4.)
- Received a report showing that the internal disputes plan was operating effectively with over 60 percent of the cases filed settled at the mediation level. (Story, Page 4.)
- Approved a statement calling on all voluntary social service and other agencies to employ union labor, buy only union-made goods and services and recognize the right of their employes to join unions and bargain collectively. (Story, Page 4.)
- Endorsed the boycott of Stitzel-Weller Co. products as part of an organizational drive by the Distillery Workers. (Story, Page 2.)
- Acted on a number of resolutions referred to it by the last convention and referred to a council subcommittee for further study a group of resolutions on the maritime industry. The subcommittee is composed of Vice Presidents John J. Grogan, Paul Hall and Joseph Curran.
- Voted funds to help the work of a number of organizations including the Clergy Economic Conference, Conference of Economic Progress, National Campaign for Agricultural Democracy, U.S. Committee on Refugees, National Council of Senior Citizens, National Committee for the Employment of Youth, National Institute for Rehabilitation & Health, Urban Coalition, CARE, National Housing Conference, Southern Regional Council.

The next meeting of the Executive Council was set for May 13 in Washington.

Child Health Care Termed Family Right

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Child health care, from prenatal services up to school age, should be provided "as a matter of right" to all American families, the AFL-CIO declared.

The federation's Executive Council voted strong support to Pres. Johnson's proposed child health program to furnish health services from the prenatal period through the child's first year for families that otherwise could not afford it.

The council statement noted that the United States—"the richest country in the world"—has dropped to 17th place in infant mortality.

It said the principle reason is that "poor families simply do not have enough money to pay for the health care their children need" and cited Head Start findings that 60 percent of children from low-income families found suffering from chronic ailments had never been treated.

It said the program recommended by the Administration should be extended beyond the first year to include all pre-school children and should not be restricted to low-income families.

Congress Urged to Bar 'Foolhardy' Budget Cuts

Bal Harbour, Fla.—It is "economically foolhardy and dangerous" for the conservative coalition in Congress to call on the Administration for slashes in domestic spending before considering a tax increase, the AFL-CIO declared.

The federation's Executive Council urged Congress to reject the "reactionary appeals" of those who would block social and economic progress and instead to vote full appropriations for authorized programs.

The council reaffirmed labor's position that "America can afford both the defense of freedom in Viet Nam and a meaningful program at home" and that it is "prepared to pay our fair share of the costs of such effort."

The statement recalled the AFL-CIO position on the Administration's income tax surcharge proposal and said labor is convinced that its position on the tax increase "continues to be in the best national interest."

The AFL-CIO has advocated that the surtax rate be made progressive for individuals, that the rate be doubled for corporations, and that it be applied to income not taxed under present law such as interest-free bonds, mineral depletion allowances and the untaxed portion of capital gains.

The council called for defeat of the conservative coalition's drive for across-the-board cuts in federal expenditures, declaring that America's urban crisis, its growing population, its educational needs, its housing shortage, its poverty-stricken citizens and its other pressing problems "demand immediate attention, not avoidance."

Strong Backing Pledged Jobs Plan for Veterans

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council has strongly endorsed Project Transition, to help prepare veterans "to take their place in our economy in good jobs at decent pay."

The council approved the creation of a staff committee to work with the Dept. of Defense to help those veterans leaving the armed forces who have not gained the skills or knowledge that would ready them for a productive return to civilian life.

Steps have already been taken to advise the Dept. of Defense of existing training and apprenticeship programs sponsored by unions, and all AFL-CIO affiliates have been asked to make available openings for returning servicemen in such programs.

Whenever feasible organized labor will attempt to establish special projects in conjunction with the Defense Dept. to help train and place veterans, the council said.

The statement pointed out that 750,000 servicemen are separated from the armed forces each year and that for the most part they find their way back to school or to jobs or other civilian pursuits.

"However, there is a large group of veterans, who for a variety of reasons, have not gained the skills or knowledge which would prepare them for a productive return to the economic life of the country," the council declared.

The council noted the role of the AFL-CIO in helping secure legislation last year to provide sound occupational training opportunities for veterans, and noted the need for a general upgrading of skills in the current labor market. Veterans released from the armed forces without skills and "in many cases without significant work experience" face the likelihood of "prolonged unemployment in an economy which has little need for additional unskilled labor."

Organized labor, said the council, recognizes the "debt it owes the young men and women who are serving in the armed forces" and, in line with its traditional concern for the well-being of the veteran, "is pleased to endorse Project Transition."

PROGRESS REPORT on the National Alliance of Businessmen's program to create jobs for the hard-core unemployed was given by Joseph A. Califano (center), assistant to Pres. Johnson, at the Executive Council meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla. Leo Beebe, executive vice chairman of the business group, also discussed the program with the Council.

ILO Invited to Mark Jubilee At U.S. Parley

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Intl. Labor Organization, which will celebrate its 50th birthday in 1969, has been invited by the AFL-CIO Executive Council to hold its jubilee conference in the United States.

In extending the invitation, the council pointed out that ILO, now a United Nations agency, "has always received generous American support and relied on steadfast dedication of the U.S. labor movement" in pursuing its goals.

These goals, the council noted, are defined in the ILO constitution as elimination of "injustice, hardship and privation to large numbers of people" and "recognition of the principle of freedom of association and the protection of the interests of workers."

"As we approach the ILO Jubilee," the council added, "it is appropriate to recall that Samuel Gompers, the founder of our modern trade union movement, was among the prime movers" in organizing the ILO following World War I.

In urging that the conference be held in the U.S., the council suggested that "the experience of the United States . . . has many valuable lessons to offer" the newly-independent nations where "the task of stimulating economic growth under freedom is of the greatest urgency and magnitude."

New Guidelines Govern Per Capita Exoneration

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council set out guidelines for exoneration of affiliates from payment of per capita taxes to the federation, adopting a report of a special council subcommittee created to study the matter.

The question of exoneration was brought to the council's attention by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany who had a request for continued exoneration of the Rubber Workers. The union had requested and received exoneration of per capita during its strike last year.

"Article XV, Section 8 of the AFL-CIO Constitution authorizes the Executive Council to exonerate any national or international union, organizing committee and directly affiliated local unions from the payment of per capita tax or assessments due the AFL-CIO if, upon a proper showing made to it, the Executive Council concludes that 'good cause' exists from such exoneration.

"Your committee believes that the phrase 'good cause,' as used in the Constitution, needs the refinement of interpretation so that affiliates may better judge if it might be appropriate for them to request such exoneration. To that end your committee recommends to the council that it declare 'good cause' to exist only when the financial stability of an affiliate has been or will be seriously endangered because of heavy financial loss or because of unusually heavy and necessary expenditures required to be made by it in the performance of its legitimate objectives as a labor organization and exoneration is a necessary, important and effective aid to such affiliate.

"Your committee further recommends that the Executive Council adopt as policy a procedure under which all requests for exoneration be first considered by the president of the AFL-CIO or by an ad hoc committee appointed by him for that express purpose and that the president or the ad hoc committee, as the case may be, thereafter recommend to the Executive Council whether, in his or its opinion, good causes exist for exoneration."

'67 Rise in Joblessness Found in Most Countries

Geneva, Switzerland—The year 1967 was not a good year for most of the workers of the world.

Unemployment went up both in the industrialized countries and in those in the development stage, and while there were wage boosts they did not contribute much more to buying power than compensate for a drop in the work week and increases in the cost of living.

"In most industrialized countries," said the annual report of the Intl. Labor Organization "the slackening of economic expansion or the extreme slowness of recovery was translated into a drop in employment and a rise in unemployment. . . . In the developing countries, information, though still incomplete, testified that the situation is not improving. The growing excess of manpower is far from being absorbed."

The report said unemployment rose in almost all of the industrialized countries, in some cases reaching the highest levels since the end of World War II. Employment dropped in one country out of two, and where increases were reported the climb was generally slower than during 1966.

Employment in manufacturing industries dropped in 15 of the 27 countries for which statistics are available. This included the United States and Canada where the general level of employment went up. The ILO said that manufacturing employment in the United States reached a high of 19,640,000 in October of 1966 but by October 1967 this had dropped by 250,000.

Agriculture and mining, notably coal mining, the report said, continued to drop in the majority of industrialized countries.

Unemployment ,the ILO said, rose in 30 countries during 1967. West Germany, Finland, Luxembourg and New Zealand showed a doubling of joblessness while Belgium, France, Greece, Norway, the Netherlands and Sweden showed an increase of more than 30 percent.

Young workers, women and aged persons were affected most.

The cost of living rose by more than 10 percent or more in six countries—Argentina, Brazil, Chile, the Congo, Indonesia and Uruguay. Prices more than doubled in Indonesia with prices in Uruguay going up almost as much. In 31 countries, including the United States and Canada, prices went up between 3 and 5 percent. In the United States they rose 3.1 percent over the year.

Mediation Held Successful in Disputes Cases

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO internal disputes plan is operating effectively with over 60 percent of the cases filed settled at the mediation level, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany reported to the Executive Council.

Since the plan went into effect 739 cases have been filed (through Feb. 10, 1968) with 443 settled by mediation and 11 cases presently in the mediation stage.

Of the 258 determinations by the impartial umpires set up under the plan, violations of the plan have been found in 180 cases. Of the 85 appeals from the determinations received by a subcommittee of the Executive Council, 68 were denied and eight referred to the council.

There were 43 complaints of non-compliance with the determinations of the impartial umpires and compliance was achieved in 23 cases, non-compliance found in 12, six were withdrawn and two cases are pending.

Sanctions required by the plan are in effect on five affiliates: Air Line Pilots Association, National Maritime Union, Brotherhood of Railroad Signalmen, Switchmen's Union of North America, Intl. Typographical Union.

Arkansas Adopts Minimum Wage

Little Rock, Ark. — Arkansas finally joined the list of states with a minimum wage law covering both men and women — a major goal of the State AFL-CIO for many years.

The new law, signed by Gov. Winthrop Rockefeller (R), gets off to a modest start next January, with a $1-an-hour pay floor. It rises to $1.10 the following year and $1.20 the third year. Some 50,000 workers in establishments with five or more employes, who are not covered by the federal wage-hour law, will benefit.

When it takes effect, the new law will replace a 1915 statute that guaranteed $1.25 a day — not an hour—for experienced women.

Action Pressed on Housing:

LBJ's Urban Goals Hailed by Council

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council hailed Pres. Johnson's "determination to build the housing America needs so desperately" and praised the intent of the President's legislative program to meet the crisis of the cities.

At the same time, the council pressed for congressional action on an even broader front to provide jobs, public facilities and services for people living in city slums.

The President's message to Congress sounded a "clear and urgent warning" that "there is no time to lose" if the decay of the cities is to be halted.

It called for a 10-year program to build 26 million new homes and apartments—20 million of these with private money. Federal interest subsidies would bring the housing within reach of both low and moderate-income families, Johnson proposed.

In other sections of the message, the President asked Congress to vote the full amount authorized for the anti-poverty program, stepped-up appropriations for model city grants, a fair housing law, and an array of other federal programs.

The Executive Council expressed its dissent from one of the President's recommendations—to lift the present 6 percent interest ceiling on FHA and veterans' mortgages and permit the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development to set a higher rate.

The council termed the overall program outlined in Johnson's message "challenging and eminently worthwhile."

Since specifics of the legislation weren't available, the council expressed support for the President's program "in its broad sense," but said the AFL-CIO would reserve detailed comment for testimony before Congress.

The council went on immediate record, however, on three specific areas of the message:

- To support "with all vigor" the President's plea for the full level of appropriations for the anti-poverty program—$2.18 billion.
- To endorse the President's determination to build 6 million publicly assisted low and moderate income housing units over the next 10 years. It noted the President's determination to get 75,000 already authorized units started this year and called it "a big forward step."
- To oppose a further increase in interest rates indicating "regret" that the President's proposals would have the inevitable result of boosting rates. "We do not believe that higher interest rates are going to produce the urgently needed acceleration of low and moderate income housing."

Johnson proposed a series of new approaches in an effort to induce private enterprise to finance a large-scale housing program which will enable low-income families to buy homes as well as rent apartments.

To encourage a flow of private capital into low and moderate income housing, the President asked Congress to authorize "national housing partnerships" under a federally chartered corporation to spread the risks.

Johnson also proposed a new form of federally-guaranteed financing for new communities built by private capital, along with a greater federal contribution to the construction of public facilities to serve these "new towns."

Social Agencies Warned On Anti-Union Policies

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO called on voluntary social service and other agencies to "practice what they preach" and to employ union labor, use union-made goods and services and recognize the right of their employes to join unions and bargain collectively.

The Executive Council adopted a statement noting the long relationship between these agencies and organized labor and the important financial support and active participation by trade unions.

This relationship stems from the common concern of the agencies and the trade union movement for the "well-being of the total community and its citizens, including AFL-CIO members and their families," the council said.

"It is with regret," the council noted, that labor finds some of the agencies fail to live up to their goals. They deny their workers the right to join organizations of their own choosing for bargaining purposes, employ non-union labor for building and construction work and purchase non-union goods and services. This is true of enough of the agencies "to present a problem," the council declared.

Calling on the agencies to respect union goals and objectives, the council requested that all central labor bodies refer all requests to boycott all such agencies involved in local labor disputes to the Dept. of Community Services and directed the department to intervene with the agencies to reach a satisfactory and speedy resolution of the problem.

The council action came after consideration of a resolution referred to it by the convention dealing with a union-agency dispute.

Higher Wages Called Vital to Buying Power

failed to provide enough jobs for a rapidly growing labor force, particularly for most disadvantaged job seekers among teenagers, Negroes and unskilled workers.

The benefits of the economy's performance have not been shared equitably, with a disproportionately greater share going to business and wealthy families, the council said.

The price level has been rising in recent years, it pointed out, regardless of what happened to labor costs per unit of production. Between 1960 and 1965 unit labor costs fell but wholesale prices rose, and when workers sought to catch up with rising living costs in the past two years "business raised prices at a faster pace to maintain enlarged profit margins."

The council warned of the danger of restrictive monetary policies being pursued in 1968 despite the fact that unemployment persists and industry is operating at only 85 percent of capacity. It noted that similar policies in 1966 contributed to the slowdown for part of 1967.

Address List Ordered:

New Remedies Set In 'Runaway' Case

The National Labor Relations Board has fashioned a series of "remedies" to give the Ladies' Garment Workers an opportunity to organize a swimsuit manufacturer who illegally "ran away" to avoid the union.

The firm, the Garwin Corp., closed its New York plant in 1963, discharged its employes and hired new workers in Miami, Fla., where it reopened under the name S'Agaro, Inc.

The NLRB in a unanimous decision in 1965 found that the firm had hastily and without advance consultation with ILGWU Local 57 closed its operations and fled "to deprive" employes of bargaining rights.

The board ordered reinstatement of the former workers with backpay or compensation for losses until they had found other employment of comparable status.

It further ordered Garwin's successor company to bargain with the ILGWU, temporarily at least, for the employes at the Florida plant.

This part of the order, however, was refused enforcement by the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

The court said that the requirement to bargain would deprive the new Florida employes of their freedom to select their own bargaining agent or, if they chose, to have none.

The case was remanded to the board for "further consideration" of this aspect of its remedy. Five months later the U.S. Supreme Court denied review petitions of the case filed by the board, the ILGWU and the employer.

In reconsidering the case, the board observed that its task was largely what it was earlier—"devising effective remedies in this and other cases involving the unlawful removal of a plant to a distant site."

The question before it, the board said, was to adopt remedies that would offset "massive unfair labor practices" in a case where its bargaining order had been denied by the courts.

The board then unanimously directed the firm to:

- Furnish the ILGWU, upon request within one year, the names and addresses of all employes at its Florida plant and keep the list current for one year.
- Grant the union, within a month, access to "its bulletin board and all places where notices are customarily posted for a period of one year."
- Permit employes to have access to union organizers on plant parking lots and plant approaches during nonworking hours.
- Bargain with the ILGWU "upon proof that a majority of employes" at the Florida plant "have designated the union as their representative."

The decision, the board concluded, will remove "imbalances" created by the firm's illegal practices and diminish its opportunity "to achieve the benefits of unlawful conduct."

PICKET LINE COFFEE BREAK is taken by members of Auto Workers Local 174, outside the Detroit plant of the American Brass Co., a subsidiary of Anaconda Copper Co., the site of a bloody beating of union organizers 30 years ago. The pickets are among members of 26 international unions engaged in the showdown struggle with major non-ferrous metals producers.

Montreal Bank Union Votes to Join OPEIU

Montreal—A union reported to be the largest independent union of bank employes in North America has voted to affiliate with the Office & Professional Employes.

The affiliation came after OPEIU helped tellers, clerks and junior accountants at 77 offices of the Montreal City & District Savings Bank win recognition and a first contract. Bank employes ratified the agreement, a 30-month contract providing increases of $1,150 to $2,575 for 1,080 workers.

The same bank's 110 accountants and assistant accountants formed their own local and then agreed to affiliate also with OPEIU, which is helping negotiate a separate contract for them.

OPEIU Pres. Howard Coughlin said the new union was certified by the Canada Labor Relations Board last Oct. 13. When management balked at a contract, the independent called on OPEIU for help. Local Pres. Charles Bilodeux reported: "We will now be the best-paid bank employes in Canada."

New salary rates range from $3,800 to start to a top of $10,000 a year for employes below the accountant category.

Aerospace Workers Press Goals Keyed to 'Substantial' Wage Hike

By Eugene A. Kelly

Los Angeles—The Auto Workers and the Machinists set joint goals for bargaining with big aircraft and space vehicle manufacturers this year and served notice they will not be sidetracked by management foot-dragging or government intervention in the bargaining process.

Some 550 delegates unanimously approved a program designed to win a "very substantial wage adjustment" for 450,000 aerospace workers in the U.S. and Canada; a substantial additional adjustment for the skilled trades along with wage equalization for Canadian Machinists and Auto Workers, and major improvements in pensions, health care, income security and union shop provisions.

Both IAM Pres. P. L. Siemiller and UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther assured the delegates at the ratification meeting that neither a work stoppage or federal intervention will be necessary if the companies bargain in good faith. If they do not, both unions are prepared to back their aerospace members with every resource available, they agreed.

The program draft as approved pointed out that "contrary to the assertions of the Council of Economic Advisers, we do not believe that our wage demands are inflationary." It declared:

"We believe that they are fair and justified in accordance with the needs of aerospace workers."

The conference said "we strongly resent and reject the assertions that aerospace unions must dilute and temper their demands for justified wage adjustments while aerospace managements continue to amass profits without any restrictions whatever."

Despite the prevalence of cost-of-living clauses, "aerospace workers have not shared in the growing wealth of this nation as have millions of others," the conference said. It cited "an obvious need for a very substantial wage adjustment" to meet the basic economic needs of aerospace industry workers and to "bring them on a par with their brothers in other industries."

Other Goals

Besides increases in take-home pay, union negotiators in 1968 will "seek creation of opportunities for workers to learn more and hence to earn more." They listed these objectives among others:

- Improved cost-of-living provisions and incorporation of existing payments into base rates.
- A substantial wage adjustment for skilled workers, applied through the labor grade wage structure in a manner that will truly reflect the skills required to perform the individual job.
- Correction of inequities based on local needs.

The conference called for health benefit coverage for the worker and his family with full payment of premiums by the employer; coverage for laid-off employes and their dependents, along with disabled employes, retirees and their survivors.

In the pension area, the conferees declared a major contribution to retirement security could be made if "portability" could be provided so that pension credits could be transferred from one company to another as a worker moves. They called on major companies to join the unions in devising a "practical scheme of pension portability."

The delegates agreed that all aerospace contracts must be amended to provide for a basic uniform plan of supplementary unemployment benefits (SUB) with adequate funding. They called also for income savings plans to give workers additional income security.

The delegates voted to support the 60,000 workers on strike against the copper industry and urged local groups to "adopt" a needy striker. Also they called for an immediate start on voter registration drives among labor families as a related part of the bargaining and organizing process. Before the meeting, Siemiller and Reuther addressed standing-room-only meetings held separately for area workers.

Aerospace contracts start expiring Mar. 31 at Hayes Intl. Corp., Birmingham, Ala., for the UAW and Apr. 19 for the IAM at Lockheed Electronics Co., Los Angeles. Fifty others are due for renegotiation by Dec. 4.

Steelworkers Wrap Up Pacts In Can Industry

The Steelworkers completed bargaining in the nation's can industry by winning new three-year contracts for 3,500 workers at National Can Corp. and 1,500 employes of Crown Cork & Seal Co.

The new pacts, negotiated in Washington and ratified by the union's can industry conference, contain the same economic benefits won in earlier contracts at American Can Co. and Continental Can Co., a USWA spokesman said.

Workers will get wage boosts ranging from 40 to 49 cents an hour over three years, improved pensions, insurance and hospital care coverage, holidays, and other gains.

The union also won a key objective when all of the companies agreed to revised rates in an industry job manual. This will give a large number of employes in skilled trades an added 8.5 cents an hour in the first contract year.

USWA said it also gained another important objective, a common contract expiration date, Feb. 14, 1971, at all four companies. Previously, National and Crown Cork contracts lagged 30 days behind experation dates at American and Continental.

Thompson Vows Continued Effort To Curb Employers 'Flouting' Law

Charlotte, N.C.—Congress must continue to seek a way to "deter the handful of employers" who openly flout the nation's labor laws, the chairman of a House Labor subcommittee told 500 unionists at a rally here.

"We do not yet have a solution but I for one intend to keep up the search," Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.) said at a southern regional conference called by the Textile Workers Union of America.

Thompson was repeatedly cheered by a crowd that included a large delegation of workers from plants of J. P. Stevens Co., Inc., which has repeatedly been found in flagrant violation of the federal labor relations act. There were five standing ovations for Thompson, and heavy applause for other speakers including TWUA Pres. William Pollock, COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan and Organizational Dir. Nicholas Zonarich of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Congress is not backing the promise it made in the labor act "when we permit a five-year lag between discharge and reinstatement" of the workers fired by employers like Stevens, Thompson declared. He charged further that backpay awards to the fired workers do not compensate them "for the misery and heartbreak of forced unemployment."

Pollock told the audience that Stevens, which was compelled by the courts to call back 72 of the many workers it fired for joining the union, makes a major issue of the fact that it has not yet lost an election to the union.

"The Mafia has never lost an election either," he commented.

Barkan and Zonarich spelled out the necessity for a vigorious labor effort in the fields of organizing, bargaining, and political action.

Thompson called the Stevens Co. a "bad loser" and declared "it doesn't look any less like a loser because its champions" in the House "keep crying foul."

In 1966 the National Labor Relations Board, after four years of litigation, found the company guilty of "massive and deliberate unfair labor practices . . . in its successful efforts to frustrate organization by its employes."

The NLRB decided that Stevens, a major government supplier of textile materials, had unlawfully:

- Discharged 71 employes and discriminated against two others to to smash a union organizing drive.
- Made at least 23 threats of reprisal and promises of benefit to employes.
- Engaged in at least 17 illegal interrogations of employes about their union activities.
- Posted threatening notices on plant bulletin boards.

A three-judge Court of Appeals decision unanimously upheld the ruling, and the Supreme Court refused to review it, Thompson recalled.

Punishing the Poor

THE AMENDMENTS to the Social Security Act passed late last year include a number of harsh and punitive measures aimed at poor mothers and children receiving Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC). Although the Senate voted to remove most of the worst features of the legislation, almost all were reinserted in the final bill by the Senate-House Conference Committee on the insistence of Congressman Wilbur Mills, chairman of the House Ways & Means Committee. The cruel impact these ill-considered and backward provisions will have on hundreds of thousands of the poorest and most disadvantaged people in America is only now beginning to be fully realized.

By far the worst feature of the new amendments is the absolute freeze established on the number of children in fatherless families whose assistance payments can continue to be partially met by federal funds. This provision limits federal reimbursement to the states for assistance payments for children in need because of a parent's absence from the home (by reason of desertion, illegitimacy, separation or divorce) for any quarter after June 30, 1968, to the same proportion of the total child population as existed in the quarter beginning on January 1, 1968.

Just to state the provision demonstrates how complex and technical it is.

In stark, human terms, it means that after July 1, 1968, states, unable to bear the additional financial burden themselves, will withdraw support altogether from sizeable numbers of needy children and their parents, slash assistance payments for those remaining on the rolls which, on the average, are 44 percent below the minimum poverty level, or both. This freeze will take its toll in the hunger and misery of millions of needy children.

Those responsible for enactment of the freeze insisted that establishment of mandatory work or training programs for adults, principally mothers on AFDC, and day care facilities for their children would make possible drastic cutbacks in welfare rolls. Thus, in House debate on final passage, Congressman Mills said that the freeze "is there to get the states to act on the other provisions of the bill requiring them to do something to reduce dependency and to take people off welfare who should not be there. It is as simple as that."

But the real facts are not "simple" at all, nor do they support the assumption of Congressman Mills. There is not the slightest possibility that any significant number of mothers will be placed in work or training programs, which must start from scratch, or children in day care, which does not now exist, by July 1 of this year when the freeze takes effect.

These are only the worst of the provisions of the 1967 amendments. They all add up to legislation aimed at punishing the poor for their own poverty and depriving them of any incentive for employment or training except the pangs of hunger.

The punitive measures against welfare recipients Congress enacted last year are contrary to the fundamental principles of humanity and justice which have always marked America as a nation. We ask the Congress to return to the path of compassion and decency by enacting without delay the corrective legislation now before it.

Council Asks Stronger Laws:

Big Drug Producers Accused Of Profiteering, Price Gouging

Excerpts from statement on drugs adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, at Bal Harbour, Fla., Feb. 19, 1968:

THERE IS NOT a major industry in the United States that is more socially irresponsible than the large pharmaceutical manufacturers who promote the sale of brand name prescription drug products.

Specially excluded from this charge are the many reputable small FDA-certified drug manufacturers who produce a quality product and market these products under competitive conditions by their generic or official names.

In contrast to these smaller companies, the major brand name pharmaceutical manufacturers spend about $600 million a year or $3,000 per year per prescribing doctor to influence doctors to prescribe by brand name.

Studies conducted by the Food and Drug Administration clearly indicate the record for purity and effectiveness of generic drugs is about the same, and, if anything, slightly superior to the record of brand name products.

But the advertising pays off. A great majority of physicians prescribe by brand name and the patient has to buy the expensive brand name drug. Organized medicine itself, takes no responsibility for evaluating the relative effectiveness of drugs. Drug advertising revenues are an important part of the total budget of the American Medical Association as well as for its publications.

The result is gouging of the customer.

The hardest hit victims of the price gouging are the chronically ill aged whose continuing need for drugs may cost them as much as $500 or more per year.

The 1962 Amendments to the Food & Drug Act greatly strengthened the authority of the Food & Drug Administration to require proof of the effectiveness of drugs as well as proof of their purity and safety.

Yet, the law is not as strong as it should be. The 1962 amendments gave the FDA authority to require proof of the effectiveness of drugs, but not the authority to compare the effectiveness of different drugs used in treating the same disease. This weakness allows the major pharmaceutical manufacturers to promote so-called "new" drugs, protected by patents, where well established old drugs, not so protected, are, in fact, more effective.

While the charge of exploitation and profiteering is a serious one, the charge of social irresponsibility is even more serious. After due consideration of the testimony given before the Monopoly Subcommittee of the Senate Select Committee on Small Business chaired by Sen. Nelson, the AFL-CIO charges the major pharmaceutical manufacturers with betraying the public interest by:

- Promoting the sale of "new" patented drugs which are less effective than established drugs not so protected.
- Promoting the widespread sale of drugs of unproven clinical value thereby endangering the lives of persons afflicted with conditions for which there would be an effective cure if they were treated with available effective drugs.
- Promote over-use of drugs, particularly anti-biotics, in spite of the accompanying danger of the development of resistant strains of disease organisms.
- Promoting the sale of drugs having serious side effects when there are equally effective, less toxic drugs available.
- Promoting the sale of drugs which have dangerous side effects for minor conditions that do not require drug therapy.
- Confusing the practicing physician with a multiplicity of over 18,000 trade names.

THE AMERICAN PEOPLE will never accept their health as a legitimate area for commercial exploitation. The AFL-CIO Executive Council therefore calls upon Congress to pass legislation which would:

1. Include prescription drugs under medicare, provide for a national drug formulary and limit reimbursement for drugs under any federal program to the price for the generic or official product along the lines of the bills introduced by Senators Long (La.) and Montoya. The AFL-CIO favors strengthening these proposals by requiring all physicians to prescribe by generic name in all cases where there is no question of therapeutic equivalency.

2. Extend the authority of the Food & Drug Administration beyond merely evaluating the effectiveness of drugs to comparing the relative effectiveness of drugs and provide for the distribution of such information.

3. Reduce the price of drugs now kept high under patents owned by single manufacturers or shared only with an exclusive small group.

4. Amend the patent laws to reduce the number of years a drug may be granted a monopoly.

Executive Council Stresses:

Economy Has Ability to Meet Both Military, Social Needs

The following is excerpted from the AFL-CIO Executive Council statement on the national economy adopted Feb. 23, 1968, at Bal Harbour, Fla.

1. WE REITERATE our conviction that the American economy has the resources to extend and expand social advances at home while meeting military requirements in Viet Nam. The cost of the war should not be absorbed by cutting back or freezing essential federal programs for domestic progress. The great productive ability of the American economy can provide the foundation for both continued social progress at home and an honorable settlement of the war in Viet Nam.

The expected sharp rise in the government's administrative budget deficit in fiscal years 1968 and 1969, due to military expenditures, can be reduced, without mounting pressures on interest rates and the availability of money and credit. A temporary war surtax is needed to reduce the amount of money the government will have to borrow in the money market and to eliminate the threat to home-building and related industries from tight money and higher interest rates.

The needed temporary surtax should be based on ability to pay, including taxation of personal and corporate income that escapes taxation through major loopholes in the tax structure. The surcharge on corporations should be at least twice as great as on personal income. The surcharge on personal income should be clearly set on the basis of ability to pay. Corporate and personal income, excluded from taxation by tax loopholes, should be subjected to at least the same tax rate as the surcharge.

2. We insist that the top-priority objective of national economic policy should be to achieve and sustain full employment—jobs at decent wages, for all people who are able to work and desire employment. The demand for goods and services from consumers, government and business must expand sufficiently to provide enough new job opportunities for the unemployed, for the great numbers of entrants into the labor force and for those displaced by spreading automation. The federal government's tax, expenditure and monetary policies, in combination, should encourage the necessary expansion of demand to achieve and maintain full employment.

3. Adoption of a program to create one million public service jobs for the unemployed and seriously under-employed is essential—along the lines of the bill introduced by Congressman O'Hara of Michigan. Such a decisive measure to create jobs in socially useful work—to perform much needed services that would not otherwise be done in parks, playgrounds, hospitals and other public facilities—is urgently needed.

4. Manpower training programs — including basic literacy education, personal guidance and health rehabilitation—are essential to aid the unemployed and under-employed to compete more effectively for available employment. Although such programs do not create jobs, they can be of great benefit to the national economy, as well as the workers themselves, by upgrading the skills of the unemployed and unskilled.

The recent emphasis on government-financed business programs to train workers should not include wage subsidies or other payments to the employer beyound the extra cost of providing special training and supportive services for the hard-core unemployed, that are in addition to his normal training costs. Even the best-planned training programs, however, can be of little avail, if they are not accompanied by government programs to create jobs and achieve full employment.

5. The lag of real wages and salaries must be ended. A substantial rise in the buying power of wages, salaries and fringe benefits is needed to provide wage and salary earners with a fair share of economic progress and to strengthen consumer markets that are the foundation of the American economy. Only through an improved balance in the economy—between wages, profits, dividends and other forms of income—can there be assurance of sustained economic growth to reach full employment and maintain it.

Rising business profits should be based on an expanding sales volume—rather than on swollen profit margins at the expense of workers and consumers.

We will continue to press for wage and salary increases to offset rising living costs and to advance buying power. We firmly believe that wage and salary earners deserve to share equitably in the gains of the economy's progress. The nation's rapidly rising productivity and great profitability of business make possible such improvements in wages, salaries and fringe benefits within the context of a relatively stable price level.

We repeat again, as we have in the past two years: If the President determines that there is a national emergency that warrants extraordinary stabilization measures—with even-handed restraints on all costs, prices, profits, dividends, rents, corporate executive compensation (salaries, bonuses and stock options), as well as employes' wage and salaries—he will have the support of the AFL-CIO.

But rigid application of a single "magic number" based on one economic factor alone, cannot be a workable or fair means of wage determination in a country of continental size, with thousands of different markets, industries and occupations.

We are prepared to sacrifice—as much as anyone else, for as long as anyone else—so long as there is equality of sacrifice.

'Long Overdue':

Human Rights Pacts Demand Ratification

The following is excerpted from the AFL-CIO Executive Council statement on the Intl. Human Rights Conference adopted Feb. 23, 1968, at Bal Harbour, Fla.

IN HIS FORMAL proclamation of 1968 as Human Rights Year, Pres. Johnson emphasized that U. S. ratification of human rights treaties was long overdue. This ratification is all the more urgent because, otherwise, our government will not be able to participate effectively in the United Nations Conference on Human Rights to be held in Teheran next April.

American labor has had an unceasing interest in promoting and preserving human rights. Devoted to this course, the AFL-CIO Executive Council strives to do its utmost to help assure the success of this historic conference which marks the 20th anniversary of the proclamation of the Declaration of Human Rights by the U. N. Assembly.

The Executive Council calls upon Chairman Fulbright of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to cease all further delays in holding hearings on the ratification of the remaining human rights treaties—as strongly urged by the late Pres. Kennedy and Pres. Johnson.

The Foreign Relations Committee must realize that it is no credit to our country that the U. S. is not one of the 71 nations which have approved the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genodice that was unanimously recommended, on December 9, 1948, by the UN General Assembly for ratification by member states; the U. S. is not one of the 79 nations which have approved the Convention concerning the Abolition of Forced Labor; the U. S. is not among the 76 nations which have approved the Convention on Freedom of Association; and the U. S. is not among the 55 nations which have already approved the Convention on the Political Rights of Women.

Since the American people as a whole now enjoy the rights, freedoms and standards provided by these Conventions, no member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee can, at this very late date, raise the question of the so-called sanctity of states' rights as an objection to their ratification.

THE TEHERAN CONFERENCE provides our government with a unique opportunity to take the lead in seeking concrete worldwide implementation of the International Covenant on Human Rights which was adopted by the U. N. General Assembly in December 1966 . The AFL-CIO Executive Council urges our government to take the initiative in proposing that the Teheran Conference take positive steps for implementing:

- Article 13(2) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which provides that "Everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own, and to return to his country."
- Article 14(1) which provides that "Everyone has the right to seek and enjoy in other countries asylum from persecution."
- The creation of more effective safeguards against the violation of human rights by establishing a Permanent UN Commission on the Preservation and Promotion of Human Rights, with authority to appoint Human Rights Observation Committees endowed with the rights and powers of investigation, surveillance and reporting.
- The elimination by the UN Member States of all legal, political administrative and police barriers to the widest freedom of circulation among their peoples of all UN publications, surveys, reports and other documents acted upon by the General Assembly or any of its subdivisions.
- Enforcement of effective sanctions against repressive colonialist regimes in the African territories under Portuguese and Spanish administration, in Rhodesia, and South Africa.
- Preparation of a program for a more effective solution of all refugee problems (Arab and Jewish alike) by ratifying the October 4, 1967 Protocol on Refugees which enlarged the scope of the 1951 Refugee Convention.

Finally, we urge our government to include a representative of the AFL-CIO in the U. S. delegation to the Teheran Conference.

Public Interest Stressed:

Tight Anti-Trust Reins Urged To Curb Newspaper Mergers

EXEMPTING newspaper mergers from the federal anti-trust laws would harm both advertisers and readers, a top newspaper union official declared as he urged Congress to reject the proposal.

Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson of the Newspaper Guild, charged that the proposed Failing Newspaper Act, now pending in the Senate, would "encourage and accelerate the trend toward monopoly and chain-owner domination of the nation's newspaper industry." He said experience shows that "as the papers become monopolies, rates go up and news content goes down." He made the statements on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Radio Network.

Farson rejected the contention that high operating costs and stiff competition from other media make it impossible for independent newspapers to survive as profitable businesses. "The fallacy that newspapers are marginal operations—that they are not making profits—is one that the general public and some of the people in the industry have swallowed," he said.

But, he pointed out, the president of the American Newspaper Publishers Association recently announced that " the nation's daily papers are in a state of unprecedented economic vigor, and the economic well-being of the newspaper business has never been better."

FARSON URGED that so-called "failing newspapers" be required to offer themselves to the public at a fair market price before they are allowed to sell out to a competing newspaper. "Maybe a new management could make a success of it; maybe somebody else would like to try it," he said.

Such a requirement, he asserted, would protect both "the public and the business community, by assuring an opportunity for a competing firm to run a newspaper. And if both of the newspapers can make money, the community is going to be a lot better off."

Reporters questioning Farson on the AFL-CIO produced program were Kenneth Crawford, contributing editor and columnist for Newsweek magazine, and William Eaton, Washington correspondent for the Chicago Daily News.

BOTH ADVERTISERS and the public will suffer if newspaper mergers are exempted from federal anti-trust laws, Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson (center) of the Newspaper Guild declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were William Eaton (left) of the Chicago Daily News and Kenneth Crawford of Newsweek magazine. The public affairs interview is heard Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on Mutual radio.

How to Buy:

Private Brand Shopping Offers Big Savings on Canned Goods

By Sidney Margolius

STORES' OWN BRANDS of packaged and canned foods on the average cost 17 percent less than nationally-advertised brands in small-size containers, and 20 percent in large sizes.

Savings on household cleaners are even larger, averaging 40 percent on some widely-used products.

Using the combined money-saving techniques of selecting (1) private brands, (2) the larger sizes, and (3) the less-fancy versions, you can cut the cost of some advertised items in half.

These are several of the findings in this column's latest survey of private brands vs. national brands. The survey checked prices in five large consumer co-ops and chain supermarkets in three large cities and two small towns in the New York area, Washington, D. C., San Francisco Bay area, and Hanover, N. H.

Some interesting price differences were found for basically the same foods. In the case of peas, for example, the range was from a little over a penny an ounce for stores' own brands of mixed-size peas in a large can, to 2.5 cents an ounce for June peas in a small-size national brand.

While the survey did not cover all types of food, among those priced the largest savings were on canned vegetables, noodles and spaghetti, crackers, margarine, salad dressing, peanut butter, non-fat dry milk and flour. Savings were found to be smaller, although still worthwhile, on canned fruits, syrups and coffee.

The dramatic differences between private and national-brand cleaning products shows how overpriced the heavily-advertised detergents and specialty products really are. You find such examples as CO-OP low-sudsing detergent selling for almost half the price of the leading national brand of that type. The small can of a famous brand of spray furniture wax costs 2.5 times as much as the large can of a leading chain store's own brand.

Our survey found private brands almost always cheaper than national brands except sometimes for canned fruits and juices. But even among the private brands prices vary. For example, one store's own brand of nonfat milk powder may save as much as 30 percent over a national brand. But another store's may save only 10 percent.

While 10 percent is worthwhile, it does pay to compare private brands of different retailers in your area. Another study, two years ago, reported by Don Lefever, grocery supervisor for District of Columbia area co-ops, found the same list of house brands cost $10.78; $11.57; $12.17; and $12.18 at four different stores, compared to $13.71 for the same list in national brands.

HOW GOOD are private brands? They usually are good quality, packed for the retailers according to specifications, and sometimes processed in retailers' own factories. Often, in fact, the private brands are the same as the national brands with different labels.

This identical quality even has been the subject of court cases. We've reported before that Borden's was told to stop charging retailers more for canned milk of "like grade and quality" sold under its own name, than it charged for milk sold under retailers' labels. In the "Florida Beverage" case, the courts also found that the private label and nationally-advertised liquors sold by this distributor were of like grade and quality. Only difference was the different labels, Francis Mayer of the Federal Trade Commission, has pointed out.

Soup to Nonsense:

Johnny Can, Too, Write—But You'll Have to Pay by the Word

By Jane Goodsell

A MOTHER I KNOW went to San Francisco for a week, leaving her two teen-age daughters at home to take care of each other. During her seven-day sabbatical, she telephoned home twice to make sure her girls were getting along all right, and every day she wrote them a long, chatty letter, describing the sights she had seen, meals she had eaten, and friends she had visited, adding a postscript or two reminding them to be sure to take out the garbage and not to forget to feed the cat.

When my friend returned home — a day earlier than she had originally planned because she felt guilty about deserting her children and feared that they might be lonesome — she leafed through the pile of mail that had accumulated during her absence.

Among other things, she found three letters she had written to her daughters—unopened.

The girls were embarrassed, as well they might be, although they tried their best to explain how it happened. They had meant to read the letters, they really had, and they were certainly going to, but—well what with one thing and another, they just hadn't gotten around to it yet.

My friend, although she couldn't help feeling a bit trembly-lipped, tried her best to be philosophic. As she properly should have, because the blame in this situation was as much hers as her children's. Her mistake was a natural one for a parent to make. Because she would have welcomed a daily letter from her daughters, she assumed that they would be equally eager to hear from her.

This paradox lies at the heart of the letter-writing deadlock between parents and children. Parents are a lot more interested in their children than their children are in them.

Although there are a number of psychological reasons why this is so (for one, children don't blame themselves for their parents' behavior problems), there is the simple fact that children's comings and goings are more interesting. Adults tend to do the same things, with minor variations, over and over, while kids do such wildly improbable things that a parent never knows what they'll be up to next.

A FATHER I KNOW who developed an ulcer from lying awake nights worrying about his daughter at college (wondering how she was, and where she was, and if she was), solved the problem in the only way he knew how—by making a business deal with her.

Estimating that a letter a week would be enough to allay his anxieties, he informed his daughter that he was stopping her $50 a month allowance, but would pay her $12.50 for every letter she wrote home. The last I heard, the daughter was averaging a letter every five days and her father's ulcer was clearing up nicely.

Another, and less expensive, suggestion was proposed by a little boy who was going off to camp for two weeks. His mother gave him a batch of self-addressed postcards and said, "Now all you have to do is write that you're safe and well, and drop the card into the mailbox. That's simple enough, isn't it?"

After thinking it over, the little boy had a better idea. "You could write 'I'm safe and well,' " he said, "and then, if I'm not, I'll cross it out."

Enrollments Close April 1 For 'Part B' of Medicare

About 1.1 million persons over 65 have been notified that they have only until April 1 to sign up for voluntary doctor bill insurance and other supplementary benefits under medicare "Part B."

Those contacted by Social Security Commissioner Robert M. Ball through letters are persons for whom he has addresses: the ones who have been issued medicare cards showing that they are covered only by the basic hospital insurance.

He estimated that 500,000 additional persons over 65 have missed out on the supplementary doctor bill insurance. But these are people who cannot be reached because they have never applied for even the basic medicare coverage.

In his letter, Ball noted that people over 65 who have not signed up for the voluntary benefits by April 1 will not have another chance to get this protection until July 1, 1969.

Also, he pointed out that the basic $4-a-month premium goes up 10 percent for each year that elapses since the over-65 persons' first opportunity to enroll.

For Safety, Honesty:

Food Additives Get Close Check by FDA

IS MODERN CHEMISTRY harming the food you eat? Do today's foods need added ingredients to "enrich" them?

The U. S. Food & Drug Administration points out that the practice of adding "chemicals" to food is very old. It probably began when man learned to preserve his meat by putting salt on it.

Modern knowledge has brought about great improvements in the American food supply, the FDA says. We now grow, process and pack food so that it can be transported for thousands of miles and remain in good condition for months or years. Not only are more foods more available more often, but many of them are also more nutritious.

"Enriched" bread, for example, contains added vitamins and minerals to improve nutritional value and replace those sometimes removed in processing. Bread also contains preservatives to protect against mold or spoilage.

In addition to preservatives and nutrients, many foods contain additives known as "emulsifiers" which affect volume, uniformity, fineness of grain and smoothness. Emulsifiers are often used in bakery products, cake mixes, and along with stabilizers and thickeners are used in such foods as ice cream, frozen desserts and other types of confectionery.

Acids, alkalies, buffers and neutralizing agents are also added to foods, as are synthetic flavoring and coloring agents.

THE FDA keeps close watch over the chemicals added to foods —which must be both useful and safe. Extensive tests are made by a manufacturer of a food additive before it is allowed on the market. FDA's responsibility is the scientific capability to evaluate these tests quickly and reliably.

If it is determined that an additive may be used safely, the FDA issues an order permitting its use. Often this order places a limit on the amount of the additive which may be used and specifies any other conditions necessary to protect public health.

"Federal law," the FDA explains, "specifically states that no substance shown to produce cancer may be added to any food. The law also prohibits the use of any chemical which would result in consumer deception.

"Under the law, only the smallest amount of an approved additive necessary to produce the intended effect may be used." (PAI)

In Flight Attendant Job:

Sex Discrimination By Airlines Barred

Sex is "not a bona fide occupational qualification" for the job of airline flight attendant—whether it be called purser, hostess, steward or stewardess, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has ruled.

Any airline refusing to hire and employ members of a particular sex for the position, EEOC continued, will be violating the 1964 Civil Rights Act's ban on discrimination in hiring because of race, color, religion, sex and national origin.

The commission's decision, by a 3-to-1 vote, is a victory for the Air Line Pilots and the Transport Workers in a battle to prevent carriers from discriminating because of sex, age and marital status.

The fight, going on since 1965, is being waged before the EEOC and in Congress, where the unions seek legislation to bar the airlines from discrimination in hiring and employment.

The unions represent stewards and stewardesses. Although most of these are stewardesses, ALPA and TWU are strongly opposed to attempts to discriminate against males. They also seek to knock out the airlines-imposed age limits for stewardesses, usually 32 or 35, and automatic dismissal when they get married.

Forced Retirement

At a hearing held by the commission in Washington last September, spokesmen for the two unions contended that the compulsory retirement of stewardesses for marital status and age also violates the law.

It was pointed out that airlines have no compulsory retirement rules based upon marriage or age of male flight attendants.

A witness for management, which sought a ruling to allow companies to hire only women as flight attendants, argued that attractive women "are preferred by the majority of passengers we fly."

He conceded that the airlines sought to hire women only because such a ruling in turn would bar the commission from proceeding with cases alleging discrimination based on the age and marital status issues.

In announcing the bar against sex discrimination in hiring, the commission said that the other two issues would be resolved in later decisions, as the unions have requested.

Meanwhile, the commission also issued decisions with respect to pension and retirement plans and state legislation governing employment of women.

It amended a previous guideline to specify that differences in optional or compulsory retirement ages based on sex violate the Civil Rights Act.

The effective date of the interpretation is July 1, 1968, to allow time for plans to be changed to conform. Other differences in these plans bases on sex, such as survivor benefits, will be handled on a case-by-case basis, EEOC said.

The commission reinstated a 1965 guideline holding that state laws are not in conflict with the Civil Rights Act where they limit hiring of women for protective purposes, such as on hazardous jobs.

The commission stressed, however, that "Employers may not refuse to hire women merely because state law require certain conditions of employment for women such as minimum pay, overtime pay, and rest periods."

The guideline was suspended in August 1966, when EEOC decided it would not rule on conflicts between state laws and the Act. Now, it will consider state-federal law conflicts on a case-by-case basis.

MEDIATION EFFORTS continued in strike of nearly 35,000 members of the Glass Bottle Blowers, which has closed down 86 plants producing 90 percent of the nation's glass container supply since Feb. 1. From left, GBBA Pres. Lee W. Minton, Dir. William E. Simkin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, Mediation & Conciliation Commissioner William Rose, and J. Thomas Rimer, Jr., the industry's labor relation director. None of the struck plants has attempted to operate. The union's officers have taken themselves off the payroll for the duration of the strike.

Critics of New York Taylor Law Agree Only That It Doesn't Work

New York—Solutions ranging from repeal of its strike ban to toughening its strike penalties against unions were offered at a legislative committee hearing here into failure of the state Public Employee Labor Relations Act, the Taylor Law, to prevent strikes as its sponsors claimed it would.

The law, effective last Sept. 1, guarantees union organizing rights and provides for "collective negotiations," but sets top penalties for strikes at $10,000 a day, an 18-month dues checkoff loss for unions, jail up to 30 days and $250 fines for union leaders. It has no sanctions for unfair labor practices by public employers.

Attacks from several quarters on pro-Taylor law editorials in the New York Times, an advocate of its enactment, marked the hearing. Theodore W. Kheel, mediator and arbitrator, charged the Times editorially has "irrevocably committed itself" to this law, adding:

"It has gone so far as to try immediately to obliterate or intimidate any voice that dares suggest there may be something wrong with the law and that there may be a better way to accomplish its objectives of preventing strikes and treating employes fairly. . . . We must guard ourselves against being bullied by this editorial department."

Had the Times followed its own editorial advice on labor relations, Kheel said, "it probably would have gone out of business a long time ago."

Kheel, named by Assembly Speaker Anthony J. Travia to study the law and recommend changes, proposed that public unions be allowed to strike except in case of danger to public health and safety. When a union is barred from saying "no deal," and cannot strike, he said, there is no real collective bargaining.

He also urged Taft-Hartley type injunctions for emergency disputes and final legislature-directed arbitration of remaining issues.

Fined, Jailed

Last September, union teachers in New York City failed to report for school when negotiations did not produce a contract to replace the one that had expired the prior June. This February the city refuse collectors struck after turning down a wage offer made seven months after their contract expired.

Union presidents in both cases were jailed 15 days, fined $250. The Teachers' union was fined $150,000, the sanitationmen's $50,000. Both had their dues checkoffs revoked.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Raymond R. Corbett urged the committee to seek maximum emphasis on provisions for effective bargaining rather than penalties and to recognize the right to strike in public employment except in emergency situations of "the clearest threat to public health, safety and security" as "fundamental to collective bargaining and preservation of a free society." Other union spokesmen urged similar changes.

Herbert L. Haber, the city's labor relations director, said in a letter to the committee that the city favored review of the law, but offered no suggestions for change.

Melvin H. Osterman, Jr., special counsel to Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller, who sought the Taylor law's enactment, cited the fact that the law exempted New York City and allowed it to set up its own comparable procedures. He suggested more effort "to bring the impasse-resolving procedures and agencies of the state law to bear on local strike situations."

Commerce and industry group spokesmen argued that stronger penalties could serve as greater deterrents to public worker strikes.

'Arrogant' Management Stand Held Factor in Public Employe Disputes

"Take-it-or-leave it" bargaining by "arrogant" public administrators was blamed by a New York congressman for contributing to a "growing crisis" in collective bargaining involving local, county and state employes.

Rep. Dominick V. Daniels joined union leaders at a seminar sponsored by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. in opposing punitive government action to suppress public employe strikes.

He suggested, however, that federal legislation involving new approaches to public service disputes might help get bargaining deadlocks "off dead center."

Daniels said consideration should be given to mediation and arbitration machinery that would include federal financial help in cases where "simple justice dictated wage increases" which were beyond local or state government's ability to pay.

He voiced strong opposition to legislation imposing "harsh and vindictive sanctions against the workers' freedom of expression—even if that freedom of expression sometimes causes disruption of public services."

Also addressing the MTD seminar were representatives of unions representing large groups of public workers.

- William D. Buck, president of the Fire Fighters, said firemen are "caught in a vise between compulsion and our conscience." He declared that firemen have voluntarily included a no-strike prohibition in their charter, but that public officials have "taken advantage of our no-strike pledge as a way of withholding equitable pay increases."
- Charles Cogen, president of the Teachers, forecast that strikes by public employes eventually will be "accepted and institutionalized, just as they have been in the private sector," adding that the alternative would be "anarchy." Public employes, and particularly teachers, "are determined to proceed with their right to strike, regardless of the consequences," Cogen asserted.
- James Woodside, president of the Technical Engineers and moderator for the MTD seminar, charged that the attitude of the public and press toward the public employe is "one gigantic cliche," and declared that "these attitudes have been frozen for generations."
- Robert H. Hastings, executive assistant to the president of the State, County & Municipal Employes, said his union favors binding arbitration as the final step in handling grievances and interpreting contract provisions, but opposes "compulsory and binding arbitration as the end step to the collective bargaining process, itself." Hastings said that where compulsory arbitration is employed in contract negotiations, "the decision of the arbitrator seldom satisfies either party, and experience shows that it makes future disputes all the more certain."
- William H. Ryan, national coordinator of the Government Employes Dept. of the Machinists, said that in the federal sector, the late Pres. Kennedy issued an Executive Order six years ago spelling out government workers' bargaining rights in order to "drag the management of the federal establishment into the 20th century." In far too many cases, he said management still must be "prodded and driven simply into living up to its obligations."
- Henry T. Wilson, director of the Federal-Public Service Division of the Laborers, was critical of the "confusing nature" of laws covering public employes. Officials in Chesapeake, Va., he said contend state laws give public employes "the right to organize, but deny them the right of representation"; while in San Antonio, Tex., city officials "deny our local checkoff, despite a state law that permits checkoff of union dues."

The seminar followed the recent decision of the Maritime Trades Dept. executive board to conduct an in-depth study of "unrealistic and unworkable" state and local laws restricting collective bargaining rights of public employes.

City of Tucson Signs 1st Pact With Union

Tucson, Ariz.—The city council here has overwhelmingly approved an agreement with State, County & Municipal Employes' Local 449—the first in the state covering city workers—over oposition from a Tucson daily newspaper publisher. There was only one "no" vote.

The five-year pact, considered for nearly a year, gives the local the right to bargain for wages, hours, benefits and working conditions for 542 members in city employment.

Editor-Publisher William R. Mathews of the Arizona Daily Star told a council "study" session that the agreement "will bring trouble" and strikes, even though the pact has a no-strike clause.

One councilman charged Mathews with bias. Another criticized procedure whereby Mathews was the only witness at the "study" session. Other lawmakers hailed the agreement as a "forward step."

Although City Attorney Dion DeConcini and the Arizona League of Cities has advised that the agreement is constitutional, opponents have announced they will challenge it in court. Local 449 leaders said they would welcome such a test.

Georgia Votes 'Best in South' Job Injury Law

Atlanta — Georgia has enacted the best workmen's compensation law among the Southern states following a campaign spearheaded by the AFL-CIO. The previous law was considered the worst south of the Mason-Dixon line, Wiley H. Montague, president, Georgia AFL-CIO, reported.

The new law lifts maximum disability payments from $37 to $50 a week. Partial disability payments were hiked $10 to $40 a week. Injured workers can receive as much as $5,000 in medical expenses, double the previous maximum.

Workers will be eligible for benefits for up to 400 weeks, well above the previous top of 338. Burial benefits were raised a third.

"This new law climaxes a two-year campaign, and although it is not all we were seeking, it does raise Georgia's workmen's compensation from the lowest in the South to the top," Montague said. "And it gives us a sound basis for further improvements in the next legislature."

The measure was the first bill to pass in the current session of the legislature and was the first to be signed by Gov. Lester Maddox. Only one vote was cast against it in each house of the legislature. The bill was sponsored by Georgia Sen. Al Holloway. A similar measure was sponsored in the House by Rep. Bill Lee.

Montague gave "considerable credit" for the new bill to help from the AFL-CIO national headquarters and the Citizens' Committee for the Improvement of Workmen's Compensation. The citizen's group included a cross-section of leading clergy, college presidents and professors, civil rights leaders, lawyers and businessmen.

LITTLE BERLIN WALL is what newspaper union pickets in Los Angeles call this 10-foot fence. It was erected, they say, to "keep scabs in and pickets out" of the struck Herald-Examiner plant. The strikers named the fence for Board Chairman Richard E. Berlin of the paper's owners, the Hearst Corp. They charge management has imported more than 100 strikebreakers since the walkout started Dec. 15 over contract terms.

LBJ Urges Program Of Aid to Rural Poor

The government must act to relieve poverty and slums in America's rural areas as well as in the cities, Pres. Johnson told Congress.

He submitted a broad-ranging farm program in a special message, and predicted that, if enacted, it will "bring new prosperity to rural America."

Johnson termed the basic price support and acreage control program, which expires this year, the "backbone" of federal support for farmers. He asked that it be made permanent.

He urged continuation of the food for freedom program through 1971, declaring: "This lifeline of hope to the needy of the world cannot be withdrawn."

But, the President emphasized, steps to put commercial agriculture on "a sounder and stronger footing" represent "only half the battle."

He stressed that "thousands of men and women in rural America need a different kind of help," and cited these "grim" statistics:

- "Farm employment has fallen 46 percent between 1950 and 1967.
- "Nearly 1.5 million small farmers earn less than $5,000 a year. Their existence may hang on a thin thread: a few acres of tobacco and cotton, an old-age pension, and the food stamp program.
- "In rural America, one in every five falls under the poverty line, and millions of families live in housing that shames a modern nation."

To meet some of these problems, Johnson noted, he has proposed large-scale expansion of housing programs for rural as well as urban areas and directed government agencies to provide loans, job training and other encouragement to establishment of industrial plants in rural areas.

He asked additional funds to help small farmers convert their land to greater income-producing enterprises, whether through a change of crops or establishment of recreation areas. And he asked an extension of the food stamp program with a higher appropriation.

Johnson expressed his support for the goal of greater bargaining power for farmers in selling their crops and urged the House and Senate Agriculture Committees to hold hearings this year "on the various means of strengthening farmer bargaining power in the market place."

After the congressional hearings and completion of its own studies, the Administration will propose specific legislation, Johnson said.

The President noted the steady shift of population from farms to the cities, noting that "today 70 percent of our people live on 1 percent of our land." He added:

"I think we can change this trend by setting a goal of full parity for rural America. Industry, technology and transportation can bring jobs to the countryside rather than people to the cities. And government must help."

L.A. Strike Continues:

San Francisco Pact Reached with Hearst

Los Angeles—The Hearst Corporation settled its 55-day fight with 15 unions in San Francisco this week but remained immovable here behind a bastion of strikebreakers.

A three-year package in San Francisco gave 3,000 union members across-the-board wage increases of $32—in annual increments of $10, $10 and $12—over the period. It also provided management with guarantees of labor peace for the term.

But the unions, united as the Conference of San Francisco Newspaper Unions, took a strong position demanding a Hearst settlement in Los Angeles, declaring:

"If the Hearst management refuses to undertake effective negotiations to resolve the strike against the Herald-Examiner then there will be no choice left to labor but a direct confrontation with the entire Hearst chain. We pledge our full support of any such confrontation."

In Los Angeles, however, Hearst management went to the bargaining table with four different unions and showed no indication of movement, union leaders in the 75-day strike-lockout reported.

Strikebreakers Banned

The difference appeared to be San Francisco's prohibition of the use of strikebreakers in industrial disputes. Mayor Sam Yorty of Los Angeles has refused to support a similar law here.

Although San Francisco's two major dailies were idle during their dispute, Hearst's Herald-Examiner here has continued publishing on a limited scale with the help of imported professional strikebreakers and regular non-union personnel.

Besides the across-the-board settlement in San Francisco, Hearst's Examiner and the independent Chronicle granted members of Mailers Local 18, which struck Jan. 5, a $7.50 weekly hike retroactive to March 1967. An additional $3.25 weekly health-welfare contribution was approved for Nov. 1 for mailers.

The package will put the Newspaper Guild's journeyman reporter wage minimum at $210 by Mar. 25, when under the former agreement the scale was to go to $200.

Settlement was achieved after all unions and management agreed to a common termination date.

The San Francisco newspapers are published in a commonly-operated plant.

Appeal to Hearst

A team of influential Southern California religious leaders warned Publisher George R. Hearst, Jr., of Los Angeles to end the use of professional strikebreakers or face blame for "poisoning the atmosphere of orderly labor-management relations" for a long time.

Ten leading clergymen of the Protestant and Jewish faiths issued sharp criticism of Hearst practices after a meeting with the publisher.

Machinists' Pres. P. L. Siemiller and Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther visited the Herald-Examiner picket line and strike headquarters while in Los Angeles for the joint IAM-UAW aerospace bargaining conference.

Siemiller said organized labor would "have to build all necessary pressures nationally" to resist Hearst Corporation strikebreaking tactics. Fifteen members of the Machinists' union joined 1,100 Newspaper Guild members Dec. 15 in striking the Hearst property here.

R.I. Unions to Sponsor Group Health Program

Providence, R.I.—The Rhode Island State AFL-CIO is moving ahead with plans for a comprehensive group health program for union members and their families, with the possibility of later making it available to the general public.

One of Rhode Island's best-known physicians has been named medical director and Labor Day of 1969 has been set as the target for opening a modern medical center which will stress preventive health care as the core of comprehensive prepaid medical services.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Thomas F. Policastro and Sec.-Treas. Edwin C. Brown unveiled the program at a news conference here.

They announced that the initial incorporators include 18 union officials and 12 prominent representatives of the public, including businessmen, clergymen, educators and an Urban League official. Legislation to incorporate the organization has been introduced in the legislature.

The federation is applying for a federal mortgage insurance loan to cover 90 percent of the cost of constructing the center, which it hopes to locate near a hospital affiliated with the Brown University medical school program.

Medical director of the nonprofit enterprise is Dr. Harry E. Darrah, director of medical education at Roger Williams General Hospital and immediate past president of the Rhode Island Medical Society.

A field representative of the Group Health Association of America has been working with the Rhode Island labor movement since last spring, helping to set up the program.

Brown told the news conference that unions in the state have long been concerned that, while health benefits negotiated in collective bargaining have steadily increased, "our membership has not been getting adequate medical care."

He said experience in other parts of the country has shown that considerable savings in hospital utilization can be achieved through emphasis on preventive medicine and out-patient diagnostic services.

The new program was hailed in an editorial in the Providence Journal.

"It fully deserves the community's good will and cooperation," the newspaper said, "as a promising move toward tackling the problems of steadily mounting costs and fragmentations of medical services."

Mediation Service Shifts Fitzpatrick to N.Y. Post

The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service has assigned Daniel F. Fitzpatrick of its Washington, D.C., office to New York City as assistant regional director for its Region 1, comprising New York state, the New England states and northern New Jersey. He will continue to serve as national maritime coordinator for the FM&CS.

Mass Transit Agency Proposed by Johnson

A new Urban Mass Transportation Administration would be established in the Dept. of Transportation under a plan proposed by Pres. Johnson.

The proposal was sent to Congress as a reorganization plan which automatically takes effect in 60 days unless Congress objects.

The President's plan basically would shift programs now under the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development to the new administration. HUD would retain planning and research functions related to meshing mass transit into city planning.

The new agency would take over mass transit programs that have a total budget of $140 million in the present fiscal year, according to the Administration.

The President has requested $190 million in new funds for these programs in fiscal 1969 and another $230 million for fiscal 1970, making a total of $420 million over the next two years.

Administer Grants

The new unit's primary function will be to provide federal grants to urban areas for the purchase of such items as subway cars and buses, and to help them develop new kinds of transportation.

In "strongly urging" Congress to let the reorganization plan become effective, Johnson said the plan "will provide more effective management of transportation programs."

If the nation is to improve transportation within our cities, he added, "state and local government agencies should be able to look to a single federal agency for assistance."

The President said the plan would not "diminish" the overall responsibilities of HUD in the area of transportation.

"Rather," he said, "adequate authority is reserved to that department to enable it to join with the Dept. of Transportation to assure that urban transportation develops as an integral component of the broader development of urban areas."

Fire Fighters Hail New Research Act

Passage by Congress of the Administration's Fire Research & Safety Act was hailed by the Fire Fighters as "a landmark."

Pres. William D. Buck wrote Pres. Johnson that the legislation should lead to "great progress in coming years towards reducing the tremendous losses in human lives and dollars which are caused by fire."

The new law sets up a fire research and education center in the Dept. of Commerce and provides for a presidential commission to study the problems of fire prevention and fire fighting.

At Southwestern Conference:

Labor Role Cited in Cracking Mexican-American Job Bias

Phoenix, Ariz.—The labor movement is "perhaps the most powerful advocate" the Mexican-American can have in his fight to break down race prejudice when he goes job hunting, Equal Employment Opportunity Commissioner Vicente T. Ximenes declared here.

"The government can make laws and enforce them, and the employers can be guided in the right direction," he said, "but it is the labor union that can bring all its fighting spirit and support to the battle for equal employment opportunity.

"There is no other group which can so vividly understand the obstacles that hamper minority groups."

Ximenes spoke at a day-long regional conference for unions in the Southwest, called by the EEOC to discuss particularly the employment problems of Mexican-Americans and to develop lines of communication between the labor movement and the federal agency.

The session drew more than 100 delegates from local unions, joint councils and central bodies in Arizona, New Mexico, Utah, Colorado and Wyoming.

Speakers included staff members from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights headed by Dir. Donald Slaiman and regional and national EEOC officials. The EEOC regional director for the five-state area, with headquarters in Albuquerque, N. M. is Tom E. Robles, formerly on the staff of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs.

Complaint Procedure

Slaiman emphasized that unions should advise their international headquarters when a complaint of job discrimination is filed against them and stressed the need for them to inform the EEOC of the "real facts" in order that a "clear picture" may be developed.

The AFL-CIO and its international affiliates, he said, work closely with the EEOC to ferret out unsound charges and to seek corrective measures when there is a basis for complaint. In this way, he went on, of 305 complaints filed against the 60,000 local unions of AFL-CIO affiliates last year, 71 were found to have "no probable cause."

He urged "going beyond mere compliance with the Equal Employment Opportunity Act" and called for "affirmative action programs to extend job opportunities for minority youth and unemployed—even those who don't qualify for apprenticeship programs."

Robles described the process when a complaint is filed, carrying a hypothetical case from the preliminary analysis stage through investigation to action by the EEOC itself and subsequent efforts to conciliate the issue should discrimination be found.

Cooperation Urged

He emphasized the need for labor's cooperation, urging the delegates to "bear in mind that we need your help to determine if there has been a violation—and if there is no violation, you get a clean bill of health."

There were several question-and-answer periods during which queries were fielded by Slaiman, Robles and two EEOC officials, Labor Economist Alvin Golub and Charles T. Muntain, labor liaison officer who chaired the opening session.

Answers to other questions that sometimes indicated a lack of communication between the EEOC and the unionists were given by a panel composed of Executive Sec.-Treas. Neal Gonzales of the New Mexico AFL-CIO, who presided; William Pollard of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights; Mrs. Gloria Johnson, assistant to the director of economics and collective bargaining, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Anthony Ochocki, Manpower Development & Training Act project director for the Carpenters, Robles and Muntain with help from Slaiman.

Aid Available

In addition, Golub discussed the record-keeping and reporting forms the EEOC sends unions and apprenticeship committees as well as employers. Marvin Rogoff, EEOC labor liaison officer, described the various types of technical assistance available for unions seeking to develop their own programs to help minority group members qualify for jobs.

"If unions use their power and savvy in this area," he said, "they can make a lot of friends. If they do not show concern for people with special problems, they make enemies."

That the Mexican-American—and also the American Indian—constitute special problems was emphasized throughout the conference.

Ximenes, who also is chairman of the Inter-Agency Committee on Mexican-American Affairs, claimed Mexican-Americans constitute a "unique" problem unlike the problem of immigrants who entered the U.S. via Atlantic Coast cities and who sought to abandon their European backgrounds.

He declared that "forcing Mexican-American school children to speak a language they don't know is one of the worst features of the American education system."

"It's time the system realized a child should be allowed to speak in Spanish," he said, "and the teacher herself should, too." He charged:

"Minority group members who have been the subjects of unfair treatment for so long learn to expect discrimination."

"They long ago ceased to apply or to compete. They have learned to distrust their supervisors; they have developed an expectation that they will not receive the promotion although they are next in line; they have submitted to the hopelessness of uselessly protesting unfair treatment; they have given up on trying to participate in on-the-job training projects. . . .

Shop Steward's Role

"It can no longer be set aside—the day is coming when it will have to be put on at once, this business of getting equal employment opportunities for members of minority groups."

In emphasizing the positive role of the unions in securing justice in employment, Ximenes pointed out that "the shop steward has an excellent opportunity to take affirmative steps to protect the Mexican-American employe who cannot bring himself to submit a protest."

"I urge that trade unions not only establish and follow affirmative action programs within their own ranks," he added, "but that they exert all their unified strength to encourage management to act positively and affirmatively."

The delegates were welcomed by Sec.-Treas. Darwin Aycock of the Arizona AFL-CIO and City Councilman Frank Benites, who also is president of the Phoenix Building & Construction Trades Council. Pres. William D. Shafer of the Arizona AFL-CIO presided at a luncheon session.

EQUAL EMPLOYMENT Opportunity Commissioner Vicente T. Ximenes (center) and Tom Robles, EEOC's Albuquerque office director, were briefed on the union movement's program to help implement the equal employment opportunity law by AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman prior to the Phoenix Conference for unions in the Southwest jointly called by the EEOC and the AFL-CIO.

650 Steelworkers Mark Gain in Basic Education

Chicago—More than 650 Steelworkers in the plants of seven major steel companies were honored at plant ceremonies here and in the Baltimore area for completing the first phase of a basic education program sponsored by labor, management and government.

The joint program was launched after a study agreed to in the 1965 basic steel contract. USWA Pres. I. W. Abel and Chairman R. Conrad Cooper of the industry's coordinating committee joined at ceremonies saluting those who persevered in completing their basic education.

The aim of the program, whose second phase began this week, is to lift worker educational levels to help industry employes qualify for training and job oportunities as they become available. Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, in a joint announcement with the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, said the education of nearly 1,000 more steelworkers will have been upgraded when the program ends this summer.

The Board for Fundamental Education, a non-profit organization, is conducting classes under a 14-month contract financed by $1 million in Manpower Development & Training Act funds.

The participating companies are Inland Steel Co., National Steel Corp., Republic Steel Corp., Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. and the United States Steel Corp. in Chicago and Gary, Ind.; Armco Steel Co., E. Baltimore, Md., and Bethlehem Steel Corp., Sparrows Point, Md.

Abel and Cooper said the program is moving forward in all plants with the cooperation of local union and company officials. The companies and the union have a mutual interest in improving the basic skills of steelworkers, their joint statement said.

Pleased with Progress

The program is at the half-way point and therefore it is too early to evaluate results, the two spokesmen noted. But they added: "We are pleased with the progress made so far."

Dr. Cleo W. Blackburn, executive director of the Board for Fundamental Education, said the record to date proves that "management, labor and government can successfully promote joint programs in the interests of the worker."

The training program, launched last September, grew out of union and management realization that some employes with long service to the industry lacked the educational skills to train for higher-level jobs.

At plant ceremonies, certificates of achievement were presented class enrollees by company and union officials as wives and families of the workers applauded. Speakers at a progress report meeting in the Bismarck Hotel, Chicago, included Assistant Dir. John S. McCauley of the U.S. Employment Service, representing Wirtz; and Dr. Grant Venn of the U.S. Office of Education, representing HEW Sec. John W. Gardner. They reported that the pilot training program will, if deemed finally successful, lead to others in U.S. industry.

CWA Protests Over Rejection Of Radio Spots

The Federal Communications Commission has been asked to investigate and act against 21 radio stations which refused to broadcast paid commercials from a union.

The commercials, sponsored by the Communications Workers, tell the Bell Telephone System it's time to negotiate a substantial wage increase.

Some 70 radio stations have accepted the spot announcements, CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne said. But 21 stations in 16 cities turned down all or part of the union's series of 10 commercials.

Beirne asked the FCC to seek an early remedy and weigh the refusals when the licenses of the stations are up for renewal.

He noted that the Bell System is a heavy purchaser of air time and this has "the cumulative effect of building the image of the corporations in such a manner as to make it more difficult for us in CWA to convince the public that our grievances in collective bargaining may indeed have real merit."

CWA is currently negotiating with Western Electric, an AT&T subsidiary. The union said the outcome is likely to set a pattern for wage increases in the telephone industry.

Teachers Local Offers Labor Education List

Teachers Local 189 has announced that its new 1968 Directory of Labor Education is available free in single complimentary copies from Owen Tapper, AFT Local 189, 580 Spruce St., Morgantown, W. Va. 26506. The local is made up of labor education specialists.

Elmer Brown Dies at 66, Headed ITU for Decade

Colorado Springs, Colo.—Elmer Brown, president of the Intl. Typographical Union for nearly a decade, died here Feb. 27 after an extended illness. He was 66.

Brown had announced his intention to retire when his fifth term expired next July.

Under his leadership, the ITU experienced a period of rapid change and innovation. In 1962, the union moved its headquarters here from Indianapolis and also opened a $3 million training center. The modern center has since given more than 3,000 printers advanced training in printing technology.

In the decade of his leadership, the ITU membership rose from 103,000 to 122,000.

In a telegram to Mrs. Brown, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler extended "deepest sympathy."

The ITU president, they said, "was an indomitable fighter" for his union and its members. "His leadership during a period of constant change will be long remembered by everyone in the craft."

Printing was in Brown's blood from childhood. He learned the trade working in his father's weekly newspaper plant in Tracey City, Tenn.

His union life began in 1925 when he was initiated as a journeyman by Chattanooga Typographical Union No. 89. In 1927, he went to New York City and became a member of ITU Local 6. He became active in union affairs and served as president of "Big Six" from 1939 to 1941.

Brown was elected second vice-president of the ITU in 1944 and served three terms. He became an international representative and later was named assistant to then Pres. Woodruff Randolph in 1956. In 1958, he was elected president of the ITU and won reelection to four additional two-year terms.

He is survived by his wife, Ana Rosita, and two daughters, Mrs. Edward A. Davis of Colorado Springs and Mrs. Frank Hoffman of Phillipsburg, N.J.

Jack Howard Named Wirtz Executive Aide

Jack Howard, deputy administrator of the Manpower Administration and former head of the Neighborhood Youth Corps, has been named by Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz as his executive assistant.

Howard succeeds Frank W. Erwin, who is leaving to head a private management consultant firm.

A former San Francisco newspaperman and a one-time vice president of the Newspaper Guild, Howard has held several key manpower positions since joining the Labor Dept. in 1963.

Dirksen Shifts:

Senate Victory Seen For Civil Rights Bill

to pass the landmark Civil Rights Act of 1964.

During most of the desultory six weeks of civil rights debate this year, the odds appeared heavily against passage of meaningful civil rights legislation, particularly open housing.

But a small, determined bipartisan group of senators persisted. Their leaders on the Democratic side were Senators Philip A. Hart (Mich.) and Walter F. Mondale (Minn.). The Republican wing of the civil rights coalition was led by Senators Jacob K. Javits (N.Y.) and Edward W. Brooke (Mass.), the Senate's only Negro member.

They ignored the advice of those who said that the choice was either weak, token legislation that Dirksen might be willing to support or no bill at all.

They remained undismayed by the "prevailing view" that the "mood" of the country was such that an open housing law could not be passed. Whites were frightened by a summer of riots and black power extremists, scornful of legislation, had split the Negro community, the argument went.

Support came primarily from an alliance of civil rights, labor and religious organizations.

The first glimmer of hope came on Feb. 20, when the clearcut 57-37 vote for cloture showed that considerably more than a bare majority of the Senate supported the legislation.

The real turning point came a day later, when Democratic Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.) joined with Dirksen in moving to table—and thus kill—the key open housing amendment to the bill before the Senate.

Mansfield favored fair housing, but considered the battle for cloture hopeless and hoped to obtain passage of a limited civil rights protection bill. Dirksen was at that point still flatly opposed to an open housing provision.

The Senate refused, 58-34, to table the housing amendment. Democrats voted 39-18 against tabling; Republicans repudiated Dirksen's position, 19-16.

Thus, for the first time there was a definite possibility that cloture could be achieved even without Dirksen's support.

The New York Times reported that Dirksen's son-in-law, freshman Sen. Howard H. Baker, Jr. (R-Tenn.), told the GOP leader bluntly: "The majority of Republicans in the Senate want some kind of civil rights bill."

Strength Grows

Off the Senate floor, negotiations got under way. Another cloture vote had already been scheduled by Mansfield. Absentees kept the actual vote down to 56-36. But counting pairs and announced positions, 61 senators went on record for cloture—with clear indications of reserve strength. One Republican, Sen. Norris Cotton (N.H.), switched to support cloture. Another, Sen. Jack Miller (Iowa), said he was voting against cloture only to allow more time to reach an agreement. But if no agreement were reached with Dirksen, he would support cloture at the next opportunity.

The only subsequent surprise was the completeness of Dirksen's turnabout. He embraced—and said he would sponsor—an open housing amendment considerably broader than the bill the House passed in 1966, which he had then denounced as "absolutely unconstitutional."

The new open housing section on which the Senate will vote will cover an estimated 70 percent of the nation's housing by 1970.

Immediately on enactment, discrimination would be banned in sale or rental of housing built with federal assistance, including buildings with FHA mortgages.

Effective Dec. 31, 1968, coverage would extend to all multi-unit housing, such as apartment houses and real estate developments.

Final Stage

The final stage, on Jan. 1, 1970, would cover single-family, owner-occupied houses sold through real estate brokers.

Exempt from coverage would be single family homes resold by the owner without the help of a broker. Also exempt would be "Mrs. Murphy's boarding house"—owner-occupied dwellings of up to four units.

Persons complaining of discrimination could first utilize conciliation services of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development.

If these should fail, a law suit could be filed in federal court. If a violation were found, the complainant could collect actual damages, lawyer's fees and up to $1,000 in punitive damages.

If the Justice Dept finds a "pattern" of discrimination in a neighborhood or a housing development, the attorney general could seek a court injunction.

Assuming success of a new Mar. 1 cloture vote, Senate passage of the bill will come within a few days.

The next step would be up to the House where substantial Republican support will be needed to put together a majority for a meaningful open housing law.

Labor Backs 'Strongest' Poultry Bill

Congress was urged by the AFL-CIO to pass "the strongest possible poultry inspection bill."

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller wrote the chairman of a House Agriculture subcommittee that the public needs assurance that the 1.6 billion pounds of poultry not sold across state lines is fit to eat.

In a letter to Subcommittee Chairman Graham Purcell (D-Tex.), Biemiller termed state inspection programs "either non-existent or inadequate."

He noted that "over 400 million pounds of poultry processed in federally inspected plants is rejected because it is diseased and contaminated. How much greater must be the proportion of diseased and contaminated products reaching the public from uninspected plants, where no check exists to prevent it?"

Biemiller said the AFL-CIO favors mandatory federal inspection of all poultry slaughter and processing operations. "At the very least," he said, legislation should be enacted as comprehensive as the 1967 amendments to the meat inspection law.

Only four states have mandatory inspection programs, Biemiller noted, "and even these are defective as to coverage or enforcement."

Strong evidence of the need for legislation, he wrote, showed up in the recent Agriculture Dept. surveys which found that 20 percent of uninspected poultry found in retail markets was unsafe to eat and only 18 percent fully met federal standards.

SIGNS TELL THE STORY as representatives of Ohio unions gather around Cincinnati Councilman John J. Gilligan (right) and Ohio AFL-CIO Pres. Frank W. King (center) after the state federation endorsed Gilligan for the Democratic nomination for the U. S. Senate. It marked the first time that the Ohio AFL-CIO has endorsed a candidate in a primary election.

Ohio Labor Picks Gilligan Over Lausche

Columbus, O.—The Ohio AFL-CIO broke precedent to endorse John J. Gilligan, a former member of Congress, for the Democratic nomination for the U.S. Senate.

The endorsement of Gilligan, now a Cincinnati councilman, over Sen. Frank J. Lausche, was the first primary election endorsement in state AFL-CIO's 10-year history.

The endorsement was made unanimously by the state AFL-CIO's 400-member COPE on the recommendation of its operating committee. The COPE meeting was attended by union members from throughout the state.

Earlier, the operating committee had screened the records of both candidates. It invited them to attend the meeting, but only Gilligan appeared. Lausche declined because of the "press of other business."

Ohio AFL-CIO Pres. Frank W. King said the choice was based on the fact that Gilligan "stands for something. He stands for progress and he stands for the people."

On the other hand, he said, Lausche "is out of touch with the people in the state. He has a long record of being against things. He is not people-oriented."

In an address to the meeting, Gilligan charged that Lausche had voted against progressive programs and had opposed the "interests of Ohio's working men and women."

ADA Policies Lead Phillips to Resign

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Paul Phillips is among federation leaders who have resigned from Americans for Democratic Action.

Phillips left the organization at the end of 1967 in a disagreement over the direction the organization's policies were taking.

Pres. Walter L. Mitchell of the Chemical Workers, meanwhile, made public a wire to ADA leaders declaring that "under no conditions do I wish my name to be used by ADA in any endorsement of Sen. McCarthy for president of the U.S. I am not tendering my resignation from ADA, rather am especially concerned over a possible misunderstanding of my personal position which is to aggressively support Pres. Johnson."

Real Earnings Decline As Price Rise Continues

Workers pay checks were lower and price tags higher during January, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The lower earnings were caused by a drop in the average workweek from 38.2 to 37.6 hours. Even though average hourly earnings went up 3 cents, gross weekly pay was 50 cents less.

On top of this, the Consumer Price Index continued its sharp climb, again moving up three-tenths of 1 percent. The new figure of 118.6 percent of the 1957-59 price average is 3.4 percent higher than a year ago.

In terms of buying power, a typical worker with three dependents took a 60-cent weekly pay cut in January. His "real earnings" were virtually unchanged from a year ago and below the level of the last half of 1967.

There were indications of an even sharper price hike ahead. Preliminary data points to a six-tenths of 1 percent rise in the February Wholesale Price Index. Wholesale prices moved up four-tenths of 1 percent, to 107.2 percent of the 1957-59 base.

Triggers Rise

Wholesale price rises normally trigger even bigger percentage increases in retail prices. Over the past 12 months, the wholesale price index went up only nine-tenths of 1 percent—compared with the 3.4 percent hike in the Consumer Price Index.

Just about every segment of the economy contributed to the January price rise—food, consumer services including medical care, new and used cars, mortgage rates and auto insurance, among others.

Medical care services were up seven-tenths of 1 percent for the month, and 7.7 percent for the year.

Clothing Prices

Apparel prices were down slightly. But the decline was less than is usual for this time of the year. So on a seasonally adjusted basis, it shows up as a price increase.

The Labor Dept. report indicated that car manufacturers concealed a substantial price hike in the extra amount they added to the price of cars for front seat shoulder belts, a mandatory safety item for all automobiles built after Jan. 1.

Of the $23.47 retail charge, only $8.20 could be attributed to the cost, including installation and normal price mark-up, the government's statisticians concluded.

More than 615,000 workers will receive cost-of-living increases as a result of the January price figures. About 450,000 trucking industry workers will receive 3-cent hourly raises based on changes in the CPI over a six-month period. Some 100,000 aerospace and automotive parts workers will receive quarterly increases of 3 cents an hour.

IAM to Help Train 1,000 As Mechanics

A union-industry-government program has been set up to train 1,000 truck mechanics in a 38-state area.

The Machinists will coordinate the program and work out apprentice-entry contracts with local and state affiliates of the American Trucking Association, the industry's trade group.

The Machinists have been alloted $77,000 in Manpower Development & Training Act funds to get the program under way.

Local school systems will conduct pre-job classroom instruction.

Employers will be reimbursed for on-the-job training expenses at the rate of $15 a week for each trainee.

IAM training coordinators for the program will be stationed in New York City, Atlanta, Chicago and Kansas City.

Fair Housing Breaks Senate Barrier

AFL-CIO News

Southern Filibuster Cracked

The Senate broke a southern filibuster and moved towards a showdown on passage of a labor-backed civil rights bill, including a ban on racial discrimination in the rental or sale of most housing.

It took four tries to reach the two-thirds majority needed under Senate rules to limit debate and not until the last vote was cast to make it 65-32 were civil rights supporters certain they had carried the day. (Rollcall on Page 9.)

Both parties supported cloture by almost the same two-thirds margin. Democrats voted 41-20 to limit debate; Republicans voted 24-12 for cloture. The three absentees were Democrats who were announced as favoring cloture.

In a compromise needed to pick up a few essential votes, the debate limitation applied only to the completion of action on all amendments to the bill—but not to debate preceding the vote for final passage. Thus, if the Dixie bloc chooses to renew its filibuster, another cloture vote might be necessary.

With the debate limitation in force, the Senate divided more closely on a series of amendments aimed at limiting the open housing section. The AFL-CIO and the Civil Rights Leadership Conference strongly opposed the proposals to weaken the bill.

Exclusions Beaten

By a 48-42 margin, the Senate rejected an amendment by Sen. Howard H. Baker, Jr. (R-Tenn.) which would have largely nullified the bill's coverage of single family homes. A more sweeping exclusion, proposed by Sen. Robert F. Byrd (D-W.Va.), was rejected earlier, 56-38.

A number of less controversial amendments were adopted, some in keeping with promises given to persuade senators to support cloture. But a bipartisan majority held firm against any major cutbacks in coverage.

Voting lineups shifted as the Senate agreed to add an unrelated "anti-riot" section to the civil rights bill—even though it was ruled out-of-order as nongermane by Vice Pres. Humphrey, acting as is customary on the advice of the Senate's parliamentarian.

The obvious desire of a big Senate majority to go on record as opposed to rioting led to a unanimous consent agreement to permit the introduction of an anti-riot section to the bill and its subsequent approval by an 82-13 vote.

The basic anti-riot provision

Meany Stresses Urgency Of Riot Panel's Program

FUTURE EXPANSION of the AFL-CIO headquarters was made possible with the completion of the sale of the land and building immediately north of the AFL-CIO building. Federation Pres. George Meany signs the papers transferring the title of the property to the AFL-CIO. Situated at the corner of 16th and I Streets, N. W., the site is occupied by the Lafayette Hotel. The hotel is operated by William C. and Thomas H. Pickford. With Meany at the signing ceremony were (from left) the William C. Pickfords, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, Harry J. Kane, Jr., president of Columbia Title Co., and Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Pickford. The Pickfords received a 3.5-year lease to continue operation of the hotel, Meany reported.

'Long-Held' Union View Reflected

By David L. Perlman

A presidential commission's call for massive "national action" to generate jobs, housing, education and hope for millions trapped in black ghettos reflects "long-held views of the labor movement," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

Meany praised both the "thrust" and the "sense of urgency" of the unanimous report of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders. (Excerpts, Page 6.)

The commission called for an emergency program to create a million public service jobs for the hard-core unemployed — a step strongly urged by the 1967 AFL-CIO convention and described as "essential" by the federation's Executive Council at its recent meeting.

This should be matched by a concerted effort to put another million disadvantaged workers in private industry jobs and training, the commission said. Other recommendations in the 250,000-word report included a higher minimum wage and expanded coverage.

Meany termed the commission's report "of inestimable value." He said it "fully justifies Pres. Johnson's confidence that a group of thoughtful American leaders, drawn from a broad spectrum of American society, could and would evolve a program to meet the most critical

Talks Shift to White House:

President Spurs Bargaining To Resolve Copper Strike

By Eugene A. Kelly

Top-level leaders of copper management and labor faced each other across a White House table in a confrontation arranged by Pres. Johnson to help resolve the eight-month-old strike of 60,000 copper workers.

It was the first time since July 15 that top management and labor sat around the same table. They met first with the President and four cabinet members, then moved to the adjoining Executive Offices building for face-to-face talks.

The talks were continuing as the AFL-CIO News went to press, with the primary emphasis on establishing a format under which meaningful negotiations might be resumed.

Until the President brought the negotiators to the White House, repeated union efforts to get "realistic" offers from the industry's Big Four companies had been rebuffed. Several of the 26 unions involved in the strike have reached agreement, meanwhile, with three smaller independents on terms more than double the best offer made by any of the industry leaders—the Anaconda Co., Kennecott Copper Corp., American Smelting & Refining Co. and Phelps Dodge Corp.

In the White House Cabinet Room, Johnson expressed his appreciation to labor and management for responding promptly to his invitation to "discuss the copper dispute."

Asserting his belief in collective bargaining, the President urged both sides to "get on with their bargaining on an urgent, intensive, around-the-clock basis."

Free collective bargaining, Johnson said, "is the keystone of our industrial democracy. This is the way

Union Actors Return Drama To Ford Stage

By Duane Emme

The stage of Ford's Theater in Washington, darkened by an assassin's bullet for 103 years, again resounds with live drama—thanks to the persistence of Actors' Equity and its president, Frederick O'Neal.

As every schoolboy learns, Pres. Abraham Lincoln was shot at Ford's at 10:15 p.m. on April 14, 1865, by John Wilkes Booth. Taken to a rooming house across the street, Lincoln died at 7:22 a.m., April 15, without regaining consciousness.

The shot that dropped the curtain on a comedy, "Our American Cousin," also closed the

Johnson Urges Legislative 'Tools' To Combat Soaring Health Costs

The government shouldn't have to pay $11 for a prescription drug that can be bought under another name for $1.25, Pres. Johnson told Congress as he asked for legislative tools to lower the "exorbitant" cost of many drugs and to hold down soaring hospital costs.

At the same time, in a broad-ranging "Health in America" message to Congress, the President asked more money for health care for children and a stepped-up program for training doctors, nurses, technicians and other health care specialists.

He called for expanded research, more voluntary assistance in family planning, bigger grants to state and local health agencies, and a doubling of funds for regional medical centers to reduce the toll of the "killer" ailments—heart disease, cancer and stroke.

It was the section on drug costs, however, that pitted the President against the powerful drug manufacturers' lobby.

The government pays out millions of dollars in reimbursement for the price of prescription drugs under a variety of federally-supported programs, including medicaid,

REGIONAL CONFERENCE held at the Americana Hotel in New York by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security was attended by more than 100 union representatives. Pres. Dominic N. Fornaro of the Baltimore AFL-CIO (in front of blackboard) raises a point. To his left are West Virginia AFL-CIO Pres. Miles C. Stanley and Julius F. Rothman of the AFL-CIO social security staff.

Union Role Stressed:

Social Needs Cited At Regional Parley

New York—Local unions were urged here to make known their needs and interests to the AFL-CIO in the areas of social security and social welfare information with a view toward serving their members more effectively.

The advice came from Dir. Bert Seidman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security and Stanton Smith, the federation's coordinator of state and city central bodies, at a two-day regional conference on social security, the first of a series in various U.S. regions.

Delegates, representing unions in the northeastern region, focused on Old Age, Survivors & Disability Insurance, medicare, unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation, health, poverty and welfare. Experts in each field took part in four workshops.

The consensus of speakers and conference delegates was that the nation's urgent needs in the Viet Nam war, the drive against poverty and significant changes in factors involving public welfare have resulted in much confusion across the nation.

Speakers pointed to the sharp increase in America's elderly population, unforeseen gaps in coverage under medicare, unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation benefits that lag behind realistic needs, the skyrocketing cost of health coverage in the light of recent advances in federal and state aid programs, and the role of social insurance and public assistance measures in the war on poverty.

The close relationship between welfare resources and the needs of heavily-populated urban areas was emphasized by Christopher M. Mould, deputy national coordinator and staff director of the National Urban Coalition. Mould reviewed the expansion of the Urban Coalition plan, emphasizing its close relationship to the war against poverty and the model cities program.

New Resources Cited

He predicted that former Health, Education & Welfare Sec. John W. Gardner, as head of the Urban Coalition, "will bring new resources to bear in our nation's effort to change the worsening complexion of our cities."

An impressive array of literature and guidelines on federal, state and AFL-CIO services and programs were brought to the attention of conference delegates.

The AFL-CIO he said is always "ready and willing to come to your aid with almost anything within our province. All you need do is let us know, and we'll try to schedule regional meetings on almost any subject within our purview and budgetary means."

Ford's Theater 'Lives' Once More Thanks to Efforts of Actors' Equity

theater. The government bought it and used it as an office building. In 1932, Ford's was transferred to the National Park Service, which reopened it as a museum.

In 1964, Congress authorized $2.7 million to restore Ford's based on a Park Service plan to return the theater to its exact appearance on the fateful night, complete with stage setting and a sound-and-light representation of the shooting.

A Better Idea

It was then that Equity, the theater performers' union, and O'Neal, thought they had a better idea.

Couldn't the theater be restored to also allow for live performances? The more O'Neal and union members asked themselves that question, the more certain they were that the answer was "yes."

Further, O'Neal felt that the plan developed by the Park Service was "morbidly preoccupied with Lincoln's tragic death" and would appeal only to "the macabre interests of people."

Searching into Lincoln's history, the union found that the President was "an ardent theater goer," having attended more than 40 performances at Ford's and other Washington theaters during his years in the White House.

Lincoln liked all sorts of plays, but particularly enjoyed Shakespeare's comedies. Asked why, he once replied, "A hearty laugh relieves me, and I seem better able to bear my cross."

O'Neal believed that it would be especially appropriate for the theater to present the classics Lincoln enjoyed so much, as well as dramatic works about the great President.

In a letter to Sec. of the Interior Stewart L. Udall in November 1964, O'Neal asked that "the professional people of the American theater" be given a chance to meet with him and explain their plan in detail.

Plans Reviewed

Udall expressed interest in the idea and a few weeks later, met with representatives of the Park Service, Equity, theater associations and several other persons interested in the Ford project.

Attending the meeting for Equity were O'Neal; Vice Pres. Theodore Bikel; Milton Lyon, a union theatrical expert; Jack Golodner, the union's legislative representative, and Hugh Hardy, an architect retained by the union.

After the meeting, Udall ordered a restudy of restoration plans to include a theater. But Equity still had some convincing to do. The Park Service balked at changing its plan on grounds the cost would be excessive.

The union, at its own expense, assembled theatrical experts, stage designers, and cost analysts. Four more months of meetings were needed before the Park Service was won over.

A new firewall had to be built between the stage and the audience; lighting had to be installed so as not to conflict with the theater's period atmosphere; several other changes were needed. But total extra costs amounted to only about $75,000.

In January of this year the theater held a special "preview" program before an audience that included Pres. Johnson's cabinet. On Lincoln's Birthday, the theater opened to the public, presenting Stephen Vincent Benet's "John Brown's Body."

The opening reperotory is the product of the National Reperotory Theater, sponsored by the Ford's Theater Society, a private, nonprofit group engaged in a $1.1 million fund-raising campaign for the theater.

As Ford's progresses into future reperotories, it seems entirely possible that O'Neal, a veteran actor, will get the opportunity to perform in the theater he helped to save.

Meanwhile, he has a prized memento of Equity's long battle to restore live drama to Ford's. It came in the form of a note sent to him in 1965 by the late Carl Sandburg, Pulitzer Prize biographer of Lincoln.

Attached to an explanation of Equity's proposal, the note simply said, "Amen, with all my heart, to Frederick O'Neal's statement."

Unions Speak for 45% Of Federal Workers

Unions of federal employes now bargain for 45 percent of all government workers, the Civil Service Commission announced.

It reported that, as of last November, 1,238,748 federal employes were represented by unions which held exclusive bargaining rights. This was an increase of nearly 185,000 in the 15 months since the previous CSC survey.

The four top unions in terms of federal workers represented are all AFL-CIO affiliates.

The American Federation of Government Employes led with bargaining rights for 326,432 workers—an increase of 118,749 in the 15 months.

The Postal Clerks represented 306,729 workers, the Letter Carriers bargained for 192,045, and councils affiliated with the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. represented 80,454 workers.

The largest non-affiliated union in terms of worker representation was the National Association of Government Employes, with 44,477.

The figures refer only to exclusive representation bargaining units, not to union membership.

The Post Office Dept. has the largest number of employes in exclusive bargaining units—609,000. It is followed by the Navy Dept., Army, Air Force and Veterans Administration.

The commission reported that 86 percent of postal workers, 54 percent of blue collar workers and 21 percent of white collar workers in the government are represented by unions with exclusive recognition.

There are 1,813 separate bargaining units in the government where a union has obtained exclusive bargaining rights by demonstrating its majority. In addition, there are 1,172 units where at least one union has formal recognition, with more than 10 percent membership but less than a majority.

National Pact Boosts Pay of Tank Painters

The Painters have negotiated a new two-year national tank agreement providing wage increases ranging from 85 cents to $1.20 an hour, plus other contract improvements for tank painters.

Raises of 47.5 to 80 cents an hour are effective immediately for several thousand members under the new pact with the National Tank Fabricating & Erection Contractors and other painting firms, Pres. S. Frank Raftery said.

Negotiated on a national level, the agreement will affect remote areas so sparsely populated that it has been difficult until now to insure union wages and conditions. The new pact means that most wage rates will be higher than those prevailing on the local level, Raftery said.

A new subcontracting clause guarantees contract wages and conditions not less than those in the national tank agreement. Another provision mandates a job notice for each job, with information needed by area business agents. Other contract terms call for a dues checkoff system and a bond of $3,000 posted by contractors to insure fringe benefit payments.

Roland Williams Heads D. C.'s 'Project Build'

The Greater Washington Central Labor Council announced the appointment of Roland J. Williams as director of Project Build, a program designed to give 160 disadvantage youngsters practical job training and an opportunity to qualify for apprenticeship openings.

The government-financed program is being carried out in cooperation with the Washington Building & Construction Trades Council and several community organizations.

Williams, a long-time member of the Oil Workers, has been a manpower development specialist with the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training.

3-to-9% Raises Proposed For Government Employes

The government has proposed salary increases of from 3 to nearly 9 percent to close half the gap between the pay federal white collar employes receive and comparable jobs in private industry.

Postal workers will receive a second-step 5 percent increase in July under legislation passed last year. For other salaried government employes, Congress decreed a two-step catch-up raise—this July and in July of 1969. All employes were guaranteed at least a 3 percent raise this July.

The Civil Service Commission said it has worked out proposed salary schedules on the basis of 1967 Bureau of Labor Statistics surveys and sent them to federal employe unions for comments.

It would give employes in the six lowest grades of the classified civil service the minimum 3 percent raise and provide higher percentage increases for those in the professional-level grades. In general, the higher the grade, the higher the percentage increase. However the handful of officials in the top GS-18 "supergrade" would be limited to a 3.7 percent raise to keep their salaries under the $28,000 ceiling set by Congress.

Pay scales of the government's blue-collar workers are set on the basis of area wage surveys and are not affected by the July salary adjustments.

Higher Wage Floor Sought by TWUA

New York—Executive council members of the Textile Workers Union of America called on Congress to raise the federal minimum wage floor to $2 an hour "as soon as possible."

The council also called for extension of the minimum wage to 11 million additional workers.

The $1.60 minimum that took effect for many workers in February is "far short of realistic needs." The 22-member council said a raise in the minimum would be " the quickest and most effective blow the Congress could strike in the war on poverty.

Johnson Cites Urgency:

Copper Strike Talks Shift to White House

labor disputes should be settled."

Union representatives at the meeting included Presidents I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers, Walter P. Reuther of the Auto Workers, P. L. Siemiller of the Machinists, Gordon Freeman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, and USWA Vice Pres. Joseph P. Molony, chairman of the unions' National Nonferrous Coordinating Committee.

Also present were Lane Kirkland, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, and Co-chairman A. C. Skinner of the USWA Nonferrous Industry Conference.

Among top company officials were Board Chairman E. L. Tittman and Vice Pres. Douglas H. Soutar of ASARC, Pres. C. Jay Parkinson and Vice Pres. William Kirkpatrick of Anaconda, Pres. Frank R. Milliken and Vice Pres. E. J. Flynn of Kennecott, Chairman Robert Page and Vice Pres. Walter C. Lawson of Phelps Dodge.

Four cabinet members addressed the conferees after Johnson spoke. They were Defense Sec. Clark Clifford, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Commerce Sec. C. R. Smith and Treasury Sec. Henry H. Fowler. All stressed the importance of copper to the U.S. economy.

Johnson stepped into the dispute after other mediatory efforts by the government and leaders of Congress had failed. The latest such effort was made for the secretaries of labor and commerce by a three-member panel —Prof. George Taylor of the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School; George Reedy, former White House press secretary, and Msgr. George G. Higgins, director of the Social Action Dept. of the United States Catholic Conference.

The panel report, made public Feb. 17, noted three basic needs of the unions in bargaining—needs the panel termed "preconditions." They were:

- Common expiration dates for all labor-management contracts within a company, including its industry subsidiaries.
- A company-wide economic "package" to be applied equally to each unit within a company, making minor allowances for local conditions.
- An accepted rule within each corporation that settlement must be achieved at all operations before any operations are resumed.

The companies also had "preconditions," the panelists reported—retention of existing bargaining arrangements, and separate economic treatment for the "different businesses" within each company.

3-Group Plan

The panel recommended that the parties shelve these "preconditions" and bargain within each company for three separate groupings: copper mining, smelting and refining; units producing other nonferrous metals; copper wire and cable and brass fabricating plants.

The union coordinating committee said the suggestions would "perpetuate the outdated and one-sided method of collective bargaining long practiced" by the companies and would "only formalize the fragmentation of bargaining into three categories.

The committee said "we cannot tolerate any arrangement which would freeze indefinitely the inequities and injustices" long suffered by employes. The companies, they said, "have consistently refused to bargain" on the "urgent and painful economic problems long endured" in the industry.

To meet the needs of the 60,000 strikers and their families while the dispute continues, the AFL-CIO Executive Council called on 60,000 local unions and central bodies to support labor's "adopt-a-striker" program.

The strike has closed 61 properties of 11 companies in 23 states.

The Big Four corporations made one wage offer in June. They had not improved it by contract expiration time, nor in any major degree since.

Steelworkers Parley to Get Dues Proposal

Pittsburgh — The Steelworkers executive board announced that it will recommend to a special convention Mar. 20 in Atlantic City that dues be raised $5 a month from April through August, with a new and permanent dues schedule to take effect Sept. 1.

Under the permanent schedule, dues would be equal to two hours pay per month for the union's 1.2 million members in the United States, Canada and Puerto Rico. No member would pay less than $5 a month or more than $10 under the proposal.

The board recommended in January that a strike and defense fund be created by raising dues temporarily from $5 a month to $10 for a five-month period to establish an emergency fund of approximately $25 million.

At a Mar. 1 meeting the board agreed to propose the two-hour formula for permanent dues, with receipts divided as follows: the first $5 a month to be divided equally between the local union and the international union, as at present; amounts in excess of $5 a month to be divided equally between the defense fund, the local and the international, except that if the latter amount cannot be divided into three equal parts, the extra 1 or 2 cents will go to the defense fund.

The union, which now has no strike fund, has been assisting many of the 60,000 copper workers on strike since July 15 in 23 states. Monthly dues have been $5 since 1956.

Chamber, NAM Fight Safety Bill

The National Association of Manufacturers and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce took a "leave it to the boss" attitude towards on-the-job safety and health.

Both employer organizations testified against the labor-supported Administration bill which would establish federal safety standards and enforcement procedures.

They told a House Labor subcommittee that employers are all for safety and it would be nice if workers paid more attention to safety rules. Anyway, they insisted, industry's safety record is much better than it was many years ago.

The Chamber of Commerce suggested that perhaps a "national dialogue" on safety would be more useful than legislation. Perhaps "a National Safety Commission could be convened to investigate and report," it said.

The problem, if there is a problem, the chamber said should be approached "with all deliberate speed, but not with haste."

The NAM insisted that safety is a matter of education, not of legislation. But if there has to be some regulation, industry would rather deal with state officials.

Clothing Negotiations Seek Scholarship Plan

New York—The Clothing Workers opened negotiations here on a new contract for 125,000 workers that includes a proposal for an employer-financed scholarship program.

The union also seeks a 75-cent-an-hour wage increase and other benefits from 700 manufacturers of men's and boy's clothing, represented by the Clothing Manufacturers' Association.

An ACWA statement on its proposal for a national scholarship fund declared that higher education for children of workers is "a right" to which they are entitled.

The high costs of college and technical school training "make it difficult, if not impossible, for children of working people to get the education they need," ACWA said.

The union also noted the success of an employer-financed scholarship program established by ACWA's Chicago Joint Board under which more than 100 youths are now attending institutions of higher learning with yearly grants of $600 each.

Union negotiators, headed by ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky, said wage boosts are justified by rising living costs, settlements in other industries and high profits in the clothing industry.

The 75 cents being sought by the union, they added, along with minimum wages for job classifications would "help to overcome this disadvantage."

Other proposals include increased retirement and hospitalization benefits, additional holidays, "call-in" pay protection, and safeguards to protect workers against companies seeking to import from or license foreign firms.

The union also is seeking the right to reopen the contract before its expiration date in the event of an unusual rise in the cost of living.

All told, the ACWA asked for 21 changes in the present contract, which expires this June 1.

Rail Signalmen Call for Talks On Pay Hikes

Chicago—The Railroad Signalmen asked the nation's railroads to open negotiations on contract improvements including wage increases totaling 25 percent over a three-year period, additional hikes for skilled workers, and a cost-of-living escalator to protect the union's 11,500 members.

Pres. C. J. Chamberlain called on rail managements to create a Joint Carriers' Conference Committee and to start talks on wage improvements to take effect July 1, plus a cost-of-living clause starting next Oct. 1.

Signal work usually is performed under difficult and hazardous conditions, at all hours of the day and night, in all kinds of weather conditions, and demands "exacting standards of safety," Chamberlain said, adding:

"We are determined to remove the wage inequities which have too long prevailed for these skilled employes, whose work is essential to safe and efficient movement" of U.S. trains.

The union said its members average $3.26 an hour for installing and maintaining traffic control systems, automatic crossing gates, car retarder systems and other signal equipment. The wage differential between skilled and semi-skilled employes is "compressed severely," and a "huge gulf" exists between skilled signal workers and other skilled workers, Chamberlain said.

OCAW to Seek 'Better Deal' In Fall Talks

Denver—The Oil Workers will seek considerably larger wage and benefit increases from the oil industry in negotiations next fall than in previous years, it was evident from comments by officers of the union and 275 delegates at a conference on bargaining plans here.

OCAW Pres. A. F. Grospiron declared, "We have a right, and a duty, to set our goals high in 1968 negotiations. The money is there, the profit is there, and unit labor costs are low. We intend to see that the workers get a better deal."

Grospiron emphasized that it was too early for the union to firm up its contract proposals, but he indicated that they would include sizable wage increases, and larger company contributions to benefit plans.

Safety Emphasized

He added that the companies are going to have to pay more attention to health and safety conditions on the job and praised the Johnson Administration's proposals for federal industrial health and safety legislation.

Grospiron said he considers it unfair that unions be asked to exercise restraint in their demands. "The companies are not restraining themselves on either prices or profits. It is unfair to ask the working man to bear the burden," he said.

The delegates spent a day and a half in separate meetings of 13 company-wide councils—each consisting of delegates from locals having bargaining rights with a particular oil company.

In the closing session, spokesmen for these councils presented their suggestions for 1968 negotiating goals, with substantial wage increases" leading the list.

JOB SEEKERS are helped in finding work by "TV Job Center," a call-in program presented three nights a week by WETA-TV, Channel 26, in Washington. On a recent program, Pres. William Simons (left) of Teachers Local 6 discusses teaching opportunities with Harland Randolph, the show's on-camera man. In the background are trained counselors provided by D.C. and Maryland Employment Services.

Television Program Opens Job Channels

A high school graduate in Silver Spring, Md., was rejected by employers because he held a 1-A draft card. He called a Washington, D.C., television station and now he has a job in a federal agency.

Actually, it wasn't that simple. The youth had to check out a number of "leads" furnished him. But producers of "TV Job Center" say he is an example of how their program aids unemployed workers.

The program, on WETA-TV, Channel 26—an educational television station—brings together persons looking for work and employers, private and government, who have jobs available.

Underway since November, "Job Center" is presented from 7 to 7:30 p.m., Monday through Wednesday, in cooperation with the U.S. Employment Service, the Civil Service Commission and the Washington Urban League.

In addition to establishing communication between employers and job-seekers, the program provides information on training opportunities and probes difficulties related to seeking, finding and holding jobs.

Eight trained employment counselors, provided by the District and Maryland State Employment Services, are "on camera" to field calls from prospective workers and employers.

Guests Interviewed

The program is moderated by Harland Randolph, executive assistant to the president of the new Federal City College in Washington. He announces job openings, dispenses information and interviews guests.

Mayor Walter E. Washington of the District of Columbia was an early guest on the show. He surveyed the job situation in the District and answered calls from persons with employment problems.

Pres. William Simons of Teachers Local 6 in Washington was a recent guest, discussing teaching opportunities in the nation's capital and educational problems. He also fielded questions telephoned in by viewers.

The opening of "Job Center" was announced by Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, who urged employers "to use the program to advertise for employes," particularly from low-income areas.

Praised By Humphrey

Humphrey lauded the program idea as "one of the most exciting opportunities in the country" for dramatizing the critical problem of unemployment and actually doing something about it.

Meanwhile, "Variety," the entertainment newspaper, has reported that there now are more than a score of television stations across the country presenting job placement shows of one kind or another.

Two of the earliest were weekly shows presented by WBBM-TV in Chicago and WTMJ-TV in Milwaukee. Among other stations with plans for shows this year are: KPIX-TV, Portland, Ore.; WJW-TV, Cleveland; WLAC-TV, Nashville, and KOOL-TV, Phoenix.

L.A. City Council Asks Arbitration by Hearst

Los Angeles—New moves to end the 85-day strike-lockout at the Hearst-owned Herald-Examiner were proposed by city officials here.

The 15-man city council, with three members absent, unanimously urged appointment of a nationally-known arbitrator, with final and binding authority, to help settle the stalemate between 10 AFL-CIO unions and the nation's largest afternoon daily.

The unions promptly announced their acceptance of the proposal. A company publicist said management had "no comment."

A similar move paved the way to a three-year agreement last week in the disputes which had closed San Francisco's two major papers, the Hearst-owned Examiner and the independent Chronicle.

The resolution adopted by the city council here noted the strike-lockout had idled 2,000 trade unionists and "resulted in the introduction of an element—the professional strikebreaker—whose presence in the community adds nothing of economic or social substance but poses a constant source of unrest, violence and annoyance."

Union officials followed the council move with a telegram to Mayor Sam Yorty urging that he appoint a third party of national repute in the public interest.

The wire said the arbitrator should be instructed to "immediately preside over meaningful bargaining."

Labor Accepts Plan

"Mindful of the satisfactory resolution of a similar dispute in San Francisco, the undersigned hereby agree to comply with the terms of the resolution passed by the chosen representatives of the citizens of your city," the wire to Yorty said.

"We expect publisher George R. Hearst, Jr., to similarly respond to the stated will of the people," the unions added.

The city council measure urged that any negotiations undertaken by the parties should include conditions for longterm peace, such as common termination of all agreements and built-in no-strike no-lockout machinery.

The city's new move for an armistice came as Los Angeles labor continued economic pressures, including subscription cancellation drives and boycott activity against advertisers in the struck Herald-Examiner.

Several earlier efforts by state and federal mediators to get negotiations going have been futile.

Workers Share Up Under Kaiser Plan

Fontana, Calif.—More than 5,500 employes of Kaiser Steel Co. divided $270,387 Feb. 29 under the long-range sharing plan negotiated by the Steelworkers.

The cash payment for January was the first under recent amendments to the plan. It was the equivalent of 32 cents per hour worked—an increase of 15 cents an hour over the former plan, union and company said in a joint statement.

They described the plan as based on sharing cost savings rather than profits. It measures productivity at Kaiser's Fontana plant and shares the gains among employes and the company.

LBJ Calls for Action To Cut Health Costs

medicare, and child health. And sometimes, Johnson said, it overpays.

He cited recent surveys showing that 12 drugs of the same type sell at retail for prices ranging from $1.25 to $11 for 30 tablets.

"The taxpayer should not be forced to pay $11 if the $1.25 drug is equally effective," the President insisted. "To do this would permit robbery of private citizens with public approval."

Johnson asked authority for the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare to set a "reasonable cost range to govern reimbursement for drugs" provided under federal programs.

He said a physician could prescribe a more expensive drug if he insisted—but reimbursement would be limited to the ceiling price set by the government.

To free physicians from dependence on drug company salesmen for information, Johnson sought legislation authorizing the government to prepare an official "compendium" of drugs, in cooperation with manufacturers, physicians and pharmacists.

It would include "complete and accurate information about prescription drugs—use and dosage, warnings, manufacturer, generic and brand names, and facts about their safety and effectiveness."

The President cited "sobering" estimates that by 1975, payments for general hospital services will be 250 percent higher than in 1965—more than 10 times the general increase in living costs.

He urged a number of voluntary and cooperative steps to reduce unnecessary hospitalization.

Johnson said the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare will begin extensive tests of "incentives" to control the cost of hospital care, and he asked Congress to authorize new methods of paying hospital bills under federal programs.

At present, the government pays the actual cost of the hospital services plus a fee to the hospital—comparable to a "cost-plus" contract with industry.

"We must find ways to encourage efficiency and penalize waste," the President said. The White House indicated that payments might be limited to the "average" cost of hospital care—penalizing inefficient hospitals. But a hospital which provided equal services for below-average costs would be able to share the savings with the government.

Overall, in his message, the President put heavy stress on "the inexcusably high rate of infant mortality" and noted that among poor families it was double the national average.

He called for a $58 million increase in appropriations for maternal and child health care programs.

To meet the health needs of poor children, Johnson asked Congress for $1.4 billion for child care services under medicaid and other federal programs—an increase of $215 million.

Other Programs

He asked continuation of medical research at $1.5 billion a year, citing the dramatic accomplishments of past research.

The President proposed a consolidation and expansion of five health manpower programs which are due to expire this year. They include both aid to medical and other health care schools and expanded loan and scholarship programs for students.

In other areas, the message called for development of accident-rescue programs in states and communities, utilizing or adapting techniques developed in combat. Johnson also established a high-level Council on Physical Fitness & Sports, to be headed by Vice Pres. Humphrey.

Overall, he said, the federal government now pays $14 billion of the nearly $50 billion a year spent for health services in the United States.

Federal health spending, the President said, is $5 billion more than it was four years ago, and the Administration has budgeted $16 billion for the next fiscal year.

NLRB Address List Rule Passes High Court Test

The Supreme Court refused to review a lower U.S. court ruling that a North Carolina hosiery firm must furnish the names and addresses of its workers to the National Labor Relations Board for use by a union in a representation election.

The case was the first to reach the high court on the labor board's so-called Excelsior rule—a requirement that an employer must provide a name-and-address list to insure that both labor and management can communicate with all eligible voters.

The Supreme Court's action let stand a decision by the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in a case involving Hanes Hosiery Division of the Hanes Corp., which had refused to supply the list.

A U.S. District Court refused to grant the NLRB's petition for a subpoena requiring Hanes to produce a list of employes in its plants near Winston-Salem, N. C., shortly before a scheduled election sought by the Textile Workers Union of America, AFL-CIO. The 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals at Richmond, Va., reversed the lower court and the company went to the Supreme Court with a petition for review.

The rule was first enunciated by the NLRB in the Excelsior Underwear case, Feb. 4, 1966. It has since been applied in other NLRB elections and upheld by two appeals courts—the 4th Circuit in the Hanes case and the 7th Circuit, Chicago, in a case involving Crane Packing Co., Morton Grove, Ill., and the Auto Workers, with the Machinists as intervenors.

The Supreme Court agreed to hear oral argument in two cases in which a special three-judge federal court held the Arkansas full-crew law unconstitutional. The cases involved the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, four other unions and six railroads, including the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific.

The cases had been on remand from the high court after a decision that the state law requiring six crewmen on all but short-line freight trains was not preempted by the 1963 federal compulsory arbitration law. The three-judge court held that the 1907 state law is arbitrary, violates the due process clause and unduly burdens interstate commerce.

Mixed Impact on Unions:

Gradual Rise Seen In Prefabrication

Growth of prefabrication in the construction industry will be "evolutionary but not revolutionary" between now and 1975, according to a study completed for the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

The study was authorized by the department's 1965 convention and was conducted by the Battelle Memorial Institute of Columbus, Ohio, one of the world's largest privately-operated research organizations.

"A main basis for the survey," BCTD Pres. C. J. Haggerty said, "is that no one ever before had basic information concerning the entire scope of prefabrication. As far as we know, this is the first study of its kind."

One main objective of the study was to determine what effect the growth in prefabrication will have on members of the 18 international unions affiliated with the department.

On this score, the study concluded that "anticipated advances in prefabrication and technology during the next decade appear to offer 'opportunities' to half of the affiliates and 'threats' to the other half."

Unions Affected

It found that the Operating Engineers and Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers would benefit most and the Painters least.

The Operating Engineers, it continued, "will encounter the greatest need for increased skills by 1975 due to prefabrication and other advances in technology."

The Plumbers & Pipefitters, Carpenters and IBEW "will be the affiliates affected the most by the reallocation of work from job site to factory" as the use of prefabricated materials expands, the study found.

More than 90 pages of the 236-page report are given over to the effect prefabrication will have on building trades unions between now and 1975.

Charts measure the "expected impact" of prefabrication on building trades affiliates in areas of manpower, skills and location for hundreds of types of work performed by the crafts.

In its general conclusions, the study found that "the art of prefabrication" is more widely used than most people realize but that its advance is "slow and evolutionary in nature."

It cited several main constraints to any rapid advancement of prefabrication—lack of public acceptance based on tradition, building codes and the existing structure of the construction industry.

Further, it noted, "reductions in initial building costs derived from prefabrication have not generally met expectations."

The study foresaw stronger advances in the use of prefabrication in nonresidential building and in high-rise apartment buildings than in homes and low-rise apartments.

Rolland B. Guy, who directed the study for Battelle and explained its highlights at a press conference, reported that prefabrication is having a significant effect on European construction methods. But he saw little likelihood that European building firms would be able to "make inroads" into the U.S. market before 1975.

The Europeans are encountering a number of obstacles that they have not been able to overcome, such as U.S. building codes and bidding requirements, Guy said.

Haggerty said the department has "reached no conclusions" on the study and intends to give it "careful and full consideration" before doing so.

"Battelle was given a free hand in their 11-month conduct of the study and preparation of their report," he said. "We desired only a completely objective and realistic appraisal with the chips falling where they might."

PITTSBURGH TEACHERS walk a picket line outside Liberty School as pupils join them in a holiday from school. Members of AFT Local 400 established a demonstration picket line to protest School Board refusal to sanction a representation election permitting all teachers to choose a collective bargaining representative.

San Francisco's Teachers Granted Bargaining Vote After 1-Day Strike

San Francisco—Union teachers used the strike weapon to secure a collective bargaining election and a time-table for contract negotiations from a reluctant school administration.

The victory was gained despite the restraints of a state law and a court injunction asked by the rival California Teachers Association, affiliate of the National Education Association.

After a day of picketing by 1,500 members of Teachers Local 61, Mayor Joseph Alioto mediated the dispute with these results:

School officials agreed to poll 4,500 city teachers on their choice of a bargaining agent—union or association—and to complete negotiations by May 1 on economic items, by May 31 on noneconomic issues.

The mayor's office distributed ballots for an immediate election, with results to be announced before week's end. School officials agreed to an early start of negotiations on a 13-point program of union objectives including a reduction in class size, a guaranteed preparation period every day for all teachers, a greater voice for teachers in curriculum preparation and class discipline, longevity pay and other goals.

NEA Asks Injunction

As teachers balloted, court hearings proceeded on an injunction asked by the state NEA body for alleged violation of the state's Winton Act. Passed in 1965, the act forbids school districts to negotiate with teacher groups except through negotiating councils. The union is challenging the act as an unconstitutional interference with teacher rights.

Across the bay, the non-union Oakland Teachers Association, representing 1,900 of that city's 2,700 teachers, threatened to strike unless "meaningful negotiations" are started by the School Board. A strike vote was scheduled for Mar. 13.

Other NEA groups also were resorting to mass action to secure correction of grievances—in Florida, where 22,000 of the state's 60,000 public school teachers stayed off the job; in Pennsylvania, where 20,000 members of the State Education Association staged a mass rally at the capitol for immediate action on salary increases; and in Oklahoma, where school groups are trying to undo Gov. Dewey Bartlett's veto of a school and tax package.

Elsewhere on the union front, Pittsburgh teachers staged the first walkout in local school history, and Washington, D. C., teachers took a "professional" day off and schools were closed while they lobbied on Capitol Hill for delayed salary increases.

Pittsburgh teachers struck when the School Board refused to permit an election despite a ruling by the state attorney general that school boards have the right to allow teachers to choose their bargaining agent. The board asked a county court to enjoin the strike. Meanwhile Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers called on the board to "abandon its irresponsible position" and permit an election. Court deputies arrested more than 50 teachers for picketing.

Labor Urges Congress To Press Job Growth

The AFL-CIO urged Congress to adopt programs to move the economy ahead—and push unemployment down—at a faster rate than outlined by the President's Council of Economic Advisers.

Nathaniel Goldfinger, the federation's research director, termed it unfortunate that the advisory council's economic report earlier this year implied a willingness to accept a 4 percent jobless rate instead of pressing for further reduction of unemployment. His comments were made to the Joint Economic Committee of Congress.

Despite substantial progress since 1963, Goldfinger said, the economic advance has not been able "to provide job opportunities, at decent wages, for all persons who are able to work and desire employment."

The Council of Economic Advisers has also ignored the "lopsided" distribution of the benefits of the economy's improved performance in the 1960s, Goldfinger added. He charged that "a disproportionately great share has gone to business and upper-income families."

Goldfinger saw a danger signal in the leveling off of the unemployment rate last year at about 3.8 percent, which he termed "much too high a level."

The nation's economic advances, he stressed, "failed to provide enough job opportunities . . . particularly for the most disadvantaged job seekers among teenagers, Negroes and unskilled workers."

He warned sharply against "those who claim that the economic advance has gone too far and clamor for unemployment — breeding restrictive policies."

He reminded the congressional committee that the "very restrictive" monetary policy of the Federal Reserve System in 1966 "threw residential construction into a deep recession" and contributed to a general economic slowdown.

"There is danger that similar policies may be pursued in 1968," he warned.

He spoke out also against slashing of federal domestic programs, declaring: "America needs continued progress towards full employment and it needs improved and expanded public facilities and services to meet the needs of a rapidly, growing urban population."

The AFL-CIO statement included the text of key economic policy resolutions adopted at the midwinter meeting of the Executive Council.

College Teachers Win at Kings Point

Kings Point, N. Y.—The United Federation of College Teachers, AFL-CIO, announced an agreement between the union and the administration of the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy here on a collective bargaining contract covering grievance procedure, work load, working conditions, promotions and other non-monetary items affecting the academy faculty.

Salary negotiations, still in progress, will be covered by a separate agreement with the Maritime Administration of the Dept. of Commerce, Pres. Israel Kugler of AFT Local 1460 said.

The agreement is the first between the union and a four-year college in this state. It is also the first such agreement under the late Pres. Kennedy's Executive Order 10988 permitting federal employes to choose a bargaining agent.

CWA Sets Strike Vote In Western Electric Unit

New York—A strike vote among employes of the Western Electric Installation Division was ordered by the Communications Workers after a Mar. 6 negotiating deadline passed without agreement on the union's proposals for a "substantial" pay increase.

A similar vote is likely among employes of the Ohio Bell Co., in the absence of agreement by Mar. 10, CWA said. A half-dozen other Bell System companies also have deadlines during March.

The negotiations have been limited to wage matters, under a reopener provision in CWA's three-year contracts with various Bell companies. The union is free to strike after the deadline has passed without agreement.

About 23,000 people are employed by Western Electric Installation, which has the function of installing and maintaining complex phone equipment: exchanges, switchboards in large business and government offices, and various types of defense work.

CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, in a statement a week before the deadline, had noted the union and Bell appeared to be on a "collision" course.

In a follow-up statement announcing the strike vote, Beirne complained that CWA appeared to have "made little impact" on Western Electric management with a "host of facts and statistics which show sharply rising productivity in the Bell System and a pay pattern which needs drastic upward revision in order to keep pace."

Beirne added that CWA finds it "regrettable" that it has not been able to win agreement from Bell on its concept of the need for substantial pay improvements. He said the union would continue negotiations for an undisclosed period of time, but added:

"Unless there is a change in the situation a strike at Bell is inevitable."

For several weeks, CWA has been backing up its pay demands with a major advertising campaign. A series of newspaper ads in approximately 40 cities, and radio spots in commuter hours on stations in the same areas, have been stressing the fact that CWA's demands "make sense."

"When we talk dollars, we make sense and we mean business," an ad appearing on Mar. 5 declared. The message due to appear in papers this week says "we need a substantial pay increase in the Bell System, and we're ready to strike to get it."

Start Now

IN THE NEXT 90 DAYS the shape and general tone and content of the 1968 elections will be determined in two areas—the record of the second session of the 90th Congress and the primary elections to select candidates for the November voting.

The legislative record of the 90th Congress will be a key element in the presidential and congressional elections. The first session left a heavy load of unfinished business and a trail of badly cut and inadequately funded programs. The current session is faced with the challenge of repairing this damage as well as moving ahead to meet the critical needs of the nation, especially in the urban areas.

But of equal concern is the current campaigning for party nominations for Senate and House seats, for gubernatorial and state house offices, in the primary contests. The tone of the general election campaign, the nature of the candidates are determined in these primaries, which unfortunately are too often given relatively slight attention by the majority of voters.

Participation in primary elections is hampered by a number of problems: the time lag between spring party choices and a final decision in November; the lack of a final record on congressional issues; a general apathy and an inclination to allow the year-round political leaders to choose candidates.

But perhaps the most important barrier is the ineligibility of millions of voters who are not registered.

The low voter turnout in the primaries must be attacked by educational programs to overcome the apathy, unconcern and indifference and the still prevailing mythology that "my vote doesn't make any difference."

There are also complex legal barriers. Many election laws and administrative practices are unreasonable, unfair and outmoded. They obstruct the path to the ballot box and the registration list, disfranchising millions of Americans who want to participate in the electoral decisions.

ORGANIZED LABOR has mounted a register-and-vote campaign of significant importance, a campaign being waged in every precinct in the nation. In the next 90 days this campaign will be in high gear, seeking out the unregistered and aiding them to become eligible voters.

The registration and get-out-the-vote campaign is in the public interest, complementing the drives of other public groups dedicated to getting the widest possible expression of voter sentiment at the polls.

Along with its registration and vote drive, labor is gearing up for the crucial 1968 elections with a campaign to bring the issues to all its members. In the film "Conversation at the White House," in which AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Pres. Johnson discuss the issues of the day, Meany sums up:

"So I urge you to start now. Get your registration drives under way. Collect the COPE dollars which are so necessary to the campaign. Make sure your members and their families and their neighbors know the issues, know the voting record of the candidates, know who is a friend and who is not, and get out the vote on Election Day."

Commission Reports:

Negro 'Subemployment' Makes 'Drastic Impact' on Ghetto Life

The following is excerpted from the summary of the report of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders.

ALTHOUGH THERE HAVE BEEN gains in Negro income nationally, and a decline in the number of Negroes below the "poverty level," the condition of Negroes in the central city remains in a state of crisis. Between 2 and 2.5 million Negroes—16 to 20 percent of the total Negro population of all central cities—live in squalor and deprivation in ghetto neighborhoods.

Employment is a key problem. It not only controls the present for the Negro American but, in a most profound way, it is creating the future as well. Yet, despite continuing economic growth and declining national unemployment rates, the unemployment rate for Negroes in 1967 was more than double that for whites.

Equally important is the undesirable nature of many jobs open to Negroes. Negro men are more than three times as likely as white men to be in low-paying, unskilled or service jobs. This concentration of male Negro employment at the lowest end of the occupational scale is the single most important source of poverty among Negroes.

In one study of low-income neighborhoods, the "subemployment rate," including both unemployment and underemployment, was about 33 to 34 percent, or 8.8 times greater than the over-all unemployment rate for all United States workers.

Employment problems, aggravated by the constant arrival of new unemployed migrants, many of them from depressed rural areas, create persistent poverty in the ghetto. In 1966, about 11.9 percent of the nation's whites and 40.6 percent of its nonwhites were below the "poverty level" defined by the Social Security Administration (currently $3,335 per year for an urban family of four). Over 40 percent of the nonwhites below the poverty level live in the central cities.

Employment problems have drastic social impact in the ghetto. Men who are chronically unemployed or employed in the lowest status jobs are often unable or unwilling to remain with their families. The handicap imposed on children growing up without fathers in an atmosphere of poverty and deprivation is increased as mothers are forced to work to provide support.

The culture of poverty that results from unemployment and family breakup generates a system of ruthless, exploitative relationships within the ghetto. Prostitution, dope addiction, and crime create an environmental "jungle" characterized by personal insecurity and tension. Children growing up under such conditions are likely participants in civil disorder.

A STRIKING DIFFERENCE in environment from that of white-middle-class Americans profoundly influences the lives of residents of the ghetto.

Crime rates, consistently higher than in other areas, create a pronounced sense of insecurity. For example, in one city one low-income Negro district had 35 times as many serious crimes against persons as did a high-income white district. Unless drastic steps are taken, the crime problems in poverty areas are likely to continue to multiply as the growing youth and rapid urbanization of the population outstrips police resources.

Poor health and sanitation conditions in the ghetto result in higher mortality rates, a higher incidence of major diseases and lower availability and utilization of medical services. The infant mortality rate for nonwhite babies under the age of one month is 58 percent higher than for whites; for one to 12 months it is almost three times as high. The level of sanitation in the ghetto is far below that in high income areas. Garbage collection is often inadequate. Of an estimated 14,000 cases of rat bite in the United States in 1965, most were in ghetto neighborhoods.

Ghetto residents believe they are "exploited" by local merchants; and evidence substantiates some of these beliefs. A study conducted in one city by the Federal Trade Commission showed that distinctly higher prices were charged for goods sold in ghetto stores than in other areas.

Lack of knowledge regarding credit purchasing creates special pitfalls for the disadvantaged. In many states garnishment practices compound these difficulties by allowing creditors to deprive individuals of their wages without hearing or trial.

Message to Congress:

President Asks Broad Attack On Soaring Health Care Costs

The following is excerpted from Pres. Johnson's special message to Congress on "Health in America."

VIRTUALLY EVERY FAMILY feels the burden of rising costs of medical care.

Thousands of Americans today are not getting urgently needed medical care because they cannot afford it.

Others pay for it only by giving up necessities, or postponing a long-held dream, or mortgaging their futures.

The outlook is sobering. It has been estimated that between 1965 and 1975, the cost of living will increase by more than 20 percent. But the cost of health care will increase by nearly 140 percent by 1975:

- Average payments per person will nearly double from about $200 a year to some $400 a year.
- Drug payments will rise by 65 percent.
- Dental bills will increase 100 percent.
- Doctors' bills will climb 160 percent.
- Payments for general hospital services will jump 250 percent.

Part of these increases will be for expanded and improved health services. But a large part of the increase will be unnecessary . . .

Last year I appointed a commission of distinguished citizens—physicians, hospital officials, teachers, business executives, and other leaders—to make a comprehensive study of health manpower and medical care.

The commission, which reported in November, cited three major deficiencies in present practices which contribute to unacceptable increases in medical costs:

- Most health insurance plans encourage doctors and patients to choose hospitalization even when other, less costly, forms of care would be equally effective.
- Health professions are generally paid in proportion to the amount of service they render. There are no strong economic incentives to encourage them to avoid providing care that is unnecessary.
- Hospitals charge on a cost basis, which places no penalty on inefficient operations. Moreover, present systems of hospital management make it very difficult to maintain effective control over hospital costs.

The commission concluded:

"If the needs for health care are to be met, the health care system must be organized to employ its resources with more wisdom and effectiveness. The two areas which appear to offer the greatest potential for improvement are (1) reducing necessary or (unnecessarily expensive) medical care and (2) increasing efficiency in the provision of hospital care."

It will not be easy to carry out this recommendation.

But unless we do—unless we act now—health care will not improve as fast as it should.

Congress has recognized this problem of rising medical costs. Late last year it authorized the secretary of health, education and welfare to test different types of payments systems under medicare, medicaid, and the maternal and child health programs.

I have directed the secretary of health, education and welfare to begin immediately extensive tests of incentives designed to reduce the costs of medical care.

First, we must explore ways to prevent unnecessary hospitalization. Our experience in medicare can serve as a guideline. Under that plan, hospital stays are limited to periods which are clearly necessary, and payments are provided for other less expensive types of care which serve the patient equally well: outpatient clinic service, home treatment, nursing home care.

Second, we must test incentives designed to control the cost of hospital care itself. The Health Manpower Commission reported that costs among some of the nation's best hospitals vary by as much as 100 percent, without significant differences in quality or scope of services.

These tests will call for the cooperation of doctors, hospitals and insurance companies.

I recommend that the Congress authorize the secretary of health, education and welfare, under medicare, medicaid and the maternal and child health programs, to employ new methods of payment as they prove effective in providing high quality medical care more efficiently and at lower cost.

It is appropriate that the government—which pays more than 20 percent of the nation's medical bill—take the lead in stemming soaring medical care costs.

This can be only part of the effort. Ultimate success will depend on the ingenuity of our health profession and institutions, and the insurance systems allied with them.

THE REWARDS of success—and the penalties of inaction—demand a dedicated effort by all. Unless the cost spiral is stopped, the nation's health bill could reach a staggering $100 billion by 1975.

Beyond this, we must make certain that the American taxpayer does not pay needlessly high and exorbitant prices for prescription drugs used in federally supported programs.

I recommend that the Congress authorize the secretary of health, education and welfare to establish a reasonable cost range to govern reimbursement for drugs now provided under medicare, medicaid and the maternal and child health programs.

This payment method will apply in all parts of these programs, except in those cases where hospitals and other health care institutions have established effective and reliable systems for cost and quality control.

The physician will be free to select more expensive drugs of the same quality and effectiveness, if he chooses, but reimbursement will be limited to the payment range established by the secretary.

President's Program Hailed:

Further Protections Forecast As Consumers Find Voice

A TOP CONSUMER LOBBYIST for organized labor predicted that new-found consumer power will make 1968 the "consumers' year in Congress."

Evelyn Dubrow, legislative representative for the Ladies' Garment Workers, said last year's battles for meat inspection and rat control united consumers into the effective force it takes to win strong and badly-needed consumer protections.

"In the first half of the 90th Congress, I saw consumer organization as I have never seen it before," she said. Consumers now realize that they "have political muscle, and they will be using it," she said. Miss Dubrow, who is also chairman of the AFL-CIO legislative subcommittee on consumer legislation, was questioned by reporters on the public affairs interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Radio Network.

Miss Dubrow praised the strengthened "truth-in-lending" bill passed by the House of Representatives and said there will be a major effort to sustain provisions covering revolving credit accounts of department stores and mail order houses, and wage garnishments as well as the $10 finance disclosure section, in the Senate-House conference. She said the stronger "truth-in-lending" bill is another example of stepped-up consumer action producing results. Grassroots demands for consumer protection will grow, she said.

PRES. JOHNSON'S proposed Office of Consumer Counsel in the Dept. of Justice "is a splendid idea," she commented. "It is like preventive medicine applied to the consumer field . . . and will do a great deal to clean out the people who are the exploiters of the poor, the housewives, and other purchasers," she asserted.

Questioning Miss Dubrow on the AFL-CIO produced program were Robert Walters for the Washington Evening Star and Sam Sharkey of the Newhouse Newspapers.

By Press Associates, Inc.

WHEN BUSINESS GROUPS gather in Washington or elsewhere they often invite a representative of one of several federal anti-trust enforcement agencies.

It's all a rather pleasant affair. Discussion usually centers on subjects remote from the particular business group or a vague but warm suggestion how the agency will be helpful to business and "hand in hand" they will march pleasantly into the sunset (or sunrise).

The other day this approach got off the track. Rufus E. Wilson, chief of the Division of General Trades Restraints of the Federal Trade Commission, spoke to the annual convention of the Gypsum Roof Deck Foundation in Washington.

His subject was "Conspiracy Among Competitors" and he laid it squarely on the line.

"The basic principles of conspiracy law are well established," Wilson told the business group, "and it is also well established that blatant conspiracy calls for a stringent response by the enforcement agencies. I can assure you that it will get exactly that response from the Federal Trade Commission."

Wilson told the roofers precisely how the government goes about proving conspiratorial agreements. He said that proof of conspiracy to eliminate competition is not easy and that it was unlikely that one of the conspirators will volunteer to give testimony.

Therefore, he said, "the courts have been most sympathetic about this problem of proof and have allowed the crime to be established by showing of certain acts of the alleged conspirators and by the use of other indirect proof."

He recalled a decision of Judge Stanley Barnes, a former head of the Anti-Trust Division of the Justice Dept., in which he noted, "A Knowing wink can mean more than words."

Wilson gave other examples of how seemingly innocent instances of by-play could be conspiratorial, adding:

"You may surmise from these examples that the courts and the commission will go quite far in inferring from common conduct that competitors have conspired. You would be right. And you would be mistaken in thinking that conspiracy means either formal agreement or cloak and dagger meetings in sinister hide-aways."

SOME OF THE ACTIONS Wilson warned the roofers about were price fixing, product standardization, eliminating competitors, eliminating "cheap" products and "bid peddling," particularly among building contractors.

"We all know," he said, "that businessmen, bent on conspiracy, are terribly sophisticated these days, and are capable of the most disarming masquerades to conceal their true character. Behind the most innocuous facades, we have uncovered secret 'swingers' practicing a kind of mini-morality code of business behavior."

Wilson promised that the FTC would "use all the tools available" to stop elimination of competition because it is "so abhorrent to the antitrust laws and our national economic policy."

If a conspiracy should end up before the Justice Dept., conviction under the Sherman Act could mean a jail sentence or fine—a fine, Wilson said, "which would take a more substantial bite out of corporate coffers."

Criminal conviction, according to Donald Turner, director of Justice Dept.'s Anti-Trust Division, could mean a fine of $1 million for a corporate defendant. Another substantial bite may be taken by treble damages to plaintiffs if the conspirators plead guilty or are convicted.

If the case ends up before the FTC, Wilson said the results could be "even more dire." For example, conspirators might not be allowed to have any contracts. There is precedent for this.

Wilson's candid talk to the roofers may not win him any popularity contests but it will probably be worth far more to the roofers and other business groups than the usual "ole buddy" treatment.

NEW-FOUND CONSUMER POWER will make 1968 the "consumers' year in Congress," Evelyn Dubrow, legislative representative for the Ladies' Garment Workers, predicted on Labor News Conference. Reporters Robert Walters (left) of the Washington Evening Star and Sam Sharkey of the Newhouse Newspapers questioned Miss Dubrow, who is also chairman of the AFL-CIO subcommittee on consumer legislation. The public service program is aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on Mutual Radio.

How to Buy:

New Study Shows Car Costs – And When to Make a Trade

By Sidney Margolius

YOUR BEST BUY in a used car typically is one that is two to three years old.

In the fifth year of a car's life, combined depreciation and repair expenses actually may be larger than for a four-year-old car.

But once you get by the critical fifth year with its typically high repair and parts replacement costs, you have relatively reasonable owner's costs. While repair costs typically rise to another high level in the seventh year, by that time depreciation costs are very low.

These are some of the useful insights into car ownership costs you can glean from a new study by E. M. Cope and L. L. Liston of the U. S. Bureau of Public Roads.

"Depreciation" is the loss in market value each year. Thus, a new car bought for $2,800 has a loss in market value for the first year of $842.

But your total ownership cost is depreciation plus repairs and maintenance. Thus, the new $2,800 car, while it suffers depreciation of $842 has a typical cost for repairs and maintenance of only $58. Its total ownership cost is $900.

Each year the depreciation is less, and the repair bill higher. In the fourth year—normally a reasonable year judging from this study—depreciation is $280 and the repair bill $190.

The facts about car ownership are worth your attention. Car expenses have become a major living expense. The Bureau of Labor Statistics moderate budget for a family of four estimates transportation costs at $68 a month, largely for the family car. This is more than any other item except food ($181); housing ($190), and clothing and personal care ($82). The BLS estimate was based on buying a car two years old and keeping it for four years.

The Bureau of Public Roads in its report points out that depreciation is by far the largest single cost of owning and operating a car.

During the early years, depreciation cost will range from 5.8 cents a mile the first year to 2.8 cents the fourth. Then repair bills jump into the lead. Among medium-cost repair and maintenance expenses often necessary as a car reaches middle age are starter and alternator overhaul, brake relining, universal joint replacement, etc.

The bureau also has updated its estimates of the cost of operating this full-size $2,800 four-door sedan. Average total ownership and operating cost a year, assuming a ten-year average car life and average driving of 10,000 miles a year, is 11 cents a mile, or $1,100 a year ($98 a month).

These average costs over the ten years are: Depreciation, 2.8 cents a mile; maintenance, accessories, parts and tires, 2.1 cents; gas and oil (excluding taxes), 1.7; state and federal gas, excise and registration taxes, 1.2; garage, parking and tolls, 1.8, and insurance 1.4. The gasoline estimate is based on consumption of 14.3 miles to the gallon.

These estimates are lower than the 1967 A.A.A. estimate of $1,360 a year or 13.6 cents a mile (up sharply from the 1965 estimate of 11.8). The AAA estimate, however, is based on a car bought new and traded in after three years.

Nor do these figures even include the cost of financing, which can come to $200 to $300 and even more depending on how much you put down, and where you arrange for the financing.

You can, of course, reduce these high figures somewhat if you don't count the cost of garaging the car. The Bureau of Public Roads estimated this at $10 a month for rental or indirect cost of the owner's garage. The bureau also estimated parking fees at $4.50 a month, which you may or may not need to spend.

To Keep Food Pure:

Rigid Controls Apply To Crop Pesticides

HOW CAN YOU be sure that pesticides used by farmers won't hurt the food you eat?

Americans are increasingly concerned about the nearly 200 million pounds of chemicals used on farm crops each year. The U.S. Food & Drug Administration explains that it keeps a vigilant eye on the use of weed killers, fungicides and other pesticides.

The FDA has established what it refers to as "tolerances" on the amount of pesticide residues permitted on crops. These tolerances are the federally approved safe limits for the use of the chemicals.

As recently as April, 1966, the FDA in conjunction with the Agriculture Dept., said it would set "zero tolerances" as a basis for taking contaminated foods off the market "where a safe, low-level of tolerance cannot be established."

FDA inspectors have the job of making sure that farmers are following the directions specified for the use of pesticides. The examiners collect samples of crops they think are most likely to contain excessive residues. These samples tell how well the farmers comply with the safety rules. Most farmers, the FDA assures us, do comply.

To make doubly sure that harmful amounts of residues do not reach your table, the FDA makes regular examinations of the "total diet" of an average 19 year old male, the nation's largest eater. Tests of the foods, which are bought in regular grocery stores and cooked as a housewife would prepare them, show only mere traces of pesticide residues, the FDA affirms.

WHAT ABOUT that other food hazard we hear so much about—Salmonella?

The FDA admits that contamination of food by Salmonella bacteria is a significant health problem. There are more than 1,000 strains of Salmonella capable of causing infection in man—and outbreaks of these infections have been increasing in recent years.

Foods can be contaminated by Salmonella at any stage of their production. But, the FDA notes, these bacteria can be destroyed by exposure to heat.

The FDA suggests, therefore, that housewives help lessen the threat of Salmonella infections by washing raw foods thoroughly, following carefully the directions on frozen food packages and properly refrigerating all leftovers, dairy products and other perishables.

Soup to Nonsense:

Capitalizing Our Civilization Can Cause REAL Problems

By Jane Goodsell

A COMPLEX CIVILIZATION makes for bizarre hangups and lately I've been having a lot of trouble with words. Not difficult, sophisticated words like CONTINUUM and CRYOBIOLOGY. I can handle those fairly well. My difficulties involve simple, first-grade words like RUN, CAP, BIG, TWO and SLIP.

Capitalized three- and four-letter words don't make sense to me any more. I'm back where I was when I was five years old and knew my ABCs but couldn't make words out of them. In short, I couldn't read. Of course, I learned. I became so proficient that I read the first ten pages of The Critique of Pure Reason, and I'll bet I could do it again.

What I can't read is the printing on my jar of bath powder. It says BODY TALC, and only by concentrating terribly hard can I extract any meaning from those words. If I don't get a tight grip on myself, I'm off on a wild, irrational guessing game of trying to puzzle out what those letters stand for.

The B, for instance. It could stand for BUSINESS or BUREAU, BOARD or BOSTON. The O might mean OFFICE or ORGANIZATION while the D could signify DISTRICT or DIVISIONAL . . . but perhaps I'd better explain.

My reading mechanism has become unhinged by CORE, COPE, CIO, CIA, FCC, AMA, IBM, ICBM, FBI, RFK, NAACP, PTA, SPCA, NATO, NASA. . . .

Having learned that DAR stands for Daughters of the American Revolution and CAB means Civil Aeronautics Board, I am unable to read "car" for CAR. My mind takes off on a free-associative flight of fancy. Whatever could those letters mean? Consolidated Airlines of Reykjavik? Council for the Advancement of Re-incarnation? Cousins of Abyssinian Royalty?

Knowing as I do that NAM means National Association of Manufacturers, I cudgel my brain to decipher HAM. Housing Authority of Mesopotamia? Hartford Association of Mesomorphs? Himalayan Academy of Merchandising?

Does SLOW stand for Subcommittee for the Liberation of Women? Scientific League of Witchcraft? Society for the Laundering of Old Wigwams?

I have a friend who has a problem somewhat related to mine. Being a CPA (certified public accountant), he can't look at a row of figures without feeling compelled to add them up. He becomes so preoccupied with totaling the numbers on the license plate of the car ahead of him that he drives through stop signs without seeing them. I can't understand that. How can he be so fascinated with numbers when the letters on license plates are so much more engrossing?

Just the other day, I was driving down the street, bemused by the license plate on the car in front of me (did JBS stand for Junior Board of Science? John Birch Society? Judicial Board of Sex? Jerusalem Broadcasting Service?) when I was flagged down by an irate policeman.

"What's the matter, lady?" he asked, pointing to a sign I had failed to notice. "Can't you read?"

It was a hard question to answer. The sign said ONE WAY.

". . . Scalpel . . . suture . . . clamp . . . thingamajig. . . ."

'Common Effort' Urged:

Leadership of South Called to Bias Fight

Atlanta—Leaders in all areas of life in the South were called upon here to join a "common effort" to eliminate racial discrimination in their communities and build a society based on "social justice."

The appeal came in a statement adopted by a conference jointly sponsored by the A. Philip Randolph Educational Fund and the Southern Regional Council.

The 200 persons attending the three-day meeting represented labor, business, civil rights groups religion and education. A number of elected state and local officials also participated,.

AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman, who took part along with representatives of his department, COPE and AFL-CIO regional staffs, described it as "one of the most broadly-based meetings ever held in the South."

The statement issued by the conference declared that the South has an opportunity to "make a unique contribution to the solution of the agonizing problems this nation faces."

It suggested that the region which has been brought to face the racial issue in a direct manner, might more readily solve the problem than the North where discrimination is "more subtle, hidden and complex."

The South "can only find its rightful place," the conference declared, when it has "eliminated injustice for all, eradicated poverty for all, and created a political system in which all are free to participate."

To support these objectives, it said, "we summon all Southerners—black and white—civic leaders, students, religious leaders, political leaders, union leaders, people of all walks of life, in the cities and in rural areas.

"We call all to the duty, the opportunity, and the challenge to participate in the common effort. The need is great, the time left is so short."

Keynote speakers at the meeting were Dr. Vivian W. Henderson, president of Clark College, Atlanta, and Dr. Raymon M. Wheeler, a Charlotte, N.C., physician.

Much of the two days was devoted to "workshop sessions" in which participants centered on four topics—public leadership, citizenship participation, regional economic development and regional poverty.

Earl Davis, director of the minorities division of COPE, was among the discussion leaders. He spoke on the importance of citizenship participation in solving the South's problems.

The executive directors of the two sponsoring organizations—Bayard Rustin of the A. Philip Randolph Institute and Paul Anthony of the Southern Regional Council—were co-chairman of the meeting.

ALL-OUT EFFORT through the South to press programs to eliminate injustice and poverty was pledged by 200 persons at an Atlanta conference co-sponsored by the A. Philip Randolph Institute's educational fund and the Southern Regional Council. Dr. Vivian W. Henderson, president of Clark College, delivers keynote address.

Senate Rollcall Vote On Rights Filibuster

The Senate on Mar. 4 voted 65-32 to limit debate on the civil rights bill. The two-thirds vote was required under Senate rules to break a filibuster which had prevented passage of the legislation.

Labor supported the position of the 41 Democrats and 24 Republicans who voted for cloture. Opposed were 20 Democrats and 12 Republicans.

Worker Delegates Welcome Bid For ILO Jubilee Session in U.S.

Geneva—Worker delegates at a session of the Intl. Labor Organization's Governing Body warmly welcomed an AFL-CIO proposal that the ILO hold its 50th jubilee session in the United States.

Rudolph Faupl, Machinists international representative who is the U.S. worker delegate, informed the group of the AFL-CIO Executive Council's statement that it would be "most fitting" that the 1969 jubilee conference of the UN agency's 119 member countries be held in the U.S.

George L-P Weaver, assistant secretary of labor, told the governing body's jubilee committee that the U.S. would like to "play host" to a major ILO meeting in 1969.

No formal action on the question of next year's conference site was slated to be taken at the meeting by the executive body of 48 government, worker and employer delegates at the meeting. The problem of how to finance the extra cost of holding a session away from headquarters here must first be tackled.

At its mid-winter meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla., the AFL-CIO Executive Council recalled that Samuel Gompers, the pioneer of the American trade union movement, played a major role in the founding of the ILO.

In its statement, the council noted that this was the first time in history that the "rights, interests and welfare of the workers received positive recognition in an international peace treaty."

The need to continue advancing these goals was stressed by the worker delegates when the Governing Body voted a budget of $27.5 million for 1969, an increase of $1.8 million over that of the current year.

They warned that the emphasis being placed by ILO Dir. Gen. David A. Morse on a world employment program must not result in a curtailment of the organization's standard-setting work.

For the ILO, the workers said, it is not only a question of providing jobs but of assuring ever better pay and working conditions by the drafting of minimum international standards.

A report on financial problems adopted by the Governing Body recorded the workers' rejection of a suggestion by some government delegates that the standard-setting activity could be reduced in the interest of economy.

Because of constantly changing world conditions and the increasing flow of technological developments the need to keep updating the ILO standards remains as great as ever, the workers asserted.

The workers' group scored a major victory when it succeeded in having two items placed on the agenda of next year's session of the ILO Iron & Steel Committee over the opposition of the employers.

One item covers the role of trade unions and employer organizations in programming and planning in the iron and steel industry. The other raises the question of wage protection and income security for the industry's workers.

Speaking on behalf of the workers' group, Faupl said that a refusal to examine these matters would be in contradiction to the "whole purpose of the ILO."

It is the ILO's aim, he recalled, to protect workers through the study of economic and social problems with the joint participation of governments, employers and trade unionists.

Study Cites Value Of Training Programs

Federal manpower training programs have more than repaid their cost and should be expanded, a university study urged.

The evaluation of manpower development contributions and costs was made by Prof. Garth L. Mangum of George Washington University and published by the Institute of Labor & Industrial Relations of the University of Michigan and Wayne State University.

Union Anti-Poverty Role Spelled Out in Report

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO "is deeply committed to the war on poverty" and supports it "in every possible way," the federation's Executive Council was told in a report received at its meeting here.

The report was submitted by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. David Sullivan, who is chairman of the Labor Advisory Council to the Office of Economic Opportunity.

He and AFL-CIO Vice Pres. James A. Suffridge also serve on the National Council on Economic Opportunity, appointed by Pres. Johnson last March to report annually to him and Congress on the progress of the war on poverty.

The report covered liaison activities maintained by labor with OEO through these two councils and through the agency's regional offices. It also detailed a wide range of anti-poverty activities engaged in by the federation and its affiliates.

One section told how anti-poverty participation has become a subject of discussion "at scores of meetings, schools and conferences" sponsored by the AFL-CIO and affiliates.

In another area, the report described labor's "partnership" with OEO in developing regional programs to train union members in anti-poverty service.

One program in Appalachia has trained 104 union members. Another in New England is training 125. A third in Pennsylvania is just getting underway. Programs for the Rocky Mountain states and the Midwest are in the planning stage.

The report described a highly-successful Job Corps center being sponsored by the Operating Engineers at Jacob's Creek, Tenn., which is training youths to operate heavy equipment and graduated its first class of 48 students last June.

As a result of this program, it was noted, the Carpenters and Machinists have indicated interest in working out training programs using Job Corps facilities and resources.

The report also cited the action of the AFL-CIO Appalachian Council which has signed a contract with the Job Corps to help it recruit some 5,500 enrollees.

Youth Programs

Programs by the Alameda County, Calif., AFL-CIO and Morgantown, W. Va. AFL-CIO in sponsoring Neighborhood Youth Corps projects, were described, along with developing plans by labor in other areas to place NYC trainees in jobs.

Other parts of the report were devoted to individual unions' manpower training programs, labor's participation in the President's program to find summer jobs for youths and the AFL-CIO's legislative efforts to prevent slashes in anti-poverty funds.

The report said that its purpose was to give the council "at least a sense of the depth of the AFL-CIO's involvement in this great effort to give the poor an opportunity to share in the general well-being of our society."

THE URBAN CRISIS can only be solved with the help of every American, Vice Pres. Humphrey told more than 500 delegates to the 37th National Housing Conference in Washington. Seated, from left, are AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan, an NHC vice president; Mayor Dona Felisa of San Juan, Puerto Rico, Housing & Urban Development Sec. Robert C. Weaver, NHC Pres. Nathaniel S. Keith and Laurance G. Henderson, conference chairman.

Prompt Action Called Vital:

Housing Needs Held Core of Urban Crisis

Every citizen, "from your house to the White House," must share in the commitment if America is to resolve its urban crisis, Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey told the 37th National Housing Conference in Washington.

The two-day conference, attended by a record-breaking 560 delegates, called for "vigorous and immediate action" by Congress on Administration urban and housing bills.

"The need for decent, safe and sanitary housing is at the heart of the crisis in our cities," the conference declared in adopting a comprehensive package of housing resolutions.

The nation's "goal" over the next 20 years, it stressed must be the elimination of all slums and substandard housing with enough new dwellings to replace them and provide for a one-third population increase over the period.

Speaking at a banquet winding up the conference, Humphrey emphasized the need for securing "grass roots" support for urban programs in Congress, including critically needed housing.

"It is sweat, dollars, and involvement at all levels of our life . . . that will be necessary if the urban crisis is to be overcome," he declared.

Catalyst for Action

Humphrey said that the federal government "can at best serve as a catalyst for action" if the nation is to fully develop the kind of environment our cities need—sufficient housing, jobs and safe streets.

The additional requisite, he said, is "private enterprise, organized labor, voluntary groups and individual citizens—the sinews of a free society pulling together."

He cited "breakthroughs" that have been made in legislation enacted to aid our cities, such as the model cities plan, rent supplements, aid to education and mass transit programs.

But, he added, while these may be impressive to the social scientist "they mean little if anything to the Negro father who is still unable to buy decent shelter for his growing family."

Humphrey and two other conference speakers, Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) and former Sen. Paul Douglas (D-Ill.) stressed the need for a strong open housing provision in civil rights legislation to aid in solving housing problems.

Douglas, who now reads the National Commission on Urban Problems, pointed out that public housing "has ground to a halt" in the big cities and there "is no public housing in the suburbs."

Other Speakers

Among other major speakers at the conference was Edgar F. Kaiser, president of Kaiser Industries Corp. Oakland, Calif. and chairman of the President's Committee on Urban Housing.

The nation "has the resources and technical means" for fulfilling the "long overdue promise" of the Housing Act of 1949—"a decent home and suitable living environment for every American family," Kaiser told the conference.

The conference termed President Johnson's housing message "an inspired call for action by Congress" and supported its proposals to help make housing available to both low and moderate-income families.

In a keynote address, NHC Pres. Nathaniel S. Keith said the President's program has "a close relationship to the legislative recommendations which have been generated by the National Housing Conference over the years."

At the same time, he warned that the Administration's housing legislation "faces an uphill battle for passage." He urged the delegates to go back to their home communities and rally support for congressional action.

Cesar Chavez Ends Fast in Quest Of Justice for Farm Workers

Delano, Calif.—Cesar Chavez is ending a prolonged fast here in this small farming community, a fast undertaken to help "achieve justice for farm workers through non-violence."

Chavez, head of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee said he was fasting so that union members, their friends and supporters, the growers and their families and farm workers everywhere all might "rededicate and reaffirm their commitment to non-violence."

Chavez took only water during his fast despite warnings from his doctor that he could permanently impair his health.

He spent most of his time on a cot in the office of an incompleted service station on the outskirts of Delano, the scene of the prolonged strike against grape growers, a strike which brought world-wide attention to the plight of farm workers.

Chavez said he fears that his dreams of a powerful union of farm workers may be lost in an atmosphere of increasing violence among those "seeking short cuts to victory."

Reportedly fearful that some of his followers were ready to engage in violence, Chavez told them, as he announced his fast, that "we cannot build a strong union and bring dignity to farm workers based on violence."

The UFWOC has a membership of upwards of 20,000 during the harvest season and has signed contracts with 11 growers including DiGiorgio, Paul Masson, Gallo, Christian Brothers, Schenley and Almaden Wineries.

The union is sponsoring a cooperative service station where Chavez is staying on a 40-acre plot of land about 140 miles north of Los Angeles.

Co-op Station

Other projects include a credit union, legal aid, an auto parts cooperative, and a health clinic with a full-time doctor, two registered nurses and four nurses' aides.

In time, Chavez wants the 40 acres to become the "real and the spiritual center of a great union of farm workers."

The key battle of UFWOC today is the strike that started last August against the Giumara Brothers Fruit Co., whose products are being boycotted and picketed in cities around the United States and Canada in cooperation with other unions.

The corporation easily got a court injunction early in the strike limiting picketing by Chavez and the union, and then, with equal ease, was prepared to go to court again and cite Chavez for contempt of court for allegedly violating the injunction.

The union denied any violations. AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William Kircher said the legal action was "typical of the kind of power a giant corporation wields in a farming community, typical of the tactics which make understandable the frustrations of farm workers who must fight such employers constantly."

The day of the contempt hearing came, on the 12th day of the fast, and over 1,000 farm workers lined the Kern County courthouse corridors and entry way, kneeling and singing hymns as Chavez appeared.

Superior Judge Morton Barker of Los Angeles agreed to delay the hearing until Apr. 22, saying the court "could not tolerate the possible great and irreparable damage a hearing at this time might cause to Mr. Chavez."

Chavez said the fast was not directly connected to the fight with Guimarra, but to the broader battle of "uniting farm workers into a significant, non-violent force for justice for themselves and for their children."

Labor Course Livens Campus In Virginia

Charlottesville, Va.—A new course on Labor in the South is making the traditionally conservative University of Virginia a regional center of trade union education.

The course was developed by Dr. William H. Kaven, assistant professor of commerce, with the cooperation of the League for Industrial Democracy. It features guest lecturers from the labor movement, universities, and anti-poverty groups.

Union officials and staff members booked as lecturers include AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman; Gus Tyler, assistant president of the Ladies' Garment Workers; AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Oliver Singleton; COPE Area Dir. Daniel A. Powell, and Sec.-Treas. Brewster Snow of the Virginia State AFL-CIO.

One class will feature a debate between M. Y. Cooper, president of Henderson Mills, and Scott Hoyman, regional director of the Textile Workers Union of America, on "Do Textile Workers Need a Union?"

Senate Migrant Labor Panel Urges Minimum Wage, NLRA Coverage

The Senate's Migratory Labor subcommittee—with its Republican members dissenting—called for legislation to end the second-class status of farm workers in the nation's economy.

Its recommendations, in the annual report of the subcommittee, included equity for farm workers in both minimum wage and labor law coverage.

Despite progress in recent years, the subcommittee found that "low wages, unemployment, lack of education, poor housing, malnutrition, disease, and lack of adequate medical and dental care" are still widespread among the 466,000 workers who follow the crops.

They have been "excluded, or at best only minimally included, in all conventional citizen worker benefits enacted by federal and state law," the report said. It cited as examples unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation coverage, social security, welfare assistance, minimum wage standards, child labor protections, and coverage under the National Labor Relations Act.

The subcommittee, headed by Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), earlier had approved a bill to cover farm workers under the labor relations law.

Senators George Murphy (Calif.) and Paul J. Fannin (Ariz.), the two GOP members, sharply dissented from this and other key legislative recommendations. They hailed collective bargaining as "a cornerstone of American industrial democracy" but said it won't work on farms because a strike at harvest time might "ruin" a farm employer.

The subcommittee's Democratic majority, including Senators Edward M. Kennedy (Mass), Gaylord Nelson (Wis.), and Robert F. Kennedy (N.Y.) pointed out in the report that virtually all farm strikes have been caused by the refusal of farm employers to agree to collective bargaining—and the absence of any legislation requiring union recognition.

Report's Provisions

The report also called for:

- Extension of the Migrant Health Act for an additional five years, with substantially higher appropriations.
- Extension of minimum wage coverage to more farm workers and raising the pay floor in agriculture to that in industry and business. At present, the minimum wage of farm workers goes up only to $1.30 an hour, while other newly-covered workers will continue to move up to the $1.60 level in annual steps.
- Covering children of migratory farm workers under child labor laws.
- Full inclusion of farm workers under all social legislation, including workmen's compensation.

Plant Collection For Delano Upheld

A union collection for Delano, Calif., grape strikers comes under the heading of protected union activity and company interference is forbidden, the National Labor Relations Board ruled.

The NLRB said General Electric Co. must permit the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and its Local 1507 to collect donations during shift changes at the main gate of GE's San Jose, Calif., motor plant. The company halted a collection June 10, 1966 and denied permission for a later collection outside working hours.

The NLRB based its decision on a 1942 ruling by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Riot Panel Program Stresses Urgency

domestic crisis the nation has faced since 1932."

He said labor flatly rejects conservative charges that it is "impossible" for the nation to afford the billions needed to implement the program because of the costs of the war in Viet Nam.

On the contrary, he insisted, it would be a "betrayal" of the principles for which America is fighting in Viet Nam if millions of its own citizens are denied "full participation in American society."

Reiterating labor's willingness "to pay its fair share" of the costs, Meany declared:

"We are confident that if the issue is squarely faced and clearly offered, the American people will respond to the challenge . . . For in fact—as the commission's report so eloquently demonstrates—there is no other choice."

The blue-ribbon commission was named by Pres. Johnson last July, in the aftermath of riots which swept through Negro slum areas of major cities.

A bipartisan group with a nonpartisan mission, the commission was headed by Illinois Gov. Otto Kerner (D), with New York City Major John V. Lindsay (R) as vice chairman. Its nine other members included I. W. Abel, president of the Steelworkers and an AFL-CIO vice president.

The commission addressed its report "to the institutions of government . . . but even more urgently to the hearts and minds of each citizen."

It warned that America is drifting towards a sharp division of society, "one black, one white— separate and unequal."

But it affirmed that the drift "can be reversed" by "a commitment to national action . . . backed by the resources of the most powerful and the richest nation on this earth."

This must be done, the commission insisted. "Violence and destruction must be ended—in the streets of the ghetto and in the lives of people."

The commission members walked the streets of the slums in addition to listening to and questioning witnesses representing every range of opinion. They concluded: "Segregation and poverty have created in the racial ghetto a destructive environment totally unknown to most white Americans."

They proposed programs at every level, local as well as national, private as well as public. But they stressed that the programs must be "on a scale equal to the dimension of the problems." They must have "high impact in the immediate future in order to close the gap between promise and performance."

In the areas of national programs, these were among the findings and recommendations of the commission:

JOBS: "Unemployment and underemployment are among the most persistent and serious grievances of the poor." Despite the large-scale expansion of federal manpower training programs in recent years, there remain 2 million unemployed, including some 500,000 "hard-core" unemployed in the central cities "who lack a basic education . . . and are unable to cope with the problems of holding and performing a job." Of an estimated 10 million underemployed, 6.5 million "work full time and earn less than the annual poverty wage."

Employment Proposals

The commission recommended that the federal government:

- Work with cities and states to consolidate existing manpower programs to avoid fragmentation and duplication.
- Take immediate action to create 2 million new jobs over the next three years—1 million in the public sector and 1 million in the private sector—to absorb the hard-core unemployed and reduce the level of unemployment for all workers, black and white. It proposed a first-year target of 250,000 public service jobs and 300,000 in private industry.
- Provide on-the-job training by both public and private employers, with reimbursement to private employers for the extra costs of training the hard-core unemployed, either through contract or by tax credits.
- Provide on-the-job training by investment in rural as well as urban poverty areas.
- Remove artificial barriers to employment and promotion, not only racial discrimination but, in certain cases, arrest records or lack of a high school diploma. The commission called for strengthening the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission by giving it power to issue "cease and desist" orders similar to the enforcement authority of the National Labor Relations Board and other federal regulatory agencies.

The commission stressed that firm assurances must be given that employers will not dismiss existing workers in order to hire trainees.

It singled out for praise "the recent public commitment" of AFL-CIO building trades unions "to encourage and recruit Negro membership in apprenticeship programs."

WAGES: "Public employers should be required to pay on-the-job trainees not less than the minimum wage or the prevailing wage in the area for similar work, whichever is higher," the commission said.

"The recent increase to $1.60 per hour yields an annual wage only slightly above the poverty level and then only for those employed full time. As an alternative, we recommend consideration be given to an experimental program of wage supplements or other methods for achieving the same income goals."

EDUCATION: In much the same terms as the AFL-CIO's convention resolution, the commission stressed the failures of the inner-city schools and the need for intensive programs to compensate for a disadvantaged home life.

The commission saw no conflict —nor did the AFL-CIO—between pressing for school integration and upgrading the quality of ghetto schools where, for the years immediately ahead, most Negro children will be educated.

It asked a large-scale expansion of the Teacher Corps, extension of early childhood education "to every disadvantaged child in the country," federal funding of year-round compensatory education programs, more adult basic education, stronger vocational training and other programs whose needs have long been recognized.

The report recognized the vast increase in federal spending for education in recent years and said the new programs furnish a sound base on which to build. But still more must be done, the commission insisted.

WELFARE: "Drastic reforms" were urged in a public welfare system which, the commission said:

- Excludes large numbers of needy persons because they are "neither aged, handicapped nor the parents of minor children."
- Provides, for those included, "assistance well below the minimum necessary for a decent level of existence, and imposes restrictions that encourage dependence on welfare and undermine self-respect."

As an immediate effort, the commission proposed:

- Uniform national standards of assistance at least up to the Social Security Administration's "poverty level" of $3,335 a year for an urban family of four.
- Requiring all states to permit aid to families with both a father and mother in the home, "thus aiding the family while it is still intact."
- Increasing incentives for seeking employment and job training, but lifting restrictions enacted by Congress that would compel mothers of young children to work.
- Removing the freeze placed by Congress on the percentage of children in a state eligible for federal assistance.

As a long-range goal, the commission recommended efforts to develop a national system of income supplementation "based strictly on need."

HOUSING: "After more than three decades of fragmented and grossly underfunded housing programs, nearly 6 million substandard housing units remain occupied in the United States," the commission reported.

It outlined a series of new and expanded programs designed to combine public and private resources to build and rehabilitate 6 million housing units for low and moderate income families within the next five years, starting with 600,000 units during the coming year.

It called on Congress to enact "a comprehensive and enforceable federal open housing law to cover the sale or rental of all housing, including single family homes."

It urged that more low and moderate income housing be built outside of ghetto areas, called for expansion of rent supplements and of the model cities program.

COST: The commission did not attempt to put a price tag on its program recommendations but acknowledged that it would be costly.

"These programs will require unprecedented levels of funding and performance," the report observed, "but they neither probe deeper nor demand more than the problems which called them forth."

Not every statement or recommendation in the huge report expressed the views of every one of the 11 commissioners but the agreement on the main emphasis was so complete that there was no dissent to the report.

In almost every chapter, there was the implied warning that the clock is fast running out, that many of today's problems stem from inadequate attention to the problems of yesteryear and that the future will be worse than the present unless the nation acts now.

50-CITY PROGRAM of the National Alliance of Businessmen to employ hard-core jobless was described to the Executive Council meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla., by Joseph A. Califano, assistant to Pres. Johnson, and Leo Beebe (seated on Califano's left), executive vice chairman of NAB on leave from Ford Motor Co.

Abel Looks on Report As Summons to Action

Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel views the report of the National Commission on Civil Disorders as the beginning, not the conclusion, of a monumental task.

Abel, a member of the commission, told the AFL-CIO News that he hopes "every union member will read and act on the recommendations."

He stressed that "if the causes of last summer's riots are to be remedied and this country is, indeed, to be one nation." it will require—in the words of the report—"new attitudes, new understandings, and above all, new will."

The 11 commissioners came from "widely different backgrounds," Abel noted.

"Yet, for seven months we shared a common and deeply moving experience.

"We visited the ghettos. We listened to over 100 witnesses. We debated. And we searched our hearts and our consciences."

Then, Abel said, "we tried to 'tell it like it is.' "

He told the AFL-CIO News that none of the commissioners "totally agreed with all of the scores of recommendations for action on the national and local levels. In several important areas, I believe more should have been urged. Yet what is really significant is the fact that we found so much common agreement about what Americans now can and must do.

"Our recommendations in the areas of jobs, education, housing and welfare include much that the AFL-CIO has long and actively supported as part of our legislative program. However, much more is proposed that all of us as individuals must privately do—in our neighborhoods, in our community organizations and at our workplaces.

"I am confident that American workers will willingly meet the costs and the moral commitments implicit in the commission's recommendations. In fact, as AFL-CIO Pres. Meany has said—'there is no other choice.' "

Dental Care Negotiated For 8-State Area

Chicago — Terms of a dental health care program covering 33,000 members of the Machinists and their families in eight Pacific Northwest states were approved here by the Northwest IAM Benefit Trust and the National Association of Dental Service Plans.

Already in effect in two IAM locals, the dental benefit program will be extended to members of other locals as new contracts are negotiated. Potentially about 120,000 individuals could receive care, NADSP said.

The program has no deductibles and will provide most basic dental services to a maximum of $750 per person during a 12-month period. Payments for services is made under a formula which reduces the charge to patients by 10 percent a year so long as dental care is provided each year.

IAM Vice Pres. Charles West said "we have established a uniform dental program that provides the same benefits in all states for the same premium cost." The states are Alaska, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Oregon, Utah, Washington and Wyoming.

NADSP said 1.5 million Americans now are covered by dental service plans provided by voluntary, not-for-profit organizations sponsored by state dental societies. They conduct prepaid group dental care programs on a plan similar to that of Blue Shield in the medical care field.

Senate Showdown Set:

Rights Forces Crack Southern Filibuster

would merely make it a federal crime to cross state lines with intent to incite a riot. However a whole series of toughening or clarifying amendments were being voted on as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

The House last year passed an anti-riot bill, but it never emerged from the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Still largely intact is the original civil rights protection bill which was approved last session by the Senate Judiciary Committee and became the vehicle to bring the more important open housing legislation to the Senate floor.

It makes it a federal crime to injure or intimidate Negroes exercising specific legal rights, such as voting, attending schools or using public facilities. It also bars interference with civil rights workers using legal means to help achieve these rights.

This bill was made the Senate's first order of business in January. The Dixie bloc served notice that it would filibuster to prevent action on the bill, unless it were drastically watered down.

Civil rights groups urged the Senate to strengthen the legislation by adding the Administration's open housing bill as an amendment. They opposed settling for a token bill that would be acceptable either to the southerners or to the original position of Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen.

Dirksen started off opposed to the civil rights protection bill as "too strong" and flatly resistant to any type of open housing legislation.

His abrupt turnabout came after early, unsuccessful cloture votes showed a majority of Senate Republicans for a strong bill and against tabling the open housing amendment.

Dirksen then worked with the bipartisan group of civil rights stalwarts in the Senate to fashion a broad-ranging bill including strong open housing provisions.

This appeared to have cleared the way for a two-thirds majority for cloture. But the picture suddenly clouded on Mar. 1 when Dirksen found that he hadn't been able to carry as many conservative Republicans with him as he had anticipated. Several senators, both Democrats and Republicans, complained they hadn't had time to study the new substitute bill and the 59-35 vote for cloture was four short of the needed two-thirds.

New Vote Set

A new vote was set for Monday, Mar. 4. Over the weekend, a group of the nation's top business leaders issued an appeal to the Senate to vote cloture and pass an open housing bill which they said "is urgently needed and now." The report of the National Commission on Civil Disorders added to the urgency of the vote.

When the time for the vote arrived, it was necessary to collect on promises by several senators reluctant on principle to vote for cloture but personally in favor of the legislation. Their votes, they had indicated, would be forthcoming if it would make the difference between passage and defeat.

With several civil rights supporters absent, the votes were needed—and given. The clincher came when Sen. E. L. Bartlett (D-Alaska) walked on to the floor when the count had reached 64-32, exactly two-thirds. Bartlett, who had voted against cloture on the three previous ballots, voted for limiting debate and the filibuster was ended.

Applause rippled through the crowded galleries and the Senate moved ahead to work its will on the bill—by accepting, rejecting or modifying some 90 pending amendments.

Arts Seminars Set by Unions In Four Cities

Minneapolis will be the site of the first of four two-day conferences to involve AFL-CIO members in the arts, Leo Perlis, director of AFL-CIO Community Services Activities announced.

The conference, set for Mar. 12-13, will involve representatives of Locals, area central bodies and officials of museums, symphonies, libraries, art galleries and other cultural organizations.

Similar seminars will be held in Louisville, Ky., and Buffalo, N.Y., in April, and New York city in May, Perlis said.

A list of 50 potential projects in the arts has been drafted by Francis J. Sugrue, AFL-CIO representative on the United Community Funds & Councils of America. The list was developed to permit local areas to choose projects that blend best into their needs and abilities, Perlis said.

Perlis and Jack Golodner, executive secretary of the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes, will attend the Minneapolis conference. Musicians Pres. Herman D. Kenin, who heads the council, will attend the seminar in Louisville April 2-3.

The National Endowment for the Arts, a federal agency, has assigned Harlowe Dean, a veteran of the theater and an artist, to the program, Perlis added.

COPE White House Film Now Available to Unions

"Conversation at the White House," the new film produced by the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education which has been greeted with high enthusiasm at area COPE conferences, is now available for sale or rental to any AFL-CIO organization.

The half-hour color film is a spontaneous, unrehearsed talk between Pres. Johnson and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in the Fish Room of the Executive Mansion. A transcript was published as a special supplement of the AFL-CIO News, Feb. 3.

Prints of the film can be purchased for $40 from Alexander Barkan, director of COPE, at 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006. The rental fee from the AFL-CIO Film Library, at the same address, is $3.

AS FAR AS THE EYE COULD SEE, they kept coming—sanitation workers in Memphis, Tenn., represented by State, County & Municipal Workers Local 1733, marching to City Hall to voice their grievances. Their strike, for union recognition and an initial contract, is at an impasse in its fourth week.

Mediation Resumed In Glass Strike

Philadelphia—New mediation efforts in the strike of 50,000 members of the Glass Bottle Blowers were scheduled by the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service.

The talks were due to be resumed Mar. 8 at the request of FM&CS Dir. William E. Simkin, who asked Commissioner William Rose to attend as his representative.

The strike began Feb. 1 when negotiators for 32,000 East Coast production workers rejected a 67-cent package offer by manufacturers. It was joined later by 8,000 West Coast workers and 10,000 skilled workers.

Meany Urges Full Support Of Red Cross

The American Red Cross is facing a "severe financial crisis" because of its increasing obligations to our armed forces in Viet Nam, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany pointed out in a letter to presidents of affiliated unions.

Meany urged all unions and their members to cooperate with a special March fund-raising appeal by the Red Cross.

Back Servicemen

The campaign is called SOS—Support Our Servicemen.

As an example of what the Red Cross obligation means in Viet Nam, the letter pointed out that the voluntary agency now has 166 field staff workers there, along with 52 hospital workers and 117 women directing recreational programs.

Largely due to this increased commitment, Meany noted, the Red Cross' world-wide obligations have risen in the past four years from $39 million to an estimated $49 million for the fiscal year beginning July 1.

Emphasizing that the total Red Cross needs "to continue to do its job" is $121,624,000, Meany pointed out that only part of this amount can be raised through United Funds.

AFL-CIO affiliated unions can take part in the March "national mobilization" drive, he said, by sending contributions to: S.O.S. Campaign, American National Red Cross, Washington, D. C., 20006.

Negro Leaders Rally Memphis Strike Aid

Memphis, Tenn.—A battle for union recognition being waged here by 1,300 sanitation workers is receiving strong backing from the city's civil rights leaders and Negro clergymen.

They have appealed to Memphis citizens to take up picket signs in support of striking members of State, County & Municipal Employes Local 1733 who have been off their jobs since Feb. 12.

The Negro ministers, acting on a plan devised by more than 100 church leaders, also have called for a boycott of all downtown merchants, businesses owned by two city council members, and two daily newspapers.

In retaliation against pressures from the Memphis business community on strikers, the ministers advised their congregations, "Keep your money in your pockets. No new clothes for Easter."

In the latest strike development, SCME Pres. Jerry Wurf and six other union representatives were found in contempt of court Mar. 6 for defying a no-strike injunction and sentenced in chancery court to $50 fines and ten days in jail.

They were freed on appeals bonds ranging from $250 to $1,000 following the sentencing.

1966 Injunction

Chancellor Robert Hoffman, who issued the finding and sentences, said the union officials could purge themselves of the citation by ending the "illegal strike." The injunction was based on an earlier one, issued in 1966, which the city obtained on the occasion of a one-day walkout by the sanitation workers.

The city made a special point that Wurf was in contempt of court by virtue of his appearance before the Memphis City Council on Feb. 27 when he gave the union's position on the strike issues.

The injunction had called on the union to cease and desist from engaging in a strike against the city, causing or authorizing individual employes to strike in an endeavor to obtain a collective bargaining agreement with the city.

Those cited besides Wurf were SCME Field Staff Dir. P. J. Ciampa; Organizers William Lucy, Jesse Epps, and Joseph Paisley; Local Pres. T. O. Jones, and Steward Nelson Jones.

Although the strike has received national press and television attention, union leaders contend that the reports have falsely indicated that wage demands are the key issue.

"What the public has not been told," an SCME statement said, "is that Local 1733 was chartered 30 months ago, and ever since then its members have been trying to receive some sort of recognition" from the city.

The local's demand for a "just wage" and improved conditions "is important, of course," but even more important is its desire to be able to negotiate, the union said.

In a telegram to Mayor Henry Loeb calling for negotiations, the union also put "recognition" at the top of a list of issues involved in the dispute.

89-6-8

Second on the list was a call for a "meaningful grievance procedure" in which the local would have the right to seek resolution of grievances "with arbitration as the final step."

Other Issues

Other issues were listed in the following order—wages, deduction of union dues, fair provisions for promotions, health, hospitalization and life insurance, pensions, and other benefits such as sick leave, vacation, and overtime pay.

The immediate cause of the strike, the union pointed out, was the workers' claim that the city reneged on a promise that employes would be paid when sent home because of inclement weather.

After the strike began, more than 1,000 of the workers marched five miles from a meeting to City Hall to present their grievances to Loeb and the city council. When the meeting broke up, they joined in singing, "We Shall Not Be Moved."

Congress Urged to Stem On-Job Deaths

Meany Asks Strong Law On Safety

American labor called on Congress to halt "the mounting toll" of on-the-job deaths, illnesses and injuries by passing a strong occupational safety and health law.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, testifying at House hearings, said national standards and vigorous, well-financed enforcement programs are essential to the protection of the nation's 75 million workers.

It is "unmistakably clear," Meany told a House Labor subcommittee, that the states cannot be left with sole responsibility for safe and healthy working conditions.

The Administration's bill, with strengthening amendments, is needed because "the record plainly shows that the states stand today incapable of doing the kind of job that needs to be done," he said.

"This legislation is far overdue," Meany stressed. "Every year thousands of workers die slow, often agonizing deaths from the effects of coal dust, asbestos, beryllium, lead, cotton dust, carbon monoxide, cancer-causing chemicals, dyes, radiation, pesticides and exotic fuels."

States' rights are not an issue, Meany asserted. He pointed out that the proposed legislation provides financial help to states that are willing to do the job as well as the research and standards necessary for states to do a better job.

Powers Essential

But without federal legislation and enforcement powers, Meany said, "we find no reason to believe the needed improvements will be forthcoming."

During a question and answer session with committee members, Meany stressed the importance of legally enforceable standards.

He cited the death of 21 workers when fire swept a Louisiana salt mine. Government inspectors last summer had recommended fire prevention measures which might have averted the disaster but, Meany stressed, "the recommendation didn't have the force of law and wasn't carried out."

He cited to the committee the survey made by the AFL-CIO News which showed that most states have many more fish and game wardens than safety inspectors—placing "a higher value on wildlife than on human life."

House Unit OKs Farm Labor Bill

The House Labor Committee approved legislation to give an estimated 500,000 farm workers the same right to organize and bargain collectively that workers in most other industries have had for more than 30 years.

The bill to bring workers on larger farms under the National Labor Relations Act has been a high priority goal of the labor movement and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany testified for it at both House and Senate hearings.

Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) sponsored the bill which, after some changes, was approved 16-12 by the committee. It provides coverage under the labor law for workers on farms that (1) employ more than 12 workers at any one time during the year and (2) have a total payroll of more than $10,000 a year.

The bill would also permit a union representing farm workers to negotiate a union shop agreement requiring workers to join the union within seven days after their employment, rather than the 30 days allowed in industrial union shop contracts.

The coverage exemptions were drawn to exclude the family farmer. While less than 1 percent of the nation's farms would be covered by the law, this small number of farms employs an estimated 50 percent of the 1 million U.S. farm workers.

The committee dropped from the bill authority for pre-hire agreements but agreed to permit prefer-

EXECUTIVE COUNCIL action rejecting "ultimatum" from the Auto Workers for a special convention is announced by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at a news conference following the council meeting.

Ties Call to Acceptance Of Decision

By Saul Miller

The AFL-CIO Executive Council unanimously rejected an "ultimatum" from the Auto Workers that it would disaffiliate unless the council called a special convention to consider the UAW's proposals for changes in federation programs and policies.

The council strongly reaffirmed its willingness to act on any proposal or program brought through the appropriate channels of the AFL-CIO, including a special convention as soon as possible, but said that the UAW would have to commit itself to attending the convention and "to accept the democratically arrived at decisions of such a convention." (Text of statement, Page 2.)

Special Session

The decision to reject the UAW bid for a special convention tied up with the threat of disaffiliation came at a special three-hour meeting of the council in Washington attended by all but three members.

At a press conference following the session, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared that the explicit conditions for the UAW to attend the convention and abide by majority rule were necessary because "of the action of the UAW in presenting us with an ultimatum."

The UAW officers in a letter to Meany dated Mar. 2 said that "should the UAW be denied the opportunity to present its program to a special convention, which alone has the constitutional authority to act upon this program, then in the judgment of the International Executive Board the UAW will have no acceptable alternative but to disaffiliate from the AFL-CIO. . . ."

Magma Pact Reached:

Copper Strike Talks Pushed With Big 4

By Eugene A. Kelly

Striking copper workers reached settlement on a $1 an hour contract package with one of 11 struck companies while White House aides tried to keep talks going in Washington between the Big Four of the industry and 26 unions.

Government mediators thought they had a formula for settlement of the strike against the Phelps Dodge Corp., one of the Big Four, but management refused to accept it at two of its properties.

No progress was reported in union talks with the other big companies—Kennecott Copper Corp., the Anaconda Co. and the American Smelting & Refining Co., employing more than 40,000 of the 60,000 workers who have been on the picket line since last July.

Steelworkers Vice Pres. Joseph P. Molony, chairman of the unions' Nonferrous Strike Coordinating Committee, reported that members of 13 local unions were preparing to vote on a new contract for more than 2,600 workers at the Magma Copper Co.'s mines, mills and smelters at San Manuel and Superior, Ariz.

The settlement package includes average wage increases of 55.5 cents per hour over 39.5 months and is valued overall by the company at more than $1 an hour, not counting so-called "impact" costs on other operations.

If the Magma contract is ratified by union members, work would resume Mar. 15, the nonferrous co-

Senate Victory Spurs New Drive For Final Action on Fair Housing

By David L. Perlman

Supporters of a fair housing law looked to the momentum of a smashing Senate victory to win House acceptance of legislation that would outlaw discrimination in the sale or rental of nearly 80 percent of the nation's houses and apartments.

The Senate began debate on the bill in early January, with labor, civil rights groups and the Administration waging an admittedly uphill battle against a southern filibuster.

Less than two months later, the filibuster had been broken and the Senate passed the bill, 71-20, with overwhelming support from both Democrats and Republicans.

The strong bipartisan label the bill now bears is counted on to wean a sufficiently big bloc of House Republicans away from the dominant conservative coalition to join with most northern Democrats in a civil rights majority.

Both Pres. Johnson and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany hailed the Senate vote and called for quick House concurrence.

Johnson said Americans "can be proud" that the Senate has affirmed "our nation's commitment to human rights under law." He urged the House to act so that he can quickly sign the new legislation.

Meany called on the House to agree to the Senate bill, which he termed "a significant step toward the achievement of freedom and justice for all."

The Senate's action, Meany stressed, "proves that the democratic system can and will correct historic inequities in this country."

In the process of shaping the final version of the civil rights bill, the Senate soundly rejected—67-18—an amendment clearly aimed at unions in strike situations.

Sponsor of the amendment was Sen. Sam J. Ervin, Jr. (D-N.C.),

Joblessness Increases to 3.7 Percent

By Duane Emme

The nation's unemployment rate rose two-tenths of 1 percent in February despite an increase in employment for the month, the Labor Dept. reported.

This rise in the jobless rate, which had dropped in January, put it back at 3.7 percent of the workforce, where it was in December. Last month's rise was attributed the council's action, rejected as unacceptable the condition that the union "accept the democratically arrived at decisions" of a special convention. It said that the condition violates the "spirit and concept of a voluntary association."

Instead, the UAW board declared, it would seek to have a special convention called under the AFL-CIO constitutional provision that such a convention may be called "on request of national and international unions representing a majority of the total membership of the federation."

Meany told reporters that every member of the council spoke on the issue, that the discussion was "low-key" and that the matter was "analyzed from every angle." The action, he stressed, was unanimous; there were no abstentions.

The federation president read the UAW letter to the council and sketched in the background of the last 21 months "since the charges against the AFL-CIO have been issued by the president of the UAW through published statements and press releases and press conferences and so-called administrative letters to his membership."

The council's statement, he said, resulted from the detailed discussion and reflected three proposals made at the meeting by different members of the council.

Meany had initially replied to the UAW request by placing the matter on the agenda of the regularly scheduled meeting of the council for May 13 in Washington. He told reporters that a series of meetings in New York and Washington called by UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther was threatening to develop into a situation "where we would go on for months having some sort of a cold war and I certainly don't want that."

The UAW initiated a series of charges against AFL-CIO policies, program and leadership nearly two years ago. The council at one point scheduled a special meeting—at Reuther's request—for an exhaustive review of foreign policy. The UAW president failed to show for the meeting.

The UAW, at its April 1967 convention, adopted a program to "modernize and revitalize" the AFL-CIO and presented it for official consideration by the December 1967 AFL-CIO convention. A few days before the convention opened, the UAW asked that its resolution be withdrawn, stating that its delegates could not attend because of negotiations with the auto industry.

In February 1967, when Reuther resigned from the Executive Council, the council adopted the statement which it reaffirmed at the special meeting last week. The statement declared in part:

"The officers and members of the Executive Council declare the complete readiness of the AFL-CIO to receive, consider, debate and act upon any complaint, charge, proposal or program—novel or ancient—that any affiliate or its officers may desire to advance and advocate—if and when properly offered through the appropriate channels of the AFL-CIO Constitution. There is no other procedure by which the trade union movement can effectively reach, and carry out, its decisions.

"We are ready to consider and act upon any such matter at any time, either at this or a future council meeting, at a meeting of the General Board, at a special convention, if necessary, or at the next regular convention in the fall of this year. We are not, however, prepared to act upon the basis of a kaleidoscope of ever-changing allegations and demands, expressed through press releases, public speeches or circular letters."

Meany Spurs Union Aid To Viet Nam Workers

The Confederation of Vietnamese Labor (CVT) urgently needs financial aid if it is to help "free trade unionism and free peoples" survive Communist aggression, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has pointed out in a letter to presidents of all AFL-CIO unions.

Meany appealed to the unions for "generous and timely" contributions to enlarge upon a CVT-assistance program begun by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The council, at its recent mid-winter meeting, voted a total of $35,000 to aid South Vietnamese workers through CVT, including $10,000 for emergency relief to victims of the Communist offensive.

The aid includes $25,000 earmarked to purchase vehicles and tractors for use in rice cultivation by cooperatives and for other uses by CVT.

Meany also reported that the AFL-CIO has established a resident representative in Saigon to coordinate relations with CVT.

However, Meany emphasized that labor must "rapidly enlarge" upon its activities on behalf of CVT—both through an increased general fund and additional aid for specific projects.

Only through American labor's support, Meany pointed out, will CVT be able to provide refugee relief and resettlement, "and assist in reconstruction after repeated and continuing acts of destruction, terrorism and slaughter."

Maurice Dineen Dies, Retired AFL-CIO Staffer

Boston, Mass. — Maurice J. Dineen, retired AFL-CIO staff representative who died at 69, was buried here after funeral services in Los Angeles. Death was reported due to a heart attack.

During a 30-year career as an organizer, Dineen served on the AFL-CIO Speakers Bureau, as Texas regional director for the former CIO, and as a staff representative in New England and the Far West. He retired in 1963.

Text of Statement Adopted by Council

Following is the text of the statement by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, Mar. 12, 1968, Washington, D. C.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council unanimously rejects out of hand the ultimatum received from the UAW on Mar. 2, 1968.

We repeat the exact language of our Feb. 20, 1967, statement:

"We again wish to emphasize that the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations is a free, voluntary institution, governed by the terms of a constitution adopted by the delegates of all affiliated unions at the 1955 merger convention of the AFL-CIO.

"The executive officers and the members of the Executive Council are elected, in accordance with that constitution, by the delegates representing all affiliated organizations, at each biennial convention, and are fully accountable to them. The basic policies and programs of the AFL-CIO are formulated and approved by the convention and, between conventions, by the Executive Council. The executive officers of the AFL-CIO must accept and be guided by those decisions.

"In this respect, the structure and procedure of the AFL-CIO is similar to that of other free trade union centers throughout the world, and of the 129 national and international unions who, together, comprise this federation.

"Under this constitution, concurred in by all affiliates, any organization that contends that the programs and policies of the federation are deficient in any respect, or are not being properly or adequately carried out, has every opportunity, as well as free and open internal channels, for the pursuit of its complaints and the advancement of its position.

"Obviously, this is particularly true of those organizations whose chief officers serve on the Executive Council. The council operates on an open agenda. Any matter that any member of the council desires to have considered by the council is considered, fully and freely, to the point of decision.

"Likewise, the convention affords every delegate and every organization, whether they have one vote or one million, an open forum for the discussion and advancement of any issue, charge or complaint.

"There is only one limitation upon the extent to which any individual or any organization within the trade union movement can influence the direction of the AFL-CIO, its programs and policies or the character and identity of its leadership. As in any democratic order, they must be able to persuade the majority that their complaints are valid, that their proposals are sound and that their alternatives are preferable. Neither size, financial resources, nor extravagance of language can overcome or substitute for that simple basic requirement.

"The officers and members of the Executive Council declare the complete readiness of the AFL-CIO to receive, consider, debate and act upon any complaint, charge, proposal or program—novel or ancient—that any affiliate or its officers may desire to advance and advocate—if and when properly offered through the appropriate channels of the AFL-CIO constitution. There is no other procedure by which the trade union movement can effectively reach, and carry out, its decisions.

"We are ready to consider and act upon any such matter at any time, either at this or a future council meeting, at a meeting of the General Board, at a special convention, if necessary, or at the next regular convention in the fall of this year. We are not, however, prepared to act upon the basis of a kaleidoscope of ever-changing allegations and demands, expressed through press releases, public speeches or circular letters."

On the basis of that statement we say to the UAW:

You can have a special convention on your charges and proposals —as soon as it is humanly possible to hold one under these two conditions:

1. That you commit your organization without question to attend such a convention, if and when called.

2. That you further commit your organization to accept the democratically arrived at decisions of such a convention.

Cites Anti-Labor Threat:

IUD Sounds Call To Political Action

Everything the labor movement has fought for is at stake in the 1968 elections, the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. warned in a hard-hitting convention resolution.

The very survival of the cities, the conquest of poverty, the "critical crossroad" of race relations depend on the choice America makes at the polls, the convention said.

"At stake too," the resolution stressed, "is the future security of the American labor movement. . . . A conservative President in the White House and a conservative majority in Congress in 1969 will inevitably bring down upon us new anti-labor legislation.

"The anti-labor forces are in dead earnest," the convention declared. "They mean to prevail and enforce their will on trade unionism if they carry the 1968 election."

The political action resolution, calling for a massive registration, fund-raising, educational and get-out-the-vote drive, was one of more than a score adopted at the IUD's 7th Constitutional Convention.

More than 300 delegates represented 57 affiliated unions and nearly 6.7 million workers at the two-day meeting in Washington.

Reuther Re-Elected

IUD Pres. Walter P. Reuther was re-elected without opposition after telling the delegates that the Auto Workers did not want "to drag differences with the AFL-CIO into this forum," that his union does not want to disaffiliate and hopes that can be avoided.

In resolutions, punctuated by floor discussion, delegates affirmed labor's commitment to an emergency job program that would make the government the "employer of last resort" for the hard-core unemployed and for large-scale programs of housing, education and health care.

The nation has the resources to overcome its domestic problems despite billions needed "to cope with the challenge of world communism," the convention declared.

The convention urged a ban on government contracts to violators of labor law—specifically the J. P. Stevens Co.—and asked that the National Labor Relations Board be given "sharp teeth" to crack down on illegal union-busting. It said "triple damages should be assessed against chronic violators to make it no longer profitable for employers to flout the law."

Revision of the National Labor Relations Act to upgrade the protections for the right to organize and bargain should be "a major legislative goal in the next session of Congress," the convention said.

Delegates approved a resolution stressing organizing as the "most important task" of the labor movement and endorsing efforts of the IUD Executive Board to work out arrangements for financing cooperative campaigns "on a sound and permanent basis."

Reuther told the delegates that the Auto Workers had halted the union's voluntary contribution to the IUD organizing fund because "for a long period we were paying 90 percent of the total cost." He said the UAW is "prepared to get back on the team" and willing to pay "more than its share, but not in isolation."

The convention reiterated support for a coordinated bargaining approach by various unions dealing with a single employer. It warned that the growth of "new multi-product, multi-establishment conglomerate giants" of industry jeopardizes "the basic concept that there be a balance of economic power on both sides of the bargaining table."

Other resolutions reaffirmed support for the farm workers and their right to organize and bargain, for needed consumer legislation and for an end to the use of "green card" commuters from Mexico to lower U.S. wage standards. A civil rights resolution urged Congress and the Administration to heed the call of the Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders "for massive and immediate action" to keep the nation from a domestic catastrophe.

Delegates re-elected 22 IUD vice presidents, and elected the new presidents of two unions to succeed the retired heads of their unions as IUD vice presidents—Ronald F. Roley of the Woodworkers and Harry D. Sayre of the Papermakers & Paperworkers. An additional post of vice president was filled by the election of Pulp-Sulphite Pres. Joseph P. Tonelli.

7TH CONVENTION of AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. is opened by IUD Pres. Walter P. Reuther. Delegates from 57 unions adopted a wide-ranging program of legislative, political and trade union action during the two-day session.

Primary Battles Spark '68 Election Campaign

Campaign '68 rolled westward following the New Hampshire presidential primary, picking up momentum and possibly a few new candidates.

The New Hampshire results produced strong showings for former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon, who polled 79 percent of the Republican vote, and Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy, who received 42 percent of the Democratic ballots, in the first-in-the-nation presidential contest.

With nearly all of the state's 302 precincts reporting, Nixon had 84,005 votes to 11,691 for the write-in candidacy of Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, who did not take part in the campaign or encourage his followers.

On the Democratic side, McCarthy, who had based his candidacy on opposition to Administration policies, drew 22,810 votes against 26,337, or 48.5 percent of the total, in write-in votes for Pres. Johnson.

Nixon had been expected to carry the state following a vigorous personal campaign, but the huge vote he rolled up was regarded as a major boost toward the Republican nomination.

Rockefeller supporters had hoped he would benefit from the withdrawal of Michigan Gov. George Romney. The New York governor recently retreated from his stance as a non-candidate. The New Hampshire results add to the pressure from GOP moderates to get him into the race and remain on the ballot for the May 28 primary in Oregon. Four years ago, Rockefeller won the Oregon primary over Barry Goldwater, the eventual GOP nominee.

McCarthy forces, who had hoped at best that the senator would win 30 percent of the New Hampshire vote, pointed for the Wisconsin primary, April 2, where Johnson's name also will be on the Democratic ballot.

But a new element in the Democratic race developed as Sen. Robert F. Kennedy of New York announced that the New Hampshire results had removed "the major obstacles" to his candidacy and were causing him to "reassess" his position.

Although he failed to win a majority of the New Hampshire Democratic vote, McCarthy nevertheless led for 20 of the 24 delegates to his party's national convention. His supporters entered just enough names to fill the slate in the delegate competition, whereas there were 45 seeking delegate seats as Johnson supporters.

Elsewhere, a conservative Democrat, Charles Griffin, easily won the runoff vote for Congress to take the seat vacated by John Bell Williams on his election as governor. Griffin defeated Negro leader Charles Evers, who had led Griffin and five other white candidates in an earlier primary. Evers called the contest a "history making occasion" in that it produced the strongest showing in a century for a Negro candidate in a Mississippi election.

Unions Reach Copper Pact With Magma

ordinating committee was informed. Company employes had been on strike eight months for improved wages and working conditions.

The wage increases tentatively agreed to will push rates at the Magma properties to a range of $3.05 to $4.44 an hour by Sept. 1, 1970. The contract at Magma—the fourth metals firm to settle since the industry-wide walkout started—will run through July 1, 1971.

The company offered major pension improvements—an important objective of all the striking unions—including an increase in the monthly benefit to $5 per year of service; widows' pensions; full benefits after 30 years of service at age 60, with $130 monthly supplements until the pensioner is able to collect full social security benefits. Currently retired employes will have their benefit raised to $3.50 per year of service.

Other gains include full company payment for health and welfare coverage; improved severance, death and disability benefits; additional vacation time after 10 and 20 years of employment, and full payment for 1967 and 1968 vacations.

Besides the USWA, the Machinists, Boilermakers, Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, Painters and Teamsters hold bargaining rights at Magma locations.

Other Unions

Still on strike against other copper firms are those unions and the Auto Workers, Bricklayers, Carpenters, Chemical Workers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Iron Workers, Laborers, Locomotive Engineers, Molders, Office & Professional Employes, Office Employes Independent Union, Operating Engineers, Pattern Makers, Plumbers, Railroad Trainmen, Railway Carmen, Railway Conductors, Sheet Metal Workers and Switchmen.

The walkout began after union employes formed a bargaining council and failed to get contract offers updating copper wages and conditions to a level the unions called average for U.S. industry. The Big Four companies have since resisted all efforts by Congress, the administration and mediators to develop "realistic" bargaining, the unions charged.

The strikers are being supported by their own unions and the labor movement. The AFL-CIO set up a relief fund which has passed the $875,000 mark in union donations. The federation also launched an "Adopt-a-Striker" campaign, which will continue.

Meanwhile, Gen. Counsel Arnold Ordman of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint that the 26 unions illegally insisted to the point of impasse on uniform contract expiration dates, and set the case for hearing by trial examiner. Also he asked the U.S. District Court in Salt Lake City to issue a restraining order. The unions have until Mar. 25 to answer the allegations and trial was set for Apr. 2.

Livingston to Work With Business Group on Jobs

Henry Ford II, chairman of National Alliance of Businessmen, and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany announced the appointment of John W. Livingston, former AFL-CIO organization director, as director of union relations of the NAB.

The appointment followed a request to Meany from Ford for a representative of the trade union movement to act as chief liaison man in Washington between organized labor and the NAB.

Meany said the AFL-CIO would contribute Livingston's services with the NAB, established at the suggestion of Pres. Johnson to undertake a program to provide jobs for the hard-core unemployed.

Livingston, a former vice president of the Auto Workers, retired at the end of 1965 after having been director of organization for the AFL-CIO from the time of its merger convention.

The 59-year-old Livingston became a union member in June 1933 when he was one of the leading sponsors of a meeting of workers at the Fisher Body Division of General Motors in St. Louis, called to discuss methods of organizing a union to combat speed-up, low wages and favoritism. That meeting established a local union and Livingston was elected president in 1934. In April 1939 he became a UAW-CIO international representative in the General Motors Dept. In 1942 he was elected director of UAW Region 5 and a member of the international executive board.

In 1947 Livingston was elected as one of the two UAW vice presidents, and he was reelected in 1949, 1951, 1953 and 1955.

In October 1955, he was nominated by the CIO as director of organization for the new merged labor organization and resigned as UAW vice president. He assumed the AFL-CIO post on Dec. 5, 1955, the day merger became effective, and retired at the 1965 convention of the AFL-CIO in December in San Francisco.

ential hiring of persons who had previously worked on the farm.

The Senate's migratory labor subcommittee earlier this year approved a companion bill, sponsored by Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.). The full Senate Labor Committee has not yet acted on the legislation.

At House and Senate hearings, Dir. Cesar Chavez of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee stressed that collective bargaining legislation would lessen, not increase, farm worker strikes.

In approving the bill, the House Labor Committee ignored a resolution by the Agriculture Committee urging that the legislation be rejected.

10 Unionists Join Staffs Of Local United Funds

Ten new full-time AFL-CIO Community Services representatives have been appointed to the staffs of local United Funds, Dir. Leo Perlis of the federation's Dept. of Community Services Activities reported.

They bring to 170 the number of full-time AFL-CIO liaison representatives in 116 communities. Another four positions have been approved, but have yet to be filled, Perlis added.

Soviet Suppression

ARTHUR J. GOLDBERG, the U. S. ambassador to the United Nations, has performed a signal service in the struggle for human rights for all peoples everywhere in exposing to world-wide scrutiny the persecution of Soviet writers.

On the opposite page the News is publishing excerpts from Ambassador Goldberg's statement to the UN Human Rights Commission citing chapter and verse on the "outrageous attempt" of the Soviet Union "to give the form of legality to the suppression of a basic human right."

This is the year the United Nations has dedicated to the observance of Human Rights, the year in which the basic guarantee of the UN Charter is to be reaffirmed and extended that "everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers."

If Human Rights Year is to have any real meaning, the UN commission should move immediately to seek, in Goldberg's words, "speedy redress" from the Soviet Union of these gross violations.

The Fair Housing Fight

IN THE CRISIS-STYLE reporting that dominates too much of the press, radio and television one of the most important votes of our times received routine and secondary coverage: the resounding Senate vote for fair housing.

In the fall of 1966 the Senate could not muster the votes to shut off a filibuster against a fair housing bill. In 1967 the measure languished in a Senate committee and the "experts" propounded the theory that civil rights legislation was dead.

But a handful of Senate liberals, the AFL-CIO and those civil rights organizations dedicated to the democratic process refused to give up. Early this year with painstaking effort the liberals brought the fair housing bill to the floor as an amendment to a measure to protect civil rights workers.

For weeks they fought the filibuster and slowly they picked up strength that the leadership of both parties could not ignore. They persevered and they won.

The battle now shifts to the House which adopted a fair housing measure in 1966 only to see it fall victim to the Senate filibuster. The House has a new chance now to affirm its support for fair housing quickly and effectively by bringing the Senate-passed measure directly to the floor for approval.

Labor was a key element of the coalition that won the fair housing fight in the Senate. And it will continue the fight for House approval of the Senate bill.

The AFL-CIO has fought for open and fair housing since its founding. Federation Pres. George Meany told a Senate subcommittee last year why:

"It is not an exaggeration to say that open housing is absolutely essential to the realistic achievement of such accepted goals as desegregated schools and equal opportunity. Indeed, until open housing becomes an operating fact, much of the statutory civil rights progress of recent years—great as it has been—will be no more than inoperative theory."

States' Rites

Johnson Prods Congress:

'Debris of Civilization' Mars U.S. Landscape, Poisons Air

The following is excerpted from Pres. Johnson's special message to Congress on conservation, "To Renew a Nation."

AN UNFOLDING technology has increased our economic strength and added to the convenience of our lives.

But that same technology—we know now—carries danger with it.

From the great smoke stacks of industry and from the exhausts of motors and machines, 130 million tons of soot, carbon and grime settle over the people and shroud the nation's cities each year.

From towns, factories, and stockyards, wastes pollute our rivers and streams, endangering the waters we drink and use.

The debris of civilization litters the landscapes and spoils the beaches.

The dangers that threaten our environment are varied. To succeed in meeting their challenge requires a wide-ranging response, with special emphasis on the items of highest priority.

For fiscal 1969, I propose a program to complete this vital agenda for action.

First, I recommend that we assure the people that their water supplies will be pure and plentiful now and in the years ahead by:

Prosecuting the war on water pollution with conviction, combining federal, state and local efforts to finance the construction this year of $1.5 to $2 billion in community waste treatment plants.

Creating a National Water Commission to plot the course of water resource management for the next century.

Helping to assure the quality of community water supplies through the Safe Drinking Water Act of 1968.

Meeting the water needs of one of America's fastest growing regions by authorizing the Central Arizona Project.

Second, I recommend that we guard the landscape against the waste products of modern life by:

Protecting rivers, beaches and coastal areas against the devastation of oil spillage and other hazardous substances through strong legislation to control them.

Preventing the future despoilment of thousands of acres of mining land through the Surface Mining Reclamation Act of 1968.

Discovering efficient methods to dispose of the millions of tons of refuse and trash that threaten to engulf city and countryside, through an extension of the Solid Waste Disposal Act, and to accelerate the development of economical systems which will convert waste into useful by-products.

Transforming our highways into corridors of beauty through prompt action to continue the Highway Beautification Program, and building new roadside parks for the traveling family.

Third, I recommend that we advance in the battle for clean air over America's cities by:

Fully exploiting our vast technology to find new and effective pollution abatement methods.

Investing $128 million as the federal share in pollution control and research, more than has ever been committed in a single year before.

Organizing for action, through the designation of Air Quality Control Regions under the landmark Air Quality Act of 1967.

Fourth, I recommend that we bring a sense of fulfillment, outdoor recreation and serenity to all Americans by:

Bringing new national parks closer to the people who live crowded-city lives by development of the redwood groves of California, the Northern Cascades of Washington and the historic Potomac River.

Adding thousands of new acres of unspoiled and primitive lands to the wilderness system.

Completing action on the nationwide networks of scenic rivers and trails.

Focusing now on the problem of noise and its impact on our daily lives.

Fifth, I recommend that we explore the peaceful promise of the ocean's depths by:

Beginning to plan now with other nations to launch an International Decade of Ocean Exploration.

Putting our most advanced marine technology to work in the development of improved buoys for better prediction of weather and ocean conditions.

Goldberg Tells UN Body:

Soviet Writers' Trial Cloaks Suppression of Basic Rights

The following is excerpted from a statement by Arthur J. Goldberg, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, to a meeting of the UN Human Rights Commission on Mar. 6.

IT IS THE PLAIN DUTY of the Human Rights Commission to be concerned about transgressions against freedom of opinion and expression whenever and wherever they occur. No country, including my own, can claim a perfect record—although we are fortunate in having an independent judiciary which has given increased protection to our own constitutional safeguards of freedom of expression, of the press, and of conscience. If, therefore, I today call attention to current and serious transgressions in the Soviet Union, it is in discharge of the plain obligations of this Commission, and not to make cold war propaganda.

We are all aware, by now, of the secret trial of two writers, Andrei Sinyavsky and Yuli Daniel, which were held in the Soviet Union starting Feb. 10, 1966 and which ended four days later. The most important fact about this trial was not merely the way in which it was conducted—but, as has been pointed out, the accused writers were tried and convicted for what they had written. Soviet writers like Boris Pilnyak, Isaac Babel, Anna Akhmatova, Boris Pasternak are among many Soviet writers who have been imprisoned, executed, silenced, denounced—but in this trial the only accusation was based on the literary work of the writers.

To one like myself, devoted to due process of law, a trial is greatly to be preferred to a summary execution. But a trial, for the crime of writing a literary work is not due process, it is an outrageous attempt to give the form of legality to the suppression of a basic human right.

In March 1966, 63 Moscow writers petitioned the Presidium of the 23rd Communist Party Congress of the Soviet Union, pleading that Sinyavsky and Daniel not be sentenced to prison terms of hard labor. The same month, 40 prominent Soviet intellectuals, including Yevtushenko and Solzhenitsyn, petitioned the Soviet government on behalf of the convicted writers. And at the same 23rd Soviet Party Congress, it was reported that the leaders of three Communist Parties—Waldeck Rochet of France, Luigi Longo of Italy and Gomulka of Poland—had refused to applaud the speech by Mikhail Sholokhov which attacked defenders of Sinyavsky and Daniel. An open letter was sent to Pravda in May 1966 by 17 French leftist artists protesting the Sinyavsky-Daniel trial—but Pravda refused to print it.

But this one trial of two young writers whose ideas the Soviet regime found embarrassing had not been the sole recent Soviet attempt to repress free literary expression. Largely through the brave action of Pavel Litvinov—grandson of the former foreign minister of the Soviet Union—the world had recently become aware of the trial, behind closed doors, of Vladimir Bukovsky. Bukovsky's crime, it appears, was to organize a public but peaceable protest of the arrest of four fellow writers—Aleksandr Ginzberg, Yugi Galanskov, Aleksei Dobrovolsky, and Miss Vera Lashkova. These four writers had in turn apparently been arrested for their part in publishing documents critical of the trial of Sinyavsky and Daniel and disseminating information about it, including excerpts of the transcript of the trial.

I have presented this statement because my country deeply believes in freedom to speak one's mind as one of the fundamental rights of man—a right which all nations have an obligation to protect; and, in the spirit of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, no country should be exempt from that obligation.

This is not the statement of one who desires to score debating points against the Soviet Union; nor is it the statement of a recent convert to the concept of freedom of expression.

MUCH HAS BEEN SAID and written in the past ten or fifteen years about various improvements in the state of individual liberties within the Soviet Union. To the extent that such improvements have taken place, even though their permanence and legal standing is far from certain, they are surely to be welcomed.

But now we are witnessing a great backward step with most disturbing implications for the cause of human rights. Writers have been accused, tried and sentenced as criminals for the sole offense of expressing themselves in writing in ways which did not please the authorities, and because these writings were sent abroad without official permission. Their trials were conducted in violation even of legal safeguards contained in Soviet law itself. When others arose to protest these proceedings, they too were arrested, held without trial for over a year, and tried and sentenced in secret—so that people on the outside would not even know of their arrest except for the protests of a courageous few, who now themselves face reprisals.

This commission has a responsibility to uphold the human rights of all peoples, regardless of their race or ideology or political system. Moreover, the United Nations itself has a responsibility to work for conditions of stability and well-being, including the enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms, which as our Charter correctly reminds us, "are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations."

In the light of that dual responsibility, we have an obligation to add our voices in this commission to the world-wide protest against these new violations of individual rights in the Soviet Union. The individuals affected by these violations are human, and their rights are not a bit smaller than yours or mine. What has happened to them has cast a shadow across the world in the very year dedicated by this organization to human rights.

On behalf of the United States I therefore protest the injustices to which they have been subjected, and appeal to the Soviet government to grant them speedy redress.

In Public, Private Sectors:

Positive Efforts to Boost Jobs Held Key to Manpower Program

AN AFL-CIO ECONOMIST called for a step-up of both public and private efforts to boost employment and cut into hard-core joblessness "in a meaningful way."

Marvin Friedman, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, said that "training and remediation" are not enough and that "direct employment" is necessary.

He singled out the proposal of Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) to create one million new public service jobs as an example of what has to be done to roll back unemployment. Friedman said there is "a sense of urgency" among some on Capitol Hill, but that others fail to see how serious the nation's manpower problems are. Friedman was questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, broadcast by the Mutual Radio Network.

The labor spokesman praised Administration proposals for a broad attack on manpower problems, noting that this would be the "largest such effort in history."

This is evidence, he said, that Pres. Johnson realizes that a "variety of things have to be tried," including "some form of public employment program financed directly by the federal government."

THE NATION'S manpower problems "are multi-faceted," Friedman said, and "cannot be placed on any single individual's doorstep. By and large, the problem that confronts us is really a question of achieving a more rapid rate of economic growth, in order to have more rapid job creation to keep pace with the growth of the labor force." He said, that unless there is a harder drive for jobs for all who are ready, willing and able to work, the year ahead holds little promise for a solid move toward full employment.

Reporters questioning Friedman were Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc.

IT HAS LONG BEEN a propaganda technique of business and industry in the United States to blame unions for "impeding the wheels of progress" by what are described as antiquated rules and regulations.

One area of technological change in which this kind of anti-union propaganda has been popular is that of the use of prefabrication in the building and construction trades industry. Jurisdictional disputes have been magnified into a virtually impassable barrier against the development of prefabricated housing products, yet the facts are otherwise.

A thorough-going research report by the Battelle Memorial Institute of Columbus, O., recently made public, reveals clearly that there are many factors, quite apart from union attitudes, that are acting as brakes on the development of prefabrication.

They are such things as building codes, zoning, tradition, architects, structure of the industry, transportation and capital requirements. Here is the way these various factors have acted as "constraints" on prefabrication:

- Building codes and their lack of uniformity were cited as hindrances because they added unnecessary costs. Some materials and products are rejected in one jurisdiction, accepted in another.
- Zoning, which frequently results in the inefficient use of land, especially low-density zoning, "has a tendency to deter the rate of growth of prefabrication."
- Tradition "is probably the biggest constraint to technological change." People usually want traditional homes that conform to traditional patterns. The study found that because of this, prefabrication can be accepted only in "small doses," on an evolutionary rather than revolutionary basis.
- Architects like to think in terms of esthetics, art and their own personalities, and mass-produced prefabricated products stunt their style. Another factor is the custom for architects' fees to be geared to the cost of a structure; any drastic cut in those costs is going to hurt the architect's monetary reward.
- Unions: The report says that "certain locals have resisted specific advances with moderate success," but contends that "to date, the unions, as a whole, have generally accepted prefabrication and have attempted to take advantage of its benefits—especially year around employment and better working conditions."

It notes that the ultimate goals of each craft union "appear to be (1) the full employment of its members, (2) a livable wage, and (3) the right to preserve and advance the traditional skills of the trade." In the light of these factors, the report says, unions are now in the process of trying to determine "whether prefabrication represents a 'threat' or a potential 'opportunity' for its membership." This process is still going on.

- Transportation of prefabricated materials is a major problem. Entire dwelling units can be factory-produced, the study found, but they can't be transported easily or economically by present methods.
- Capital requirements are a stumbling block because most home builders in the United States do not have the capital to set up costly manufacturing plants.
- Finally, the study showed that the whole structure of the construction industry—fragmented, decentralized, made up of thousands of companies and widely differing components—"does not readily lend itself to innovations of any type."

The research report was made at the request of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. at a cost of some $66,000. It is designed to help the construction unions, which represent some 3.5 million workers, to understand the nature of prefabrication and how it can help or hurt construction workers.

What it shows, however, should be of great value to other industries and the public—that blaming the unions for hindering progress is a gross fallacy and that change in an industry does not hang on any single element in the highly complicated and individualistic American economy. The "blame-the-union" gimmick should be seen for exactly what it is—an anti-labor propaganda device.

A MAJOR EFFORT to expand public and private employment is needed for a meaningful attack on hard-core joblessness, Assistant AFL-CIO Research Dir. Marvin Friedman (center) said on Labor News Conference. Questioning him on the Mutual Radio interview were Neil Gilbride (left) of the Associated Press and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc.

Johnson Proposes 'Priority Agenda' For Conservation, Pollution Control

Pres. Johnson has called on Congress to enact a "priority agenda" of measures to give Americans greater assurance of pure water, clean air, oil-free beaches and a more beautiful countryside.

In a special message—"to renew a nation"—Johnson set forth a wide-ranging program touching nearly every facet of man's environment, urging both anti-pollution and conservation action.

Some measures were new, some would strengthen existing laws and some constituted renewed appeals on previously advanced proposals. All told, the President asked for $1.2 billion in fiscal 1969 appropriations for anti-pollution and conservation plans.

The message called for a $255 million appropriation for grants under the Clean Water Restoration Act, which allows the federal government to provide financial help to communities in the construction of waste treatment plants.

Johnson also recommended a new method of financing such plants. If Congress allows, the secretary of interior would make grants in the form of annual installments in addition to the lump sum grants presently permitted.

This new financing method, the President said, would allow communities "to build many of their urgently-needed plants without delay and get them into the fight against pollution now."

Citing a recent study showing that "about 30 percent of the nation's drinking water systems" fall below federal standards, Johnson proposed a Safe Drinking Water Act of 1968.

It would empower the Health, Education & Welfare Dept. to develop, adopt and enforce improved standards covering chemical contaminants in drinking water.

The President asked Congress to strengthen a measure it is now considering to deal with the problem of oil pollution so as to make the polluter pay for the total cost of cleaning up beaches and waters.

Declaring that of all conservation problems "none is more urgent than polluted air," Johnson asked for a fiscal 1969 appropriation of $128 million to fight air pollution under present laws—twice the 1968 appropriation of $64 million.

The message bore down hard on present strip-mining practices, which Johnson said are not reclaiming the mined land. These operations, he said, are leaving "unsightly scars" and causing erosion that pours silt and acid into streams.

To counter this destruction, he proposed a new law to force states to submit within two years plans to reclaim lands that will be torn up by strip-mining. Where state plans are inadequate, the secretary of interior would impose federal standards.

Scenic Trails Urged

Turning to measures relating to enjoyment of the environment, Johnson renewed a request made in 1967 calling upon Congress to authorize a network of scenic trails, river systems and wilderness areas throughout the U.S.

He urged Congress to complete action on pending bills to create a Redwoods National Park in northern California, a North Cascades Park in the State of Washington and an Apostle Islands National Lakeshore in Wisconsin.

He urged also the development of a "uniquely historic area" along the shores of the Potomac River through Maryland, Virginia and West Virginia.

The message called on Congress to extend the Highway Beautification Act, which controls such "eyesores" as auto graveyards, billboards and junk heaps along highways. The law expired on June 20, 1967.

In another area, Johnson said he would direct agencies of the government to initiate noise abatement programs in planning highway and air routes. He also announced he has asked Sec. of State Dean Rusk to seek out international cooperation on a decade of ocean exploration.

Study Links Joblessness To Housing Bias Pattern

A year-long study in five major cities has concluded that America's unemployment problems cannot be resolved until Negroes and other minorities have an unrestricted right to buy homes in suburbs.

This is so, it found, because employers are increasingly locating in places outside the "central city" where minorities are denied housing by discrimination and because transportation to and from the suburbs is either inadequate or too costly.

The study by the National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing examined population trends, unemployment among minorities and movement of jobs in Baltimore, New York, Philadelphia, St. Louis and San Francisco.

NCDH is a non-profit agency with which 49 religious, civil rights, civic and labor organizations—including the AFL-CIO—are affiliated.

NCDH Co-directors Edward Rutledge and Jack E. Wood, Jr., said the study's findings "clearly demonstrate" the urgent need for "a national open housing policy."

The study found that between 1940 and 1960 the percentage of population living in the central city as part of the total metropolitan population decreased sharply in each of the five cities surveyed. At the same time, the non-white population increased heavily in each of the five central cities, more than doubling as a percentage of total population.

The employment side of the study found that jobs in the central cities of St. Louis and Philadelphia declined by 61,000 and 49,000 respectively from 1951 through 1965. There were "minimal" increases in jobs in the other three central cities over the 15 years the study said, due "entirely" to big gains in clerical and white collar employment.

Taking the five central cities together, there were losses of 360,000 jobs in manufacturing and 129,000 in trade—the type of employment in which minorities have the best opportunity for finding work, the study reported.

While this was happening, the NCDH report said, the "suburban rings" around all five cities showed big increases in population between 1940 and 1960, but only the area around San Francisco recorded any notable increase in the percentage of its non-white population.

The study reported that "commuting is prohibitively expensive and too time consuming to be of a practical solution for the average worker" in the central city to take jobs in the suburbs.

It cited examples of four-hour round-trips to San Francisco suburbs at a cost of $3 per day, "no public transportation" to many of the suburban areas of St. Louis and high-cost, time-consuming travel to suburbs in the other three cities.

Approved by Senate 71-20:

House GOP Key To Fair Housing

a leader in the Dixie fight against the civil rights bill. Ervin's amendment would have made it a federal crime to threaten or interfere with anyone going to or from work.

As passed by the Senate, the bill would ban racial discrimination in housing in three stages:

- Immediately in all housing covered by FHA or VA mortgage insurance, except for single-family, owner-occupied homes.
- Effective Dec. 31, 1968 on all other apartments and real estate developments. Owner-occupied dwellings of four units or less would be excluded.
- Effective Jan. 1, 1970, coverage would be extended to single-family houses sold or rented through a real estate broker. Only if the owner handled the transaction himself, without aid of a broker, could he discriminate.

The fair housing provision was drafted by Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen and the bipartisan group of senators which has led the civil rights drive. It is actually stronger than the fair housing bill which narrowly passed the House in 1966—during the 89th Congress. That bill never reached a vote in the Senate because Dirksen had opposed it and joined with the Dixie bloc in a filibuster.

Other key sections of the Senate-passed bill include:

- Stiff federal penalties for persons convicted of injuring or intimidating Negroes and civil rights workers to prevent them from attending integrated schools, voting, obtaining housing, using public facilities and enjoying other specified legal rights.
- A federal law making it a crime to cross state lines with intent to incite a riot or to make or demonstrate the use of firebombs or other explosive devices or weapons intended for use in a riot.
- A "bill of rights" for American Indians, incorporating provisions of a bill previously passed by the Senate which has been awaiting House action.

House Speaker John W. McCormack (D-Mass.) said he will attempt to have the House approve the Senate-passed bill without any further change, thus clearing it for the President's signature.

Acknowledging that northern Democrats don't have the votes to do this unassisted, McCormack said, "I hope that at least 75 Republicans will vote for this bill that is so important to the nation." He appealed to GOP presidential candidates and other national Republican leaders to help get the needed votes.

House Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford (Mich.) said he will fight the strategy. The present Senate bill is in the form of an amendment to a watered-down civil rights protection bill the House passed last year, and the normal procedure would be to set up a House-Senate conference to work out the differences.

Ford opposed the open housing bill that passed the House in 1966, but said he favors some form of open housing legislation now. But he said the House shouldn't "rubber stamp" the Senate bill.

As a prelude to asking the House to accept the Senate bill, the Rules Committee must adopt a resolution authorizing a vote. The committee has a thin liberal majority, but its chairman is conservative Rep. William M. Colmer (D-Miss.).

Collapse of opposition to the legislation in the Senate elated the foursome which had led the fight for an open housing bill—Democrats Philip A. Hart (Mich.) and Walter F. Mondale (Miss.), with Republicans Jacob K. Javits (N.Y.) and Edward W. Brooke (Mass.).

Hart said many of the senators who came around to support the bill "would have been politically more comfortable if the issue had crept away to a quiet death." But he said they ended up supporting open housing because "it was the right thing to do."

Bias Charges Dismissed Against St. Louis Locals

St. Louis—U.S. District Judge James H. Meredith threw out charges of racial discrimination against Sheet Metal Workers Union Local 36 and Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 1 with a finding that the locals have instead been taking positive steps to recruit Negro members.

The suit for an injunction was brought by the Dept. of Justice. It accused the unions of violating the Civil Rights Act of 1964 by denying union membership to Negroes and refusing them admittance to apprenticeship training programs.

"There is no evidence that any Negro who qualified for membership or apprenticeship training in the defendant locals, who applied for such in proper form and who passed objective tests and appeared for a scheduled personal interview, was excluded," the judge wrote.

"On the contrary, the evidence shows that in every instance qualified Negroes applying for union membership and apprenticeship training since July 2, 1965, have been admitted."

The judge pointed out that the Civil Rights Act went into effect on July 2, 1965.

"Since the effective date of the Civil Rights Act, both unions have admitted and treated Negroes on the same basis as whites are admitted and treated. The record is devoid of any instance of discrimination. Further, both defendants have been making and are making a determined effort to recruit Negroes into their unions."

Three other unions and the local Building & Construction Trades Council originally had been accused, but the charges were dropped.

Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., commenting on the Judge Meredith ruling, noted that the unions "were subjected to extensive and highly unfair criticism" when the complaints were filed.

"It is to be hoped," Haggerty said, "now that the charges have been dismissed by the federal court, that comparable publicity is given to the exoneration."

Bernstein Appointed To Boston Housing Post

Boston—Julius Bernstein, secretary of the Massachusetts AFL-CIO's civil rights committee and northeast regional director of the Jewish Labor Committee, has been appointed by Mayor Kevin White as a member of the Boston Public Housing Authority. The appointment was confirmed 6-to-1 by the city council.

Meany Hails Treasury Move:

U.S. to Crack Down On Industrial Bonds

A government move to end the tax-exempt status of industrial development bonds drew prompt and strong support from the AFL-CIO.

Labor has repeatedly charged that the bonds—used for low-cost financing of new factories—have been used to "pirate" industries from other communities, often with promises of low wage scales and a non-union workforce.

The Treasury Dept. announced that it will propose new regulations making interest on industrial development bonds subject to the same taxes as interest on ordinary commercial bonds. Currently, because the bonds are issued by municipalities, the interest is tax-free. This means they can be marketed at a lower interest rate than commercial bonds, thus reducing the cost of borrowing money.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany sent a congratulatory wire to Treasury Sec. Henry H. Fowler, declaring:

"Since its formation, the AFL-CIO has urged federal action to end this public subsidy for private profit in order to lure industries from one community to another. This scheme saddles all taxpayers with the cost of an unjustifiable and anti-social subsidy.

"It is our hope the new regulations will put an end to this publicly-financed industry-luring device that threatens the job security of workers and the public welfare."

Last year, the AFL-CIO Executive Council named a subcommittee of Vice Presidents I. W. Abel, David Dubinsky and William Pollock to meet with Pres. Johnson to urge an end to the tax abuses.

The federation's convention last December termed industrial development bonds a "vicious and spreading practice."

The Treasury announcement said the Internal Revenue Service is "reconsidering" its 1954 ruling that industrial revenue bonds are tax-exempt. Its proposed regulations to end the tax-exempt status would be tentative, subject to hearings and possible amendment.

Abuse Grows

The amount of new industrial bond issues has risen from $70 million in 1960 to more than $1 billion in 1967—and the loss of revenue to the Treasury has gone up proportionately.

The Treasury announcement sparked a sharp debate in the Senate—and an unsuccessful attempt to block the proposed ruling.

Sen. A. S. Mike Monroney (D-Okla.) introduced an amendment to a supplementary appropriations bill, announcing that it was intended as a congressional disapproval of any change in the tax-exempt status of industrial bonds.

The Senate rejected the amendment by a 42-38 vote.

Teachers Vote Slated, Pittsburgh Strike Ends

Pittsburgh, Pa.—Union teachers ended an 11-day strike here when the Board of Public Education agreed to a representation election, with exclusive bargaining rights for the winner if the state law is changed to permit such recognition.

Local 400 of the American Federation of Teachers, AFL-CIO, with about 1,000 of the school district's 3,100 teachers as members, voted to accept a strike settlement mediated by Common Pleas Judge John P. Hester.

Supt. Sidney P. Marland said the board agreed to "rehire" striking teachers without reprisal but noted that a state anti-strike law contains a clause revoking job tenure for public employes who strike.

The union called a walkout Feb. 29 when the board refused to allow an election despite a ruling by the state attorney general that it had the power to do so. The board got a no-strike injunction, but teachers kept on picketing schools until it changed its stand.

Judge Hester said teachers will vote the week of Apr. 1 for the union, any other teachers' organization, or neither. AFT Rep. Kenneth Miesen said state legislators will seek a change in the state law and that the union is confident of winning bargaining rights.

In other areas, militant teacher groups considered mass action to settle disputes with school and state officials in Indiana, Colorado, Oklahoma, Mississippi, South Dakota, and Utah. All are affiliates of the National Education Association.

The Florida Education Association advised teachers to end a three-week strike by 24,000 of the state's 62,000 nonunion instructors, and all but about 6,000 returned to work. Another walkout ended in Albuquerque, N.M., when the governor agreed to appoint a special study group to explore ways of getting more funds for schools.

In San Francisco, public school teachers voted 2,061-1,834 for the California Teachers Association, an NEA affiliate, over AFT Local 61, with 201 voting for neither. Union members struck for a day to win the right to the election and a time-table for contract negotiations.

10% Increase Asked in Aid For Indians

Pres. Johnson asked Congress for legislation and funds to give "the first Americans"—the nation's 600,000 American Indians—a standard of living and opportunity "equal to that of the country as a whole."

He asked a 10 percent increase—to a total of $500 million—in federal funds "targeted at the American Indian," including jobs and job training, health care, education and economic development of reservations.

The inter-related programs would be overseen by a new Cabinet-level National Council on Indian Opportunity, headed by Vice Pres. Humphrey.

Stressing the magnitude of the task, Johnson cited these statistics:

- Unemployment among Indians is nearly 40 percent—more than ten times the national average.
- 50,000 Indian families live in unsanitary, dilapidated dwellings, many in shanties, even abandoned automobiles.
- Indian literacy rates are among the lowest in the nation; the rates of sickness and poverty are among the highest.
- The average age at death of an American Indian today is 44 years; for all other Americans, it is 65.

'Freedom to Choose'

The President said Indians must have a genuine "freedom of choice." He said they should have the opportunity "to remain in their homelands, if they choose, without surrendering their dignity," or "to move to the towns and cities . . . equipped with the skills to live in equality and dignity."

Among Johnson's specific proposals were special funds to attract and keep talented teachers at Indian schools; $3 million for college scholarship grants to Indians, including special living allowances for Indian students; a major expansion of pre-school programs; a 10 percent boost in health funds and appointment of 600 community health aides. He urged more money for vocational education and authorization for a program of road construction on Indian lands

Senate Rollcall Vote On Civil Rights Bill

The Senate on Mar. 11 passed an open housing civil rights bill by a decisive 71-20 vote.

Labor supported the position of the 42 Democrats and 29 Republicans who voted for the bill. Opposed were 17 Democrats and three Republicans.

Influx of Teenage Jobseekers Cited As Unemployment Rises to 3.7%

mainly to an influx of teenagers into the labor force.

Total employment in February, seasonally adjusted, was 75.7 million, up about 560,000 from January, the Labor Dept. said. Nonfarm payroll employment was 67.7 million, up by 550,000 over the month.

With its monthly report, the department released a size-up of the job picture this winter compared with last. It showed expanded employment but no improvement in unemployment.

The pace of the jobs increase "has been just rapid enough to absorb the number of additional people entering the labor force but not rapid enough to drop unemployment," the department said.

Both the labor force and employment rose by 1.5 million between last winter and this winter "with men and women sharing about equally in the rise," the report said.

Unemployment averaged 3 million in both winters, the department reported, with "no major improvements for any of the major age-sex-color groups."

In its monthly report, the department said the surge of teenagers into the labor force in February resulted from improved weather and a search for part-time jobs at the beginning of a new semester.

The report noted that a decline of teenagers in the job market in January had been the primary factor in the decline in the unemployment rate for that month.

The February jobless rate for teenagers was 12.6 percent, an increase of 1.3 percent from January and virtually the same as the rates for December and in February 1967.

The breakdown of the February unemployment rate also showed joblessness of 2.3 percent for adult men, 4 percent for adult women, and 1.7 percent for married men—all nearly identical to the rates of last February.

Commissioner Arthur M. Ross of the Bureau of Labor Statistics called attention to the fact the jobless rates for non-white workers (7.2 percent) and white workers (3.3 percent) were exactly the same as February, 1967.

On the employment side, the department reported that jobs in manufacturing, construction, trade, service industries, and state and local government all moved up.

Nearly half the increase in nonfarm payroll jobs occurred in construction, where employment reached a new high of 3.5 million, seasonally adjusted, an increase of 250,000 over January.

This increase, in part, the department pointed out, was the result of construction workers returning to jobs after bad January weather.

Other February employment figures, seasonally adjusted, were:

Manufacturing, 19.5 million, up 66,000 from January; transportation and utilities, 4.3 million, up 16,000; wholesale and retail trade, 14 million, up 100,000; finance, 3.3 million, up 11,000; services, 10.4 million, up 45,000, and government, 12 million, up 58,000.

The department said that hourly earnings for workers on private nonfarm payrolls averaged $2.76 in February—one cent higher than in January and up 14 cents from last February.

Largely because of an increase in the workweek, weekly earnings averaged $104.33 in February, $1.20 more than in January. The workweek, seasonally adjusted, averaged 37.8 hours, an increase of 0.3 hour from January.

Interest Hike Opposed:

Housing Bill Praised On Scope, Approach

The Administration's housing bill is "the most important housing measure to come before Congress in 20 years," the AFL-CIO told the Senate Housing subcommittee.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller praised the legislation for its "scope," approach to long-standing problems and "realization that we are in the throes of an urban crisis that will not be solved by make-do measures."

But Biemiller also pointed out that the federation sees the need for "far more housing than is envisioned in this bill—considerable as it is."

He advanced "suggestions and reservations" on parts of the legislation and voiced AFL-CIO's "total disagreement" with a proposal to lift the 6 percent ceiling on the mortgages insured by the Federal Housing Administration and the Veterans Administration.

Main sponsors of the Administration bill in Congress are Sen. John J. Sparkman (D-Ala.) and Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.), chairmen of the Senate and House Banking & Currency Committees.

$6.2 Billion Asked

The bill seeks authorization over five years of $2.3 billion to build and rehabilitate 3.5 million housing units, $2.5 billion for model cities projects and $1.4 billion for urban renewal programs.

Other requests for urban planning, urban mass transportation and several smaller programs bring the total authorization sought over the five-year period to $6.3 billion.

Noting the legislation's emphasis on public housing, Biemiller said that its goal of 75,000 public housing units in 1969 and 775,000 over five years would be of "immense help" in meeting acute shelter needs of low-income families.

At the same time, he pointed out that this rate of building ought to be doubled if the nation is to overcome a backlog of need and current rate of deterioration of low-income housing, "and the needs of our expanding population."

Public housing is the "basic component" in meeting the crisis in housing among low-income families, Biemiller said. For them, he added, "the government must be the landlord of last resort."

He testified that the bill's overall rental housing proposal — $600 million in aid to provide 1.5 million new rental units over five years — has the AFL-CIO's "enthusiastic support."

He said the AFL-CIO "was pleased" with the bill's provision for a new "interest rate subsidy" under which the government would subsidize the difference between a 1 percent interest rate and the market rate for low income renters.

Biemiller also expressed the federation's support of two other new programs in the bill:

One would encourage the flow of private capital into low and moderate income housing by congressional authorization of "national housing partnerships" under a federally chartered corporation. It would assist builders across the nation.

The other, designed to bring more money into the housing mortgage market, would enable the government to guarantee mortgage bonds issued by mortgage bankers.

In other areas of testimony, Biemiller spelled out labor's backing for the legislation's model cities, urban renewal and rent supplements proposals, with some modifications and some strengthening.

He warned that the economy and home buyers might pay "a terrible price" if Congress approved the bill's provision to remove the FHA and VA interest rate ceiling and permit the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development to set a higher rate.

"Thousands of moderate income families would be squeezed out of the home buying market" and the higher interest rates would lead to "an across-the-board upward movement in all money costs," Biemiller declared.

He was accompanied by Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger who gave the subcommittee testimony on the availability of trained union craftsmen—a labor force sufficient to meet the requirements of any greatly accelerated housing program.

Strong Law Backed To Stem Job Deaths

the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare to conduct research, directly or by grants, in the occupational health and safety fields to develop standards which the Labor Dept. would put into effect and enforce. It would also give HEW responsibility for training occupational health personnel and conducting educational programs.

Meany urged that the legislation specifically establish a Center for Occupational Health within the U.S. Public Health Service. He also asked that the bill spell out the authority of the secretary of labor to reassert federal jurisdiction if a state program fails to live up to its promise.

He asked inclusion of the federal government's own 2.8 million workers in the legislation and urged an intensive special program to bring about safety and health protections for smaller plants, with less than 500 workers, where more than 60 percent of the nation's workforce is employed.

Particularly important, Meany declared, is the need for "full funding" of the program by Congress.

Lack of enforcement manpower has marred the federal government's record in safety areas where it has jurisdiction, Meany said.

He told the subcommittee that "only recently" has there been the start of effective enforcement of the Longshoremen & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act. And, he charged, "the safety inspection staff under the Walsh-Healey Act is woefully undermanned."

Despite a 1965 special report urging a vigorous national occupational health program, Meany told the subcommittee, a reorganization within the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare downgraded the Division of Occupational Health.

LBJ Lauded

He praised Pres. Johnson for bringing before Congress, for the first time in the nation's history, "legislation to secure safe and healthy working conditions for all workers as a national goal." He added:

"This is the moment organized labor has long awaited in the discouraging and often tragic quest of generations of Americans workers for a safe and healthy place of employment . . .

"Enactment and full funding by Congress this year is imperative; the alternative is intolerable —more time lost, and no stop to the mounting toll of deaths, illness and injuries to American workers—a toll which can and must be reduced by every means within the powers of a concerned nation."

Safety legislation hearings in both the House and Senate have put into the hearing record evidence by government experts that the toll of preventable, on-the-job ailments and injuries is shockingly high.

Survey Data Noted

Surgeon Gen. William H. Stewart gave a "conservative" estimate on the basis of a survey of 1,700 industrial establishments that there are at least 336,000 cases of occupational diseases in the United States each year.

At Senate hearings, committee members turned away in horror at pictures of preventable industrial accidents displayed by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

Wirtz anticipated the "leave it to the states" argument later presented by witnesses from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers.

It is a "fair question," he said, to ask those claiming an invasion of states rights whether they will support legislation in their states to set up effective state health and safety programs. Or, he suggested, will they merely "hurry from opposing it here to some state capital to oppose it there?"

CWA Installers Support Strike By 15-1 Vote

New York — Leaders of the Communications Workers won authorization to call a strike if necessary against the Western Electric installation division of the Bell Telephone system and prepared to take strike votes at two more Bell units if management does not improve its wage offers.

At Western Electric, equipment installers voted by a 15-to-1 margin for strike authorization, CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne announced.

The union, which represents 23,000 installers, first turned down a company wage offer as "unresponsive" and then conducted a strike authorization vote. Negotiations were put on a standby basis pending further developments.

At Ohio Bell, where CWA represents 19,200 employes, the union got what it called an unsatisfactory wage increase offer and called for a vote Mar. 16 on strike sanction. Illinois Bell has until Mar. 17 to make an acceptable offer for 6,000 switchboard operators before a similar vote is taken, the union said.

Negotiations at all three have been limited to wage matters under a reopener provision in CWA's three-year contracts with Bell system companies. The union is free to strike over wages after giving notice.

CWA made a "substantial general wage increase" for 420,000 Bell workers its major goal in a nine-month series of contract negotiations that started Feb. 10. The union's 67-member wage policy committee voted in January to seek a wage hike tied to Bell's high profits and rising productivity.

Congress Asked to Speed Probe Of Automobile Insurance Abuses

American workers have "mounting grievances" over high costs and "unsatisfactory performance" of the auto insurance industry, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller urged "speedy approval" by a Senate Commerce subcommittee of legislation calling for a full-scale investigation of auto insurance. The study, proposed by Pres. Johnson in his consumer message to Congress, would be made by the Dept. of Transportation with help from other federal agencies.

"Working people are among those hardest hit by soaring car insurance costs and arbitrary cancellations," Biemiller stressed.

"With factories now so widely dispersed and beyond the reach of obsolete public transit systems, their car is for many workers the lifeline to their jobs. But insurance companies can, and all too often do, threaten that lifeline through their ability to withhold insurance, or at least to extract crushing fees for it."

Discrimination based on race, occupation and residence is widespread in the insurance industry, Biemiller charged, and in nearly half the states increases in auto insurance rates can be made without public hearings — sometimes without public knowledge until after the fact.

The AFL-CIO testimony noted that various proposals have been made for major changes in the method of handling auto accident claims. Whatever the best solution might be, Biemiller said, "we have little confidence that these problems can be ultimately resolved by voluntary action on the part of the insurance industry or by action of the 50 separate states."

On other legislation, the AFL-CIO:

- Endorsed an Administration bill which would allow persons who sign purchase contracts from door-to-door salesmen to have a "cooling off" period to cancel the contract. The AFL-CIO urged that the cancellation period be three days, rather than the one day allowed under the bill.
- Asked a Senate Labor subcommittee to approve legislation to permit employer contributions to trust funds for college scholarships and day care centers for children of working parents. A rigid interpretation of the Taft-Hartley Act makes it difficult for unions to negotiate such benefits and the legislation is in the form of an amendment to the basic labor law.
- Urged approval of Pres. Johnson's proposal to earmark $100 million a year in royalties from lease of offshore oil rights for the purchase of land for recreational purposes. The bill is being considered by the Senate Interior Committee and has been approved by a House subcommittee.
- Called on the Senate Commerce Committee to reject a bill that would free many electric power wholesale transactions from federal regulation. In a telegram to committee members, Biemiller charged: "It would threaten the electric consumer with higher power bills and set back present progress toward the establishment of a modern, efficient, reliable and nondiscriminatory mixed-ownership national power supply system."

Senate Urged To Act Now on Rights Treaties

The AFL-CIO has again appealed to Sen. J. William Fulbright (D-Ark.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, "to cease all further delays" in holding hearings and reporting long-pending human rights treaties.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller issued the appeal in a letter to Fulbright in which he enclosed a copy of the recent AFL-CIO Executive Council statement on the treaties.

The council emphasized that Senate ratification of four treaties was urgent if the U. S. is to "participate effectively" in a United Nations Conference on Human Rights to be held in April at Teheran, Iran.

The pending treaties are conventions on freedom of association and the abolishment of forced labor, adopted by the Intl. Labor Organization, and conventions condemning the crime of genocide and spelling out political rights of women.

Phelps Dodge Pact Cracks 8-Month Copper Deadlock

Leaders Press Senate Bill:

Rules Unit Delays House Rights Vote

House Democratic leaders will continue to press for an "up or down" vote on the Senate-passed open housing civil rights bill.

Their timetable was thrown off when the House Rules Committee voted 8-7 to postpone action on a resolution which would have allowed the House to vote on whether or not to accept the Senate bill without change.

The alternative would be to send the bill to a House-Senate conference committee, where any compromise would almost certainly be a weakening of the Senate version—particularly its ban on discrimination in the sale or rental of housing. That's because the original House bill, passed last year, did not include a fair housing provision. And the Senate conferees would be led by the southerners who have top seniority on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

House Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford (Mich.) has pressed for the conference route—over the objections of most of the GOP's liberal-to-moderate wing. About a third of House Republicans had been counted on to join with the bulk of northern Democrats to support the bipartisan Senate bill.

Ford's strategy won the first round in the Rules Committee. Seven Administration Democrats—including three liberal southerners—voted for immediate consideration of a resolution allowing the House to vote on the Senate bill.

As expected, the five Republicans on the committee joined with Chairman William M. Colmer (D-Miss.) to oppose the move. But their motion to defer committee action un-

Chiseling On Wages Shows Rise

Labor Dept. wage-hour investigators expanded their inspection of business establishments and found more workers underpaid, they reported for the six-month period ended last Dec. 31.

The report was the first since the department's Wage-Hour & Public Contracts Division instituted a flexible investigation procedure to measure compliance with the 1966 amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The first stage of the amendments took effect Feb. 1, 1967.

For the half year through December 1967, inspectors visited 33,230 of the country's 1.9 million establishments covered by the law—an increase of 3,481 visits.

The number of workers found to have been underpaid by employers rose 6.4 percent to a total of 193,668.

Total underpayments rose also—from $35.6 million in the pre-

Talks Focus On Other Big Firms

By Eugene A. Kelly

The first of 60,000 striking copper workers started back to work after ratifying an agreement their unions called "the fattest package of benefits ever won" from any major copper company.

Strike's end for 6,500 workers in four states arrived after eight months on the picket line when union negotiators came to terms with Phelps Dodge Corp. in the 12th day of talks initiated at the White House by Pres. Johnson.

Leaders of 14 unions went back home to attend local ratification meetings but other union bargainers kept trying to win the same concessions from other members of copper's Big Four—the Anaconda Co., Kennecott Copper Corp., and American Smelting & Refining Co.

An announcement by the 26-union coalition coordinating the strike and contract talks said the Phelps Dodge settlement "goes a long way toward meeting the bargaining goals" formulated nearly a year ago to update copper wages and working conditions.

The "package" does not, the unions said, fully satisfy the needs of employes, but provides wage gains totaling 54 cents an hour over the contract term, major pension improvements, and better hospitalization, vacation, and unemployment benefit terms.

The unions made "very substantial" progress toward achieving a common expiration date for all P-D contracts though they did not fully reach that goal this year, they reported. The settlement did, however, shorten the gap between contract expirations, a major coalition objective.

Training For 500,000:

Business Job Plan Wins Union Support

American businessmen will have the full cooperation of organized labor in training 500,000 jobless ghetto-dwellers for useful employment, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany assured the National Conference on Job Opportunities of the new National Alliance of Businessmen.

Citing labor's experience in getting minority-group young people into the apprenticed trades, Meany said that "even with the fullest cooperation, even with the optimum amount of government assistance, it will not be easy." Nevertheless, he said, "this is a most welcome development."

From 50 Cities

Pres. Johnson opened the one-day conference of business leaders from 50 cities. They were called to Washington by NAB Chairman Henry Ford II and Vice Chairman J. Paul Austin to launch a government training program called Job Opportunities in the Business Sector (JOBS). Ford is chairman of the Ford Motor Co., Austin is president of the Coca-Cola Co.

Johnson thanked the business leaders for their concern in giving their "time and money and heart to their fellow men." He said "you've come here not to complain of crisis, but to meet it."

Referring to the new $350 million job training plan initiated by the Labor Dept., Johnson declared "you are launching the most massive job program in the history of the nation."

It will be the government's role, he said, to locate the hardcore unemployed, and the role of business

Expansion of Aid Urged To Vocational Education

By Duane Emme

The Administration's proposed Partnership for Learning & Earning Act would improve and strengthen the Vocational Education Act of 1963, the AFL-CIO told a House Education subcommittee.

The federation warned, however, in testimony presented by Legislative Rep. Kenneth Young, that the proposed level of financing the program falls far short of meeting pressing needs in vocational training. Young was accompanied by Otto Pragan of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education staff, a member of the National Advisory Council on Vocational Education.

Young told the subcommittee that the 1963 law, establishing a broad system of federal grants for vocational training and retraining, is looked upon by labor as a "significant milestone in the growth of vocational education."

But, he added, recent studies of progress under the law show that "the breakthrough—full implementation of the 1963 Act's concepts—has not yet come."

There has not been a sufficient increase in emphasis on vocational training, particularly in the area of benefitting youths who are not in school, he observed, declaring "There still are not enough schools, not enough funds and not enough programs."

Turning to the bill, Young said

Fire Fighters Jubilee Helps Dystrophy Fund

The Fire Fighters dedicated their 50th anniversary celebration to help finance the drive against muscular dystrophy—and notables from all walks of life turned out to help them.

More than 1,000 guests paid tribute to the union's record of public service—and paid $50 a plate to benefit the Muscular Dystrophy Associations of America.

Speakers included AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz. Jerry Lewis, who is national chairman of the MDAA, was master of ceremonies. Hostesses in native costumes came from the embassies of Belgium, Denmark, France, Great Britain, Ireland, Israel, Mexico, Switzerland and Uruguay.

The union which made it all possible was hailed for its long record of community service.

UAW Reaches Settlement at Rambler Firm

Detroit — The Auto Workers reached tentative agreement with American Motors Corp. on a new two-year agreement covering 14,300 automotive plant employes but 3,000 other UAW members at American's Kelvinator appliance plant at Grand Rapids, Mich., turned down a "final" company offer and went on strike.

Workers at two plants in Milwaukee accepted the new AMC terms and 8,000 Kenosha members were due to vote Mar. 21. The proposed pact does not meet the Big Three auto pattern but does have gains the union called the "best possible" under the company's financial circumstances.

The settlement provides a wage increase of 15 cents an hour for production workers and 35 cents for skilled workers in the first contract year. The second-year increase is 3 percent or 9 cents an hour, whichever is larger, plus an 8-cent cost-of-living increase.

In another development, 2,000 UAW members at Massey-Ferguson tractor plants in Detroit, Des Moines, Racine, Wis., and Cuyahoga Falls, O., struck when contract talks broke down temporarily. The talks are the last of five in the farm equipment industry this year —all others resulted in contract agreements.

At General Motors, UAW announced settlement of all local contract agreements except nine out of 168. Three GM plants are still on strike over local issues—at Atlanta and Doraville, Ga., and Framingham, Mass.

Tobacco Locals Ratify Contract

Members of Tobacco Workers locals in Durham, N.C., and Richmond, Va., have voted to ratify a new three-year contract with the Liggett & Myers Tobacco Co.

Ten cents of the 24-cent first-year increase is retroactive to last June 10, the TWIU said, and an additional 5 cents dates back to Sept. 30. There is a 9-cent increase the second year and 12 cents the final year.

The contract also includes a cost-of-living clause, a fifth week of vacation for long-service workers, and additional holiday and higher sick benefits.

About 3,000 union members are covered by the agreement.

MERITORIOUS PUBLIC SERVICE award of the Sidney Hillman Foundation, honoring the memory of the Clothing Workers' first president, was presented to Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz by ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky at a dinner in Washington.

Union Asks New Offer By Struck Glass Firms

Philadelphia, Pa.—Pres. Lee W. Minton of the Glass Bottle Blowers asked employers of 50,000 striking union members to make a new contract offer improved enough to warrant laying before the union's 93-member conference committee.

As the strike entered its seventh week no meetings were scheduled following turndowns of a union counterproposal Mar. 12 and a company proposal made Mar. 15.

Earlier Minton had asked the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service to explore the possibility of a federal panel like that convened by Pres. Johnson in the copper strike. When no action resulted, he asked for a new company proposal.

Negotiations between the union and the Glass Container Manufacturers Institute on contract terms began Nov. 28 and halted Feb. 1 when the strike of 32,000 production workers began. The strike spread later in February to skilled workers and then to West Coast production workers, all covered by separate contracts.

The shutdown affected plants producing more than 90 percent of the U.S. supply of glass containers. Its continuation has caused layoffs or shutdowns at plants of distillers, soft drink dealers and pharmacy suppliers.

In January the employers offered an immediate increase of 17 cents an hour in base rates, plus 10 cents for skilled classifications; additional hikes of 4 percent in the second year, 3 percent in the third, plus a cost-of-living clause, pension and insurance improvements, and steps toward a uniform wage structure for similar jobs.

Minton recommended acceptance of the offer but local union presidents voted it down, 62-31.

On Mar. 12 the union offered a counterproposal providing a 20-cent wage hike the first year, with an additional 20 cents an hour for skilled workers; another increase of 12.5 cents an hour in the second year plus a cost-of-living escalator; a 5 percent wage boost in the third year plus the living-cost bonus, and an early retirement system permitting pension benefits after 30 years of service regardless of age.

Employers rejected this offer but on Mar. 15 offered 17 cents an hour increase the first year, 12.5 cents a year later, and 3 percent in the third year with the living-cost escalator, plus retirement as of Mar. 1, 1969 at age 62 without loss of benefits for those retiring after Feb. 1, 1968.

The GBBA committee rejected this proposal too.

Receives Hillman Award:

Wirtz Bids Nation Heed Riot Report

America's race problem will be solved only as all the people "who are the problem" participate in a solution, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz warned in accepting the Sidney Hillman public service award.

Wirtz appealed to liberals to muster support for the recent report of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders. Its "truths," he said, must be read and heeded by every citizen.

The award, given to persons who make outstanding contributions to public welfare, is one of several programs maintained by the Sidney Hillman Foundation, honoring the memory of the Clothing Workers' founding president.

ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky presented the award—a scroll and a check for $1,000—to Wirtz at a dinner in Washington attended by prominent leaders in labor and government.

Commenting that too many people seek to avoid the "truths" in the commission report, Wirtz recalled a speech made by Hillman in 1940 in which he said:

"People love not to perceive danger. People love to believe that things are not bad because if things are really bad we have to do something about them."

The danger in not accepting and acting on the commission's report, Wirtz said, is to face a "sort of drift towards factual apartheid" and the "risk of hateful racism in this country."

"Reactionaries" and "inactionaries" are against the report, he observed, because it "indicts the status quo with unprecedented sharpness" and demands "massive action—now."

Questions facing the nation in the next critical decade, Wirtz said, are: Can we change not only legislation but citizens reactions? Can we actively, dedicatedly reject apartheid? Can we make equality "an operating ideal?"

Reports, statutes and laws cannot answer these questions, he declared. "They are limitations, guidelines, restraints to prevent the worst. The citizens themselves can only achieve the best."

The challenge of the report, he concluded, "is to move beyond the formal structures of a free society to one that is lived in spirit and truth."

In presenting the award, Potofsky described Wirtz as a leader who combines "vision and idealism" with "a deep commitment to humanitarianism, an understanding of modern institutions and a dedication to the public welfare."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who also spoke at the award dinner, praised Wirtz as "one who knows workers and their problems and knows from long experience that the worker's best instrument for justice is the trade union movement."

Hospital Accepts Union, 11-Month Strike Ends

Cleveland, O.—Striking employes of St. Luke's Hospital won an 11-month battle when trustees agreed to recognize their union—Local 47 of the Building Service Employes—and negotiate a contract.

Nearly 450 orderlies and service employes stayed on the picket line from Apr. 12, 1967 to Mar. 10, when they voted unanimously to return to work. They achieved their major objective—union recognition—and turned to their next goal, union wages and working conditions.

The strike settlement covers 15 groups at the privately-operated hospital, ranging from housekeepers to laboratory assistants in medical research. Trustees agreed that BSEIU Local 47 will represent all strikers, replacements hired during the strike and all future employes, who must join the union as a condition of employment.

What appeared to be a hopeless dispute was settled when Mayor Carl B. Stokes (D), the city's first Negro mayor, fulfilled a campaign promise by getting both sides to meet in his office. Until then, hospital trustees had refused even to consider recognition.

The trustees reconsidered their position when the legislation committee of Cleveland City Council unanimously approved an ordinance requiring collective bargaining, enforceable by municipal courts, for establishments employing 25 or more persons not protected by the National Labor Relations Act.

Stokes requested the ordinance and Council seemed ready to pass it when the hospital management yielded. Soon afterward, the Cleveland Hospital Council, representing 49 nonprofit hospitals in northeast Ohio, dropped its opposition to union recognition and recommended a new set of "guidelines" for member hospitals that included secret ballot elections.

Pres. Joseph E. Murphy of Local 47 said employes of other private hospitals in the area will be urged to join the union.

The St. Luke's organizing drive was started in 1966 by BSEIU and the AFL-CIO regional office. It won support from many community groups including the Methodist Ministerial Association, the United Negro Ministerial Association, the Diocesan Senate of Priests and the Senate of Religious Women, representing 41 communities of Catholic nuns. The hospital is affiliated with the Methodist Church.

AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Jesse Gallagher called the settlement a "tremendous victory" for organized labor and its supporters in the community.

Urban Coalition Cites 'Urgent' Need For 1 Million Public Service Jobs

The Urban Coalition of labor, business, religious, civil rights and city officials has renewed an appeal for legislation to provide at least 1 million "urgently needed" jobs in public service employment.

Through its 15-member executive committee, the coalition also called on Congress to enact Pres. Johnson's housing bill and approve a $279 million supplemental appropriation for the Office of Economic Opportunity.

The actions were urged in statements adopted by the executive committee of the coalition and announced by its new chairman, former Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare John W. Gardner.

A fourth executive committee statement "strongly endorsed" the report of the President's Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders and commended it to the attention of all citizens.

The coalition, formed last summer to emphasize the urban crisis, sponsored an "emergency convocation" in Washington in August which gave top priority to the need for 1 million new public service jobs.

The more than 1,000 prominent Americans attending that meeting emphasized the program would provide "meaningful" work for jobless persons and meet a backlog of employment needs in parks, streets, schools, libraries and hospitals.

Noting that legislation to establish the 1-million job program was introduced in the last session of Congress but not acted upon, the coalition said that developments since have revealed increased "unemployment despair."

In the housing field, the coalition asked Congress for "bold and immediate" action to spur urgently-needed public and private housing.

Praising Johnson's proposed Housing & Urban Development Act of 1968, the coalition said his proposals "are essential if housing and urban reconstruction are to have their just and proper priority."

The coalition specifically backed such measures as an expanded model cities program, extended rent supplements to low income families, an emphasis on public housing and cooperative housing, and a fair housing law.

The coalition also called for a "mix of private resources" in the housing field if Americans are to have "the long denied opportunity of a decent home and suitable living environment."

On the supplemental appropriation for OEO, it said the extra $279 million is needed as follows: $104 million to raise current appropriations to the level authorized for fiscal 1968, $100 million to replace funds diverted from OEO, and $75 million for special summer employment, education and recreation programs.

Booklet Details Veterans Benefits

The Veterans Administration has released its 1968 edition of "Federal Benefits for Veterans and Dependents," an annual publication that reviews benefits available to veterans of military service.

The 1968 booklet includes details of the Veterans' Pension & Readjustment Assistance Act of 1967, which gives Viet Nam veterans the same benefits available to other wartime veterans and expands all veterans benefits.

Single copies may be obtained for 20 cents from Supt. of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20402. Discount rates are available for quantity purchases.

Other Talks Pressed:

Phelps Dodge Pact First Copper Break

per operations at Bisbee, Douglas, Ajo and Morenci, Ariz., and El Paso, Tex., terminate June 30, 1971, while agreements for company wire and cable mills at Fordyce, Ark., and Yonkers, N.Y., are due to expire Mar. 24 of that year.

The Yonkers and Fordyce contracts are of 36 months' duration, while the mining, smelting and copper refining operations have a pact extending over 39.5 months.

More than half the P-D workers are members of the Steelworkers. The others are represented by the Boilermakers, Bricklayers, Carpenters, Chemical Workers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, Machinists, Operating Engineers, Painters, Plumbers, Railroad Trainmen, Railway Carmen and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

Total direct wage gains in the settlement average 19.1 cents an hour effective at once, plus 16.4 cents and 18.3 cents on the first and second anniversary dates.

Major improvements were made in pension programs, all effective on contract signing except that at the copper properties, full pensions after 30 years of service at age 60 take effect at the start of the second contract year.

The 30-year pension carries a $130 monthly supplement to age 65. Some pension improvements, including a boost in the monthly benefit to $5 per year of service and disability pension betterments, are retroactive to July 1, 1967, before the strike started. The former benefit was $2.50 a month times years of service.

The unions also won improvements in vacation and insurance plans. All strike time will count as time worked for the purpose of computing vacations and pensions.

Other contract language problems and many local issues also were resolved, the unions said.

The P-D contract was the first break in the ranks of a unified management combine that made only one inadequate contract offer before the strike started July 15, 1967, and made only slight improvements until the President intervened.

The strikers have been supported by their own unions and the labor movement. The federation set up a relief fund to which nearly $900,000 has been contributed. Also it launched an "adopt-a-striker" campaign which will continue while the need exists.

THE DISTILLERY WORKERS pledged full support to 1,280 members of Local 146, on strike since Feb. 1 at the Linden, N.J., complex of the General Aniline & Film Corp. The members struck to protest management's unwillingness to budge from a fixed position during months of protracted contract talks, union Pres. Mort Brandenburg said.

Steelworkers Approve Defense Fund, Dues Hike

Atlantic City, N.J.—A special 1-day convention of the Steelworkers voted decisively, Mar. 20, to arm the union with a strike and defense fund and raise the dues structure of its 1.2 million members.

More than 3,600 delegates, representing local unions in the United States and Canada, moved to create the special strike benefit fund through an extra $5 per month increase in dues for a 5-month period starting in April.

In September, this special levy will end and a new dues structure will replace the current $5 monthly fee. The dues approved by the convention will range from $5 to a maximum of $10 a month. The graduation will be based on two hours average earnings of the members. Dues above the $5 base level will be distributed equally between the local unions, the USWA general fund and the strike and defense fund.

USWA Pres. I. W. Abel set the serious tone of the convention with his keynote address describing the financial predicament of the union created by increasing operating costs.

Abel cited expanding services to the members and the mounting resistance by industries in negotiations as major reasons for the need to revitalize the union's finances and provide adequate strike defense reserves to support its collective bargaining committments.

30,000 in Copper

With some 30,000 USWA members still engaged, along with members of 25 other international unions, in a nation-wide nonferrous industry strike now in its ninth month, Abel cited this as a convincing example of "the hard line attitude of employers in collective bargaining" and as the principal reason for building up a substantial strike benefit fund.

"The existence of a strike and defense fund will mean added assurance to every Steelworker that if need arises, there will be some help for the needy member and his family during the strike," Abel said.

The USWA contracts in basic steel and aluminum covering some 500,000 members expire this summer.

Sec.Treas. Walter J. Burke, in a detailed analysis of the union's finances, demonstrated that, while the union treasury maintains solvency, indications point to a further drop in the union's net worth unless higher dues fees were established.

"We must get back to paying our way out of our dues income and we must build up reserves if we are to have maximum bargaining power with the employers," Burke warned.

He compared the current $18 million net worth of the USWA with the nearly $5 billion combined total working capital of the companies the union faces in collective bargaining.

Mediation Panel Seeks Solution To Los Angeles Hearst Dispute

Los Angeles—A tripartite mediation panel went into a huddle here Mar. 19 for the first time to seek an end to a 100-day strike-lockout at the Hearst-owned Herald-Examiner.

The three-man board is headed by Lloyd H. Bailer, 53, former New York area arbitrator and mediator and now a resident here.

His appointment was announced by Mayor Sam Yorty in response to a City Council resolution demanding a fresh approach to the dispute with Hearst, which has idled 2,000 members of 10 AFL-CIO unions and the Teamsters.

Labor and management representatives were expected to join the mediation panel at a later date.

Union leaders involved in the strike-lockout have agreed to meet with the panel "in hopes this will lead to good faith and meaningful negotiations."

There was no immediate response from Hearst management. Wages, work rules and fringe items have been at the core of the fight, now the longest newspaper dispute in California history. The former record was a 13-week tieup in 1946 at the old Herald-Express here, also owned by Hearst.

Numerous attempts by a team of state and federal mediators to solve the Herald-Examiner stalemate have failed.

Bailer, who served during World War II with the War Production Board and War Labor Board, in recent years has acted as permanent arbitrator in recent longshore and rail labor disputes.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz appointed him to aid in reviewing Executive Order 10988, issued by Pres. Kennedy to establish collective bargaining procedures for government employes.

Los Angeles County officials last month named Bailer to a panel for drafting an employe relations ordinance.

Serving with him on the Herald-Examiner dispute board are Herman Leavitt, president of the Los Angeles Joint Culinary Board, and Ralph Woolpert, industrial relations director for a Southern California drug retail chain.

Yorty Message

Yorty, in a message to the City Council, called for a $3,000 appropriation for Bailer, based on a 30-day period, since "the issues involved in the matter are of sufficient public concern and have impact upon the local economy of a nature serious enough to warrant the expenditure of public funds."

The council approved the salary item by 10 to 1.

The attempt to restore bargaining at the nation's largest evening newspaper came as the city council prepared to take testimony Mar. 27 on a proposed anti-strikebreaker ordinance. California AFL-CIO leaders also have asked for a mail campaign in support of proposed state legislation on strikebreakers.

Hearst management has published the Herald-Examiner with the aid of about 100 imported professional strikebreakers.

But labor support of the strikers has cut sharply into the paper's circulation—reducing it from 725,000 daily to approximately 250,000—and in January resulted in loss of nearly one million lines of advertising. Conservative estimates put dollar loss of advertising at more than $1.25 million for the month.

Strikers further are appealing for a national boycott of the Hearst-owned papers in Seattle, Albany, Boston, Baltimore, San Antonio, and San Francisco; 14 magazines, including Cosmopolitan, Good Housekeeping, Popular Mechanics and House Beautiful; Avon paperback books, and radio-TV outlets in Pittsburgh, Milwaukee, Baltimore, and San Juan, P.R.

LEADERS of United Farm Workers Organizing Committee joined with AFL-CIO organizers from western states in a workshop conference at Delano, Calif., headquarters for the farm union. At blackboard are Alan Kistler, left, and Edward Haines, both assistant directors of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization. It was one of a series of regional conferences for the federation's organizing staff. The photo shows only part of the participants.

Bill Backed To Allow Joint Industry Fund

A measure that would permit joint labor and management sponsorship of industrial promotions has received the support of the AFL-CIO.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller expressed the organization's support of a bill to amend Section 302(c) of the Labor Management Relations Act in a letter to Rep. Frank Thompson (D-N.J.), chairman of the Special House Labor subcommittee, which is considering the action.

"Section 302 now prohibits all payments by employers to union representatives except payments to certain specified exempted employer-supported funds such as health and welfare funds," Biemiller observed.

The proposed amendment would specifically permit jointly administered trade and industry product promotion programs.

"These programs should not be prohibited by law because they have the desirable effect and purpose of expanding business opportunities and employment in the industries where they have been developed," Biemiller said. "The bill would permit, but would not require, collective bargaining on the establishment of such programs or funds." Enactment of the amendment, he said, "would be an act of simple justice."

Gold Crisis Laid to 'Run' by Speculators

CADET FIRST CLASS Geoffrey S. Gorsuch discusses life at the U.S. Air Force Academy with AFL-CIO Public Relations Dir. Albert J. Zack, who is a member of the Academy's public affairs advisory committee. Cadet Gorsuch is the son of Clifford L. Gorsuch, regional director and legislative representative for the Broadcast Employes & Technicians.

U.S. Production Still the Force That Maintains Strength of Dollar

By David L. Perlman

To the average newspaper reader, the world's "gold crisis" didn't become news until it moved from the financial pages to the front pages.

Suddenly, it seemed, gold was in all the headlines and somehow involved with the American dollar, taxes, budget, interest rates and jobs.

How did it happen and what does it mean?

Basically, the "crisis" came about—as AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger expressed it—because of the manipulations of "international speculators who seek quick windfall profits from a complete collapse of the world's monetary system."

The major currency of world trade isn't gold; it is the American dollar. There is a relationship between gold and the U.S. dollar in world trade, but the value of the dollar does not depend on the number of gold bars buried in Fort Knox.

"The American dollar," Goldfinger stressed, "is the world's strongest currency because the American economy is the richest and most productive in the world." The backing is the $800 billion in goods and services produced by America's workers in a single year—and the continued health of that economy.

If world trade depended on an exchange of gold alone, international commerce would quickly grind to a halt and national economies would collapse because there just isn't that much gold.

In 1944, even though the war was still raging in Europe and the Pacific, the end was close enough in sight so that the free world's financial experts met at Bretton Woods, N.H., to try to work out a system for financing postwar commerce and stabilizing currencies.

Based on the Dollar

An addition to gold was needed. That supplement was the American dollar.

It was only incidental that the United States then had the bulk of the world's gold supply. The important consideration was the enormous, unprecedented productivity of the American economy. It was for that reason, not because of gold bars, that in the free markets of the world—and in the "black markets" where currency is exchanged if the official rate is unrealistic—the demand was for dollars. In practical terms, the value of other currencies was set by how many francs or liras or pesos it cost to buy a dollar.

The United States in effect became the world's banker and guaranteed the stability of its currency in the world market by agreeing to exchange on demand gold for dollars at the rate of $35 an ounce.

With the help of billions of dollars in American aid to reconstruct war-torn economies, world commerce boomed in the post-war era. And since dollars were as good as gold, there was as little reason to turn them in as for people with money in the bank to withdraw their deposits and put the cash in a mattress.

If dollars are considered only as IOU's on American gold, however, there isn't enough gold in Fort Knox to pay off the demand—any more than there would be enough cash on hand in U.S. banks if every depositor insisted on drawing out all his money. Or in any bank in any other country, for that matter. Nationally and internationally, finance is a credit operation, resting on confidence.

When, over the post-war years, America continued to pay out more dollars to other countries than it took in, the question arose as to what would happen if there were a "run on the bank"—a large-scale demand for conversion of dollars into gold.

France, under DeGaulle, started a run on the bank by converting large quantities of dollars into gold. And in the private gold market in London, speculators of many nationalities — including Americans trading illegally through Swiss numbered bank accounts—gambled that the price of gold would have to be raised to prevent the complete liquidation of America's dwindling gold reserves. The United States and a pool of six European nations—not including France — were pledged to sell gold at $35 an ounce if the supply in the private market was less than the demand.

As of a week ago, only about $1 billion in U.S. gold reserves was available to sell on demand for dollars. Another $10.4 billion in U.S. gold was held as legal backing for U.S. currency—25 cents in gold for every dollar of currency.

World bankers, like domestic bankers, tend to be economic conservatives. They looked askance at the heavy deficit the United States was facing as a result of Viet Nam military spending, and the reluctance of Congress to approve a tax increase. The traditional prescription for a nation facing a big deficit was to tighten its belt—despite the experience of recent history that the resultant slowdown in the economy would mean recession—less spending, but fewer tax dollars coming in as well.

These steps were taken to avert an immediate crisis:

Congress approved — although narrowly—legislation repealing the previous requirement for 25 percent gold backing on U.S. currency.

That had no domestic effect, but it freed the entire stock of U.S. gold—about $11.4 billion—for international transactions.

It also lessened the likelihood of demands for conversion because governments, like people, don't rush to withdraw money from a bank when they know the bank is not about to run out of cash.

The United States and the six other countries which had been supporting the price of gold at $35 in the private market—Belgium, Britain, West Germany, Italy, the Netherlands and Switzerland—announced that hereafter they will neither sell nor buy gold for monetary purposes on the private market. Gold thus can be bought or sold by private citizens or businesses on the international marketplace for whatever price buyer and seller agree on.

Central banks of nations may still convert dollars to gold—but only if they do not sell any of their gold reserves on the private market in order to turn a quick profit.

In the long run, however, the solution to the gold shortage is seen in steps already planned by the Intl. Monetary Fund to expand the supply of international currency through what has been called "paper gold."

Time Needed

It will take some time before this long-term solution can take effect. Speculators and governments which refuse to cooperate could still cause trouble.

Working towards stability, however, is the obvious fact that a collapse of the dollar as an international currency would hurt the rest of the world far more than the United States.

A Swiss banker, quoted by the New York Times as he was taking orders for gold purchases from clients all over the world, said grimly: "Don't they realize, these people who are buying gold, that they are destroying the whole monetary system of the world."

Worship of the golden calf still continues, thousands of years after Mount Sinai. But modern economists are convinced that gold inevitably will go the way of wampum—decorative and valuable in itself, but archaic as a medium of exchange among nations.

Curbs on Gold Trading 'Step in Right Direction'

Refusal of the United States and six other major industrial nations "to buy or sell gold in private markets and thereby play into the hands of international speculators is a big step in the right direction," AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger declared.

Goldfinger urged quick action by the world's industrial countries to carry out plans for a new international means of exchange in addition to gold and the American dollar. This "paper gold," he said, "is essential to provide the basis for the continuing expansion of world trade."

Beyond this, Goldfinger said, "the U.S. should, as the AFL-CIO has urged for several years, give consideration to breaking the remaining links between the American dollar and gold. The sooner the world reaches the stage of treating gold as just another commodity such as copper, wheat or silver, the better off all of us will be."

Chicago Groups Back Apprentice Recruitment

Chicago—A four-way partnership to recruit more minority group youths into the apprenticeship programs of building trades unions was launched here by labor, management, government and a leading voice in the Negro community.

The contract signed here is the latest application of an agreement between the U. S. Dept. of Labor and 18 affiliates of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. to seek more apprenticeship opportunities for members of minority groups.

The local agreement was signed by Pres. Thomas J. Murray, Chicago Building Trades Council; Executive Dir. Mayne Stanton, Building Construction Employers Association of Chicago; Hampton McKinney, program director of the Chicago Urban League; and Samuel C. Bernstein, administrator of the Illinois Bureau of Employment Security.

Bernstein said that in the last few years 300 minority group youths have become apprentices through the Apprenticeship Information Center, which is supported by the signers of the new agreement. He said the new partnership will provide improved communications between all those concerned with apprenticeship—government, trade unions, contractors, and private organizations such as the Urban League.

Murray said "all phases of apprenticeship including recruiting have previously been the sole responsibility of the trade. Now others are joining us in a partnership to recruit more minority group workers."

"This occasion is unusual," Stanton said, "because it marks the first time that a trades council and a building construction employers' association have set up a joint effort with an organization in the Negro community to recruit minority group apprentices."

166 Trainees

McKinney, who formerly directed the Urban League's employment department, reported that the league's apprenticeship project has worked with 166 young men who are now indentured apprentices.

He said: "We expect our cooperative efforts with the Building Trades Council and the employers association will substantially increase the number of Negro youths entering apprenticeship in the near future."

Bernstein said construction of the atom research facilities in Weston, Ill., will help provide hundreds of new opportunities.

Murray called the new agreement part of continuing labor and management efforts to bring more minority youths into the construction trades.

The Chicago Building Trades Council, Building Construction Employers Association and Chicago Board of Education sponsor a program aimed at showing high school students what it takes to learn a trade. The students are taken by bus to several building sites, wear hard hats and are shown various stages of construction.

They are then taken to Washburn Trade School, where they are shown apprenticeship training facilities and given information on how to apply for openings in the trades.

Pressmen Re-elect 13 Top Officers

Pres. Anthony J. DeAndrade, Sec.-Treas. A. J. Rohan and the thirteen other top officers of the Printing Pressmen have been reelected to office for new four-year terms beginning June 3.

The balloting was conducted by the union's 756 locals and results were tabulated at the union's headquarters in Washington and announced by the board of electors.

Reelected, in addition to DeAndrade and Rohan, were Vice Presidents Clarence G. Schroeder and J. Frazier Moore, Detroit; James F. Doyle and Raymond J. Boland, Chicago; Robert H. Brown, Toronto; Sol Fishko, New York, and Don McCaughan, Los Angeles. Reelected as home trustees were Frank Calderone, Los Angeles; John W. Dopp, Chicago, and Daniel McPherson, Boston. School trustees reelected were Leo L. Vohsen, St. Louis, Michael P. McNally, Denver, and Edward Volotko, Houston.

CWA's Glenn Watts Heads UGF Drive

Glenn Watts, executive vice president of the Communications Workers, has been selected to head the 1968 drive of the United Givers Fund of the National Capital Area.

His selection marks the first time that a union official has been named to head a major-city UGF campaign, CWA said.

Training For 500,000:

Business Job Plan Wins Union Support

to "hire and train them for useful employment—to make fellow taxpayers out of tax-eaters."

Ford told the conference that initial pledges have been received from employers for 27,761 jobs—nearly 10 percent of the goal of 200,000 work opportunities needed for young applicants this summer, and an additional 100,000 job placements needed by July of 1969.

The eventual target is 500,000 jobs for disadvantaged ghetto jobless by the summer of 1971.

"People who have been held back by prejudice and poverty must now be given a chance to earn a decent life," Ford declared. "It is no longer solely a matter of justice and the principles of democracy."

Ford said that while jobs are not the whole answer to the problems of poverty and racial discord, they are clearly an essential part of the answer.

Business Must Help

"Helping disadvantaged people out of the ghettos and into the mainstream of the American economy is a goal that can be accomplished," he insisted, "only if business shoulders the heavy end of the load."

Government "cannot meet the need for jobs without major help from business, simply because business is where most of the jobs are," he said. The basic task of the alliance is "to get employers involved and committed," Ford asserted.

He recalled that "one of the first things I did was to talk to Meany" because the Alliance "recognized from the outset that it needed to have the wholehearted support of organized labor."

Ford reported that "Meany assured me, as I knew he would, that we could count on the AFL-CIO's cooperation." The auto executive declared there is "no precedent for the kind of task" business has agreed to tackle and he added "but there is also no precedent for the kind of cooperation among business, government and labor that we have experienced so far."

Meany assured the conference "it will not be enough to go into the ghettos and say, 'Here is a job.' The deprived Americans who make up the hard core of the unemployed need to be taught and need to be trained before they can fill a job."

And even before that, he said, "they must be motivated to fill a job. What they need, first of all, is confidence, or perhaps a better word is faith. They need to believe that the newly-offered opportunity is real; that they can in fact become a part of the American society which until now has been as remote from them as the moon."

Unions cooperating with special training programs have "often had to search" for job takers, probably due to lack of confidence, faith and motivation, he related.

Livingston's Role

Meany "strongly urged and warmly advised" the NAB to "make real use of Jack Livingston and his corps of advisers." Livingston's services have been contributed by labor, and one of his first duties, Meany related, will be to recruit 50 labor men in NAB communities to serve as labor liaison men.

Livingston, former director of organization for the AFL-CIO, will serve as NAB's director of labor relations. Meany said he does not know of "anyone in trade union ranks who is better equipped for the job."

Vice Pres. Hubert Humphrey predicted that the training program would reach its goal of 500,000 job placements at least six months ahead of schedule. Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz said NAB will send contract applications to 12,500 business firms in the 50 large cities and 26 smaller ones where federal manpower training funds will be allocated.

Other conference speakers were Commerce Sec. C. R. Smith, NAB Executive Vice Chairman Leo C. Beebe, Executive Dir. Whitney Young, Jr., of the National Urban League; Cleveland Mayor Carl B. Stokes, and Executive Dir. David Ginsburg of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders.

PRES. JOHNSON calls on the American business community to stimulate an awakened social conscience by hiring and training 100,000 ghetto residents by July 1969 and 500,000 by the summer of 1971. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, seated second from Johnson's right, told the National Alliance of Businessmen at a national conference in Washington that "you will have the full cooperation of America's labor movement."

ILO Issues Guide On Fighting Bias

The Intl. Labor Organization has published a new 218-page booklet, "Fighting Discrimination in Employment and Occupation," as part of its workers' education series.

The booklet describes forms that discrimination takes in various countries, discusses its social and personal costs and sets forth steps unions can take to fight it. The ILO-adopted Convention on Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) is explained in detail.

Copies of the booklet may be obtained from Intl. Labor Organization, 917 Fifteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. The price is 75 cents.

Workers' Accounts of Job Deaths Dramatize Safety Bill Hearings

"He tried to make the door, but he was lying face down near the door dead . . . carbon monoxide gas being odorless and colorless and tasteless, it didn't take long."

In these words, Adolph Wismack told of the death last Jan. 10 of a 25-year-old worker at the National Lead Co., Sayreville, N.J. Wismack, president of Local 8-3600 of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, appeared along with other union officials before a House Labor subcommittee in support of the Occupational Safety & Health Bill.

James Owen, the worker who succumbed to carbon monoxide poisoning in the New Jersey plant, was the victim of a lethal dose which also hospitalized three would-be rescuers. The tragedy prompted an investigation that showed controls of the deadly gas to be dangerously inadequate.

Scientists from Rockefeller University called in by the union advised that the accepted safe limit for carbon monoxide concentrations is 50 parts per million parts of air. In most locations in the plant, alarm instruments were set for 200 parts per million, and in some places for 300 or 400 parts per million.

Even as the investigation was under way, Wismack said, another worker "blacked out" five feet above a warning instrument and was dragged out of danger by fellow workers. Earlier, two workers in their early twenties had died from cerebral hemorrhage, a degenerative disease of the elderly, and many workers were reporting persistent severe headaches. They were "carrying bottles of aspirin in their pockets and taking as much as 8 or 10 tablets a day."

The carbon monoxide danger presents an even more hazardous possibility according to the union leaders. Tony Mazzocchi, citizenship-legislative director of the OCAW, said a single worker felled by carbon monoxide could trigger an accident with chlorine gas endangering thousands. "If there was ever an accident to these (chlorine) tank cars and they started to leak, I don't think our employes could get out in time. . . . The surrounding communities would be endangered," Mazzocchi explained.

The Occupational Safety & Health Bill would give the U.S. Dept. of Labor authority to establish and enforce health and safety standards throughout the nation in businesses engaged in interstate commerce, would aid the states to establish programs for protecting workers, and would step up Public Health Service research in occupational disease prevention.

'Long Overdue'

It is high on organized labor's legislative priorities, and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in earlier testimony called it "long overdue."

"We need something equally applied, thoroughly researched," Mazzocchi said. "It is the business and concern of the community at large. We think the bills go a long way to meeting the problems that a modern industrial society now has."

The witnesses rejected the idea that safety and healthful working conditions could be achieved purely through collective bargaining, or left up to the states, whose programs they termed inadequate to the job.

Something that affects national safety, Mazzocchi emphasized, "cannot be left to the ability of a union to negotiate based on its particular power at a given moment." Uniform application of standards would also remove the competitive advantage accruing to the operator of an unsafe plant, he said.

John Tice, safety chairman of Local 8-3600, in an emotion-filled statement, was the last witness for the OCAW. Characterizing the National Lead Co. as "a reputable company," he said neither the union nor the company had the knowledge needed to establish and maintain safe conditions.

"The last few nights I have not slept," Tice said, "after our meeting with these two scientists." A "flameout" in the chlorine area, he said, could cover the whole community with chlorine gas. "Who do we turn to?" Tice asked. "We are working with a potential bomb."

Earlier, Roy Barnes, president of Local 4-367, Pasadena, Tex., told of an explosion and fire at Shell Chemical's plant in Deer Park, Tex., Jan. 15. The explosion, which he said was "a direct result of the company's maintenance policies and the lack of proper inspection procedures," could have devastated the entire community if it had blown into other operating units instead of into an open field. It could have created a "chain reaction" in the concentration of oil and chemical plants in the area and endangered thousands, Barnes said.

Even ten minutes later, at shift change time, Barnes said, "it would have killed several men." One man, Frank Butler, an employe with 25 years of service with Shell, is hospitalized with burns over 60 percent of his body. Two men suffered heart attacks, one of them fatal, while running from the flames, and a fourth worker incurred burns about the hands and arms.

Shell's safety department is "a sham and a joke in that it is completely subordinate to production. If safety interferes with production or costs a little extra money, then safety is cast aside," Barnes said.

Boom Keeps Booming for Business, But Worker Keeps Dropping Behind

The economic "boom" may still be on for $100,000-a-year corporation executives but, for the second year in a row, the ordinary worker is worse off financially than the year before.

The evidence comes from government statistics, quoted in a recent Wall Street Journal story as one explanation of why unions are pressing so hard for pay raises these days.

For the average worker with a wife and two kids, the Journal article notes, "the boom stopped rolling several years ago."

In terms of constant 1957-59 dollars, the typical non-supervisory worker averaged $78.23 in take-home pay in 1967, six cents less than in 1966 and 30 cents less than in 1965.

The story notes that the decline would be even greater "if the figures also took into account steadily rising state and local sales and property taxes, all of which bite into purchasing power." It adds pointedly:

"Labor's emerging mood isn't likely to be softened by this little-publicized fact: The pay of supervisory personnel, such as that $100,000-plus executive, has been rising relatively rapidly."

Not only supervisors are coming out ahead of the cost-of-living. "Since 1961, dividend income has grown some 30 percent more rapidly than wage-salary income."

In addition to salary increases—an average of close to 5 percent last year—supervisory officials often made profits from corporation stock option plans that enabled them to purchase securities at below-market prices, the article notes.

Only partially compensating for the stagnation or decline of earnings has been a continued expansion of fringe benefits and a shorter workweek.

A few trades have managed to increase their purchasing power, although the rise is generally small. But overall, as one government economist is quoted, "Relatively speaking, the income of the average worker in private industry has been stagnating."

John R. Stevenson Of Carpenters Dies

Downers Grove, Ill.—John R. Stevenson, who retired in 1964 after 57 years as an officer of the Carpenters, died at 81 and was buried here Mar. 14.

Before his retirement, Stevenson had held elective office as first vice president of the international union from 1952 to 1964, second vice president from 1941 to 1952, and as an officer of Carpenters Local 80, Chicago, and the Chicago District Council of Carpenters from 1907 to 1941.

Born in Ayrshire, Scotland, Stevenson was apprenticed to the carpentry trade in his youth and got his first experience in labor as a member of the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners. He migrated to Chicago as a young man and joined Local 80.

His widow, two children and three brothers survive.

The Election Stakes

THE DRAMA of the contests for the presidential nomination in the Democratic and Republican parties has for the moment overshadowed the tremendously important congressional elections and the battle for control of state houses and state legislatures.

While the presidential election will profoundly affect the congressional contests, they are nevertheless important in their own right and in many cases will be fought on issues outside the scope of the presidential contest.

All of the 435 seats in the House are up for election this year as well as 34 Senate seats and 22 gubernatorial chairs. One or both houses of the legislatures in 44 states will be contested on the ballot in the fall.

The Democratic Party will have more seats at stake than the Republicans; in the U.S. Senate seats currently held by 23 Democrats are up as compared to 11 Republicans.

In the state houses, governorships currently held by 14 Democrats will be contested compared to 8 Republican governors seeking to continue party control.

IN THE U.S. HOUSE of Representatives there are about 100 seats considered marginal where the decisive battles will take place. About half these seats won by close margins in 1966 are held by liberals trying to hang onto their seats; the other half are held by conservatives who won districts by close margins two years ago.

The outcome of the House races will set the legislative direction for the next two years. But it may also cast the House in the role of electing a president if George Wallace succeeds in his attempt to force the election of the President into the House by barring an Electoral College majority for any one candidate.

The conservatives hope to chalk up gains in the Senate where a number of able and articulate liberal senators face re-election fights. The conservative goal in the Senate is to re-establish as an effective operation the Southern Democratic-GOP coalition, a coalition that has operated with success in the House so far in the 90th Congress.

The Johnson landslide in 1964 gave the liberals a working majority in the 89th Congress. Under White House leadership, a program of progressive legislation was adopted—the most meaningful since the first hundred days of the Roosevelt Administration of 1933.

The liberal majority in the House, however, was lost in 1966 and the chamber reverted to the control of the conservative coalition.

THE ELECTIONS of 1968 pose the direct threat that the conservative victories in 1966 may be extended in 1968 in the congressional elections and in the state houses.

This is a direct and dangerous threat to the future of liberal and progressive government.

It is vitally important that the congressional contest receive major attention, for the decisive votes on future programs and policies, on the hard realities of legislation, will be cast in the next Congress.

President's Message:

Self-Help, Self-Determination Goal of American Indian Policy

The following is excerpted from Pres. Johnson's special message on Indian affairs, "The Forgotten American."

THERE ARE about 600,000 Indians in America today. Some 400,000 live on or near reservations in 25 states. The remaining 200,000 have moved to our cities and towns. The most striking fact about the American Indians today is their tragic plight:

Fifty thousand Indian families live in unsanitary, dilapidated dwellings: many in huts, shanties, even abandoned automobiles.

The unemployment rate among Indians is nearly 40 percent—more than 10 times the national average.

Fifty percent of Indian schoolchildren—double the national average—drop out before completing high school.

Indian literacy rates are among the lowest in the nation; the rates of sickness and poverty are among the highest.

Thousands of Indians who have migrated into the cities find themselves untrained for jobs and unprepared for urban life.

The average age at death of an American Indian today is 44 years; for all other Americans, it is 65.

The American Indian, once proud and free, is torn now between white and tribal values; between the politics and language of the white man and his own historic culture. His problems, sharpened by years of defeat and exploitation, neglect and inadequate effort, will take many years to overcome.

But recent landmark laws—the Economic Opportunity Act, the Elementary & Secondary Education Act, the Manpower Development & Training Act—have given us an opportunity to deal with the persistent problems of the American Indian. The time has come to focus our efforts on the plight of the American Indian through these and the other laws passed in the last few years.

I propose a new goal for our Indian programs: A goal that ends the old debate about "termination" of Indian programs and stresses self-determination; a goal that erases old attitudes of paternalism and promotes partnership self-help.

Our goal must be:

A standard of living for the Indians equal to that of the country as a whole.

Freedom of choice: An opportunity to remain in their homelands, if they choose, without surrendering their dignity; an opportunity to move to the towns and cities of America, if they choose, equipped with the skills to live in equality and dignity.

Full participation in the life of modern America, with a full share of economic opportunity and social justice.

I propose, in short, a policy of maximum choice for the American Indian: a policy expressed in programs of self-help, self-development, self-determination.

To start our goal in fiscal 1969, I recommend that the Congress appropriate one-half a billion dollars for programs targeted at the American Indian—about 10 percent more than fiscal 1968.

Within the last few months we have seen a new concept of community development—a concept based on self-help—work successfully among Indians. Many tribes have begun to administer activities which Federal agencies had long performed in their behalf.

PASSIVE ACCEPTANCE of federal service is giving way to Indian involvement. More than ever before, Indian needs are being identified from the Indian viewpoint—as they should be.

This principle is the key to progress for Indians—just as it has been for other Americans. If we base our programs upon it, the day will come when the relationship between Indians and the government will be one of full partnership—not dependency.

The program I propose seeks to promote Indian development by improving health and education, encouraging long-term economic growth, and strengthening community institutions.

Underlying this program is the assumption that the federal government can best be a responsible partner in Indian progress by treating the Indian himself as a full citizen, responsible for the pace and direction of his development.

But there can be no question that the government and the people of the United States have a responsibility to the Indians.

In our efforts to meet that responsibility, we must pledge to respect fully the dignity and the uniqueness of the Indian citizen.

That means partnership—not paternalism.

We must affirm the right of the first Americans to remain Indians while exercising their rights as Americans.

'Presidents and Peons':

Romualdi's Personal History A Reference on Latin Labor

The following is excerpted from an article in the March 1968 AFL-CIO American Federationist "Building Democracy in Latin America," by Milton Plumb, a review of "Presidents and Peons: Recollections of a Labor Ambassador in Latin America," by Serafino Romualdi.

SHORTLY BEFORE his death from a heart attack last November in Mexico City, Serafino Romualdi, who for a quarter of a century had both symbolized and guided the forces of the democratic labor movement and freedom in Latin America, summed up his career in a book which is certain to become a reference source for future historians of our good neighbors to the South.

The book had been his major occupation for the last two years of his life. It was characteristic of this unique personality that, although he had never studied English in school, he struggled with his customary courage against the many discouragements which beset even experienced writers to complete it. At the expense of his health, he worked endless hours revising, adding and deleting, finally persuaded by his friends' urging that his assignment to represent U. S. labor in Latin America was history that had to be told and that only he could tell it properly.

The result is a collection of political memoirs which disclose for the first time some of the activities of the American labor movement in its struggles against dictators and other totalitarians on both the right and the left. Moreover, it is a book written with the intense honesty and courageous dedication to truth which characterized Romualdi's dealings with all he met, whether a head of state or a group of illiterate and poverty-stricken campesinos.

CLOSE LINK between U.S. labor and democratic movements in Latin America is exemplified by this photo of the late Serafino Romualdi (center) with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Romulo Betancourt, then president of Venezuela.

Romualdi's lifelong struggle against dictatorship began when he was a youth in Italy and, as a Socialist, was nearly killed by Mussolini's Fascist thugs. He took refuge in the United States and immediately joined the staff of the Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, serving as editor of its Italian newspaper for a number of years. His first assignment to Latin America came in 1941 when the Mazzini Society selected him to help organize anti-Fascist groups among Italian expatriates in every Latin American nation.

Conditions existing at the close of the war led the AFL to decide to expand its international activities in Latin America in an effort to counteract the then growing influence of the Communist-dominated CTAL. Romualdi was selected to become the federation's first inter-American representative.

With his characteristic broad vision and complete disregard of the odds against success, Romualdi immediately set out to build a rival democratic inter-American federation of labor. His book relates in detail the steps which led to its founding under the name of the Inter-American Confederation of Labor (CIT) on January 1, 1948.

ONCE THE INTL. CONFEDERATION of Free Trade Unions was created, the CIT was transformed into the new ICFTU organization for the Americas, the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers, better known by its Spanish initials as ORIT.

His interest in labor education as the basis of development of democratic trade unions took shape in another form in the American Institute for Free Labor Development, of which he became the first executive director in March 1962. This was his last full-time assignment in the field of inter-American labor activity and he remained AIFLD's chief executive officer until he resigned in September 1965 on the eve of his retirement.

ORIT and AIFLD are institutions which in a very real sense are monuments to Romualdi's tireless efforts on behalf of the inter-American labor movement and democracy and freedom. But the book is far more about individual human beings than about organizations and institutes.

The fact is that Serafino Romualdi was a force for a better life for citizens of all strata of society in Latin America and the Caribbean. In a very real sense, he carried on a one-man revolution on behalf of democracy and freedom. In the process, he enlisted behind his ideals those of the trade union movement and a vast army of loyal and devoted friends and spiritual followers.

Some Costs Omitted:

City Family 'Moderate' Budget Underscores Lag in Earnings

THE NEW CITY WORKER family budget of the Labor Dept. omits some common and necessary costs of maintaining moderate family standards of health and decency, an AFL-CIO economist asserted.

Expenses of education and installment buying are not even considered in the budget set forth by the department, noted Rudolph Oswald of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research. Such costs, as well as provision for some form of savings, should be included to "more accurately reflect what workers are actually spending," he said.

Oswald was interviewed on the AFL-CIO-produced public affairs program, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Radio Network.

The union economist said that even with gradual wage improvements over the years, most factory workers are paid much less than the $9,191 the Labor Dept. says a city worker needs to live "moderately." The average full-time factory worker's income "is now only $5,900," he said.

Increased worker productivity reduced unit labor costs 1.5 percent between 1960 and 1965, but this doesn't show up in the prices consumers pay in the market, he asserted. Wholesale costs of manufactured items rose nearly 2 percent in the same period, he said, "in spite of the fact that it was costing less in terms of labor to produce them." He also pointed out that during the seven-year period ending in 1967, corporate profits jumped 77 percent while earnings of factory workers, after taxes, increased only 25 percent.

Oswald said that improvements in workers' living standards have slowed, especially over the last two years, with the result that workers aren't fully participating in "the general growth of our economic well-being."

The new city worker "moderate budget" is also added evidence that the $3,000 poverty level standard "is no longer a valid reflection of what a four-person family would need to live at an absolute minimum," he said.

Reporters questioning Oswald were James Deakin of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times.

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE REPORT of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders can easily be described as "voluminous." When the mimeographed pages are stacked, one on top of another, they are almost a foot high.

The significance of all this is twofold:

1. The commission's investigation was deep, broad and intensive as it sought first-hand the reasons for the cataclysmic social upheavals in so many urban areas last summer.

2. The reasons for these upheavals are so varied and complex that they defy simple explanations.

The underlying causes, of course, are real and serious grievances which a sizeable proportion of the Negro and low-income white populations have against society.

One of these grievances, as a section of the report characterizes, is the " 'exploitation' of disadvantaged consumers by retail merchants." And one condition which has made such exploitation possible, the commission believes, is the conviction of the rioters that the merchants "have been charging exorbitant prices or selling inferior goods."

Many merchants have been getting away with this by shoddy gimmicks in the installment buying field. This is one area in which Congress has the chance to act immediately. In fact, both the House and the Senate have passed "truth-in-lending" bills.

Of the two bills, however, only the House measure actually gets into the basic problems of gouging on interest rates, garnishments, and revolving credit.

The report, for example, points out:

"Most low-income families are uneducated concerning the nature of credit purchase contracts, the legal rights and obligations of both buyers and sellers, sources of advice for consumers who are having difficulties with merchants and the operation of the courts concerned with these matters."

The report also noted that "in most states, the laws governing relations between consumers and the merchants in effect offer protection only to informed, sophisticated parties with understanding of each other's rights and obligations."

In this situation, the commission said, "exploitative practices flourish." Ghetto residents cannot utilize standard retail outlets and "forced to use credit, they have little understanding of the pitfalls of credit buying."

Careful spelling out of the monthly and annual amounts of interest, in all purchases as provided in the House bill, would go a long way toward easing this problem.

THE HOUSE BILL also meets head-on the practice of garnishment. On the subject of garnishments, the commission says:

"Garnishment practices in many states allow creditors to deprive individuals of their wages through court action without hearing or trial. In about twenty states, the wages of an employe can be diverted to a creditor merely upon the latter's deposition, with no advance hearing where the employe can defend himself.

"He often receives no prior notice of such action and is usually unaware of the law's operation and too poor to hire legal defense. Moreover, consumers may find themselves still owing on a sales contract even after the creditor has repossessed the goods."

When a low-income worker gets hit by garnishment, he knows he's been hit hard—where it hurts—in the pocketbook.

However, too few people really understand revolving credit. They are told they are paying 1.5 percent per month. Few realize they are actually paying at least 18 percent in annual interest.

The House bill takes the first essential steps toward meeting these practices in installment buying.

The House and Senate conference committees are now meeting. They might well weigh the significance of the commission report and recognize that only the House bill meets the critical problems in the lending field.

THE LABOR DEPT.'S city worker family budget would more accurately reflect what workers actually spend today if it included the costs of education and credit buying, AFL-CIO Economist Rudolph Oswald (center), said on Labor News Conference. Questioning him on the public service program broadcast over Mutual radio were James Deakin (left) of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times.

How to Buy:

Advertisers Stop at Nothing To Reach the Teen-Age Market

By Sidney Margolius

THEY MAKE these children old at 16, one concerned mother observed.

She was referring to a Yardley hair products ad in Seventeen magazine: "You were probably bouncing along somewhere between your twelfth birthday and Sweet Sixteen, and suddenly that wonderful little-girl shine wasn't there anymore. Sad, but just when you begin to need everything you've got, some of it begins to go."

Yardley, of course, sells five different products to solve this problem it created.

Of all the sellers today hunting the teen-agers and their $14 billion a year of spending money, the cosmetic manufacturers are the most avid and least scrupulous. They use all devices, from playing on teen-age fears and anxieties to encouraging sexuality.

Cosmetic manufacturers are not the only trade seeking to stimulate teen-age spending. The fashion, furniture, auto, record and jewelry industries all are working hard at influencing this supposedly rich market. It's a revelation to see many ads for diamond engagement rings in the teen-age magazines, ranging from $200 to as much as $5,000.

Teen-age girls are encouraged to expect to have such expensive household accessories as Lenox and Syracuse china and crystal when they marry, at $115 for six place settings. Presumably they will buy such equipment on the installment plan ("if Mommy and Daddy don't still give me my allowance," one mother comments).

We counted up actually 36 different kinds of cosmetics and beauty products promoted to teen-agers. This does not mean different brands or sizes, but different kinds of products for different purposes. No doubt there are more.

Our survey found 13 different make-up items alone, ranging from cream base to "eye highlighter." Next largest category is cleansing products, from special "beauty soaps" at $1 a bar to skin creams, lotions and moisturizers.

Toiletries manufacturers now even sell special products for different parts of the body. Yardley sells a "bubbly wash" for the teen-age face but recommends a "beauty soap" for the body. It "does what the wash does for your face." (It washes it.)

Even more than for adults, cosmetics and fashion manufacturers use sex heavily to sell teen-agers. For example:

A bikini bathing suit ad: "Nobody's little girl and Dune Deck shows it."

For Revlon's shiny lipsticks: "The mouth that wears them sends messages."

"He can't get you out of his mind when Wind Song whispers your message."

For Bourjois: "Go my love, stand outside underneath the moonlight sky and I will blow your kisses on the wind."

"Avant-gardes stop at nothing."

SEVENTEEN MAGAZINE, one of the biggest beneficiaries of this kind of salesmanship, calls this "The Talent Generation." Well, one talent it may not have is a sense of values, and an understanding of the need to guard its earnings from the commercial prowlers.

Parents themselves may not be making the most of the available techniques for teaching values. A rather pioneering survey of young teen-agers by a Port Washington, N.Y., PTA, found that only a little over half the parents do any actual teaching of how to buy, and fewer than half discussed family money questions as a family.

The least that parents can do is show girls that a 49-cent or at most 79-cent lipstick is exactly the same as a $2 one. The ingredients in all lipsticks have a value of less than 2 cents.

Luna Kenney, executive director of Youngstown, O., Children & Family Services, says that parents need to be encouraged to resist the pressures on teen-agers. Miss Kenney points out such examples as "a 17-year-old girl working as a store clerk to earn money because she has been sold the idea that she must buy sterling silver, or that no respectable girl can have a decent life without a complete set of stainless steel cookware plus stainless flatware to 'save' the sterling silver."

Excluding Traffic Deaths:

Fatal Accident Rate Dips Slightly for '67

FATAL PUBLIC ACCIDENTS involving fires, trains (excluding motor vehicles), firearms, and small planes increased in 1967, according to figures released by the National Safety Council.

However, the total number of public-accident deaths remained at 19,500, the same figure for the past three years, while the public-accident death rate per 100,000 people actually dropped from 10.0 in 1966 to 9.9 in 1967.

"The two major causes of public fatalities—falls and drownings—both decreased last year counterbalancing the increases among the more minor causes," explained Sidney Smith, council statistician.

Still, falls and drownings each resulted in about one-fourth of the public-accident fatalities. Transportation accidents (rail, air, water and other—not involving motor vehicles) accounted for about one-fifth. All other types—natural disasters, firearms, fires—contributed about one-third of the death total.

Persons sustaining disabling injuries from public accidents numbered approximately 2.4 million of which 60,000 suffered permanent impairments.

The largest increase in public deaths this past year was due to fires. The number increased by almost one-third—from 700 in 1966 to 900 in 1967.

Smith explained that fires are largely seasonal. He attributed this increase to the especially severe winter nationwide in early 1967.

Public firearm accidents—mostly occurring while hunting or target shooting—reached 1,100 in 1967, a 10 percent increase over the 1966 total of 1,000. The National Safety Council has estimated eight nonfatal injuries for each firearms fatality.

"Pure carelessness in the handling of firearms is probably the greatest cause of accidental death and injury while hunting," said John Fleming of the council.

"Too often," says Fleming, "hunters shoot before identifying their target. Two-thirds of hunting victims are shot by other hunters, frequently by their own hunting companions. And, one-third of the hunting victims accidentally shoot themselves."

ANOTHER MAJOR INCREASE was deaths caused by accidents with trains. Smith explained that these accidents happen when pedestrians run into trains, passengers fall on them or off of them, and bicyclists collide with them. A particular hazard is children playing too near the tracks.

Public fatalities also increased from light plane accidents. Deaths from all air transportation—commercial, military and general aviation—were up 25 percent from 1,200 to 1,500.

Though falls continue to be the largest single cause of public deaths—and second to traffic in the total accident picture—these fatalities decreased by 4 percent last year. Total deaths were down from 5,300 in 1966 to 5,100 in 1967.

Fatal public falls increased only among one age group—those 75 years of age and older. Each year more fatal falls occur to these people than any other age group.

Drownings, the second largest cause of public deaths, also decreased by 4 percent—from 4,500 in 1966 to 4,300 in 1967. Smith explains this could be partly due to the exceptionally cool summer months of 1967 with fewer people participating in water sports.

"Also, more people are learning to swim every year," Fleming commented. "And, the opportunities for them to learn are increasing as more community programs in water safety, such as the council's Operation Waterproof 4th Grade, are being established."

"Many drownings occur today simply because people who cannot swim fall into the water," said Fleming. "The council urges anyone, particularly those participating in or near water activities, to learn how to swim."

Soup to Nonsense:

A Lot of Gardening Problems Boil Down to Boy-Meets-Girl

By Jane Goodsell

I'D GIVEN my skimmia everything plants could possibly desire—or so I thought. I'd lavished care, attention, peat moss, fertilizer and bonemeal on them, and still those irresponsible shrubs refused to put out a single berry. After all I'd done for them, it seemed the least they could do in return.

Working on the premise that I'd spoiled them rotten, I tried a new tack and ignored them. I took them off fertilizer cold-turkey and not so much as a crumb of peat moss did I toss their way. As I showered goodies on the rhododendrons and azaleas directly across the yard from them, I maliciously hoped that those recalcitrant skimmia were drooling with envy. Perhaps if they realized that they were being punished for their laziness, they'd mend their ways, buckle down to business and start putting out berries. But they didn't.

It was a friend—she's president of her garden club—who explained to me why my skimmia had failed to realize their potential. I'd ushered her to the garden to look at the skimmia, saying scornfully, "Look at the dumb things. Not a berry on them."

She gazed thoughtfully at my skimmia and (I warn you, you probably won't believe this, but it's the honest truth) said, "Why, you've got nothing but females. If you want berries, you've got to put a male in with them."

Well, did you ever! I certainly had no idea that plants went in for that sort of thing. I mean, I guess I realized that they have to reproduce somehow, but I figured that the bees took care of it. Or else that it was accomplished by osmosis or unicellular division or—well, I don't know exactly what I thought, but I must say I was astonished to learn that boy-meets-girl takes place in the flower bed.

SO NOW WE HAVE a male (one boy for five girls which strikes me as a rather far-out arrangement, but my friend assures me that it's perfectly proper where skimmia are involved.)

So far, I don't think the skimmia have caught on to the me-Tarzan-you-Jane concept because there isn't a sign of a berry.

Maybe it's too soon to expect results, but I can't help but be discouraged. The girl skimmia nearest the boy seems to be giving him the cold shoulder. Instead of cozying up to him, she is leaning toward her sisters.

Still, I haven't given up hope. Maybe skimmia go through a long period of courtship before getting down to brass tacks. Then again, they may pretend nonchalance when I'm around just to keep me guessing. For all I know, that flower bed may really swing around 2 a.m. when I'm sound asleep.

Analysis Shows:

Union Membership Swings Up in South

Union membership in the South is growing at a faster rate than it is in the nation as a whole and conditions are favorable for continued growth there, a University of Kentucky economics professor has concluded.

The professor, Ray Marshall, is one of 14 contributors to the March issue of Monthly Labor Review, the magazine of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics. The issue is given over entirely to "Labor in the South."

Other articles deal with a wide range of subjects involving unions, such as economic growth, employment, manpower programs, wage differentials, farm labor, job equality and racial discrimination.

Marshall cited studies showing that union membership in 13 southern states increased by 185 percent between 1939 and 1964 while the increase for the nation as a whole was 148 percent.

In a 12-year period, 1953 through 1964, the increase for the southern states was 9.7 percent compared to 6.1 percent for the entire nation, he pointed out.

Room For Growth

Focusing on another figure showing that only 14.4 percent of nonagricultural employment in the South was organized in 1964, Marshall stressed that "there is obviously considerable room for union growth" in the area.

He listed a number of "trends" which favor continued union growth in the South, including increasing industrialization, a "growing motive" to organize among unions and improving attitudes of southern workers toward unions.

Among "trends" which will make it more difficult for unions to organize, Marshall said, are the tendency of plants to locate in smaller communities and management's growing "sophistication" in fighting organized labor.

On balance, he viewed favorable "trends" as outweighing unfavorable ones and predicted that the "gap" between the South and the rest of the nation in union strength "will continue to narrow."

In another article in the special March issue of Monthly Labor Review, Prof. Rupert B. Vance of the University of North Carolina foresaw labor "coming of age" in the South. The higher southern development goes in technology and skills, "the greater will be the importance and amount of union organization," he wrote.

"So true is this," he added, "that those who carry on the old fight against unionization will become suspect as reactionaries who align themselves against progress."

Another UNC professor, E. Walton Jones, emphasized that thousands of farm workers in the South are living in poverty just as they are in other parts of the nation. A major step in improving their lot, he observed, would be the extension of minimum wage laws, unemployment insurance and other legal protection to cover farm workers.

'Long Enough'

"Farm labor has waited long enough for equal treatment with workers in the nonfarm sector," Jones said. "This country can afford it, and the decision is long overdue."

H. M. Douty, BLS senior research consultant, found that the level of wages and salaries is "substantially lower" in the South than in the rest of the country and differentials are "unlikely" to disappear in the near future.

At the same time, he cited a number of industries—including chemical, steel and automobile assembly—where differentials have either been cut down or eliminated through collective bargaining.

Ralph McGill, publisher of the Atlanta Constitution, in a summary article, wrote that much of the South's future depends upon what it does "with its inferior schools and racial problem."

He issued a strong challenge to the "boards of corporations" who are looking to a move southward:

"They have a national responsibility," McGill stressed, "to select for investment location those areas which honestly have eliminated, or are sincerely eliminating, all the old ugliness and violence of discrimination from their communities."

Musicians Win NLRB Ruling On Reno Clubs

The National Labor Relations Board ruled that the Reno, Nev., Musicians union did not break the law when it refused to bargain with the leaders of five bands about the wages, hours and working conditions of musicians employed by the leaders.

The board adopted a trial examiner's finding that the leaders are employes, not independent contractors, and his recommendation that the complaint of the leaders be dismissed. The decision was the latest ruling won by AFM locals in a series of suits brought by leaders in several cities.

Strike Involved

The decision came during a strike by Reno Local 368 called Mar. 1 because of the refusal of Reno and Lake Tahoe casinos, clubs and hotels to bargain collectively, and their continued insistence that the leaders, not the casinos, are the employers of band members.

AFM Pres. Herman D. Kenin said he hopes the casino operators now will "end their long campaign of interference" with the musicians' rights and start negotiating in good faith to reach a mutually satisfactory agreement.

Examiner Joseph I. Nachman found that the Reno Employers Council, rebelling in 1964 against a union-proposed increase in wages from $165 to $189 a week, plus an employer contribution of 5 percent of earnings to a union pension and welfare fund, took the position that the leaders and not the clubs were obliged to negotiate.

Nachman concluded that the leaders in question are employes of the clubs, not independent contractors, and recommended that their complaint be dismissed.

President Names Consumer Counsel

The government's first consumer counsel said he will try to put "teeth and a little clout" into consumer protection programs.

Named by Pres. Johnson to the new post in the Justice Dept. was Merle N. McCurdy, who served as general counsel of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders.

McCurdy will work under both Attorney Gen. Ramsey Clark and Betty Furness, the President's special assistant for consumer affairs.

REFUGEES FROM THE recent Communist offensive in Saigon receive rice distributed by CARE at a hospital in Cholon, the Chinese section of the city. For four days, trucks brought the food to the area, even while it was ringed with gun battles. CARE has provided $1.5 million in food and supplies to refugees in South Viet Nam in the past two years, but now the agency says it needs to raise $500,000 to continue this aid for the next 12 months. Labor has contributed $10,000 to CARE for refugee relief through an AFL-CIO fund directed by Vice Pres. Lee W. Minton. Individual donations may be sent to CARE, 660 First Ave., New York, N.Y. 10016.

'Legacy of Neglect' Cited in Call For Expanded Housing Program

The Administration's omnibus housing bill now before Congress drew the praise of the AFL-CIO along with the appeal that "this most comprehensive program" be broadened still further.

Appearing before the housing subcommittee of the House Banking and Currency Committee, Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller welcomed the bill's recognition that meeting urban housing needs "will not be simple nor inexpensive."

"We in America today are the inheritors of a legacy of neglect, decay and indifference that has been festering and spreading in our cities and urban areas for nearly a century," he said. "It has now reached crisis proportions and won't go away. . . . No city or state is isolated from it nor can any city or state solve the problems alone. The solution requires nationwide social and economic measures with federal programs, funds and standards."

The AFL-CIO's major difference with the bill is one of degree, Biemiller noted: "We feel the immediate need is for far more housing than is envisioned by this bill, considerable as it is." The one area in which he expressed total disagreement was the proposal to lift the 6 percent ceiling on interest rates for government insured mortgages.

The federation spokesman assailed as "blight by decree" the practice of insurance companies which denies protection to specified urban areas. He endorsed the objectives of a corrective program in the riot insurance bill, but suggested that it be strengthened to guard against the failure of some states to enact participating legislation.

In addition, Biemiller expressed support for two other bills, that would provide a new program of mortgage insurance for non-profit hospitals caring for the acutely ill and injured.

"Now that our nation has committed itself to medicare and to upgrading our nation's health in a growing population, the availability and quality of medical care for our population is severely limited by a chronic hospital shortage," he pointed out. "For example, at the present time group health programs in several areas of the country are experiencing great difficulty in establishing or expanding hospital facilities for their enrolled members. These group health organizations—and many other non-profit hospitals—would make immediate use of a mortgage insurance program if it were available, and could thus make a major contribution to the nation's health care needs."

The most sweeping expansion sought by the AFL-CIO in the pending bill is in public housing, set at 75,000 units in fiscal 1969 and a total of 775,000 units in the next five years. The federation called for 300,000 units in the next two years and 500,000 each year thereafter.

"The basic component in meeting the crisis in housing among low-income families will remain public housing," Biemiller stressed.

Recipes Help Build Headquarters Fund

Raleigh, N.C. — Like to know how to make hushpuppies, pralines, corn fritters, pecan pie, shrimp wiggle, or share in hundreds of other southern cooking secrets?

A new cook book offered by the women of the North Carolina AFL-CIO tells all.

Pres. W. M. Barbee said proceeds from its sale will help build a new federation headquarters here.

There are 649 recipes in the book, Our Favorite Recipes. It is available, at $2.25, plus 25 cents for postage and handling, from North Carolina State AFL-CIO, P.O. Box 10805, Raleigh, N.C. 27605. Quantity discounts are available.

Public Employes Pace White Collar Union Gain

Paced by public employes, the number of white collar workers in national and international unions rose by 159,000 between 1964 and 1966, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The agency's biennial survey put the total of white collar workers in nationwide unions at 2.74 million in 1966—a figure which presumably has grown since then. That represented about 14.3 percent of all union members. The percentage figure was about the same as in 1964.

The BLS said 127,000 of the 264,000 growth in government unions during the two-year period were white collar employes.

The white collar total is made up of 1.7 million members in nonmanufacturing industries, 753,000 in government service, and 312,000 in manufacturing.

Adding white collar members in unaffiliated local and one-company unions and subtracting Canadian members of international unions, about 9.5 percent of the nation's white collar employes are union members, the BLS said.

Kennedy Enters Lists, Nixon Gets Clear Field

A major contest for the Democratic presidential nomination shaped up with Sen. Robert F. Kennedy's announcement of his candidacy.

But it was a different story on the Republican side with former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon apparently home free following the decision of New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller not to run.

Kennedy became a candidate after Minnesota Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy polled 42 percent of the Democratic vote in the New Hampshire primary against a write-in drive for Pres. Johnson.

With the President himself generally expected to seek reelection, the prospect was for a hot, three-way drive to win delegate support in advance of the Democratic Party convention, which starts Aug. 26 in Chicago.

McCarthy and Kennedy share similar views critical of the Administration's policies in Viet Nam, but the Minnesota senator insisted that the announcement by his New York colleague would make no difference to his candidacy, that there would be "no deals."

Meanwhile, the President served notice that there would be no retreat from the U.S. stand in Viet Nam. Speaking to the National Farmers Union at Minneapolis, he lashed out at critics who would "tuck our tail and violate our commitments." Johnson called for a "total national effort to win the war, win the peace and complete the job that must be done here at home."

Primary Tests

So far three major tests of strength are in prospect in primary elections pitting all three Democratic candidates—Nebraska on May 14, Oregon on May 28 and California on June 4. In the last, the President will be represented by a stand-in whereas all three names will be on the ballot in Nebraska and Oregon.

Kennedy will not be on the Wisconsin primary ballot, Apr. 2, but McCarthy and Johnson will.

The Republican scene shifted radically when Rockefeller stunned his supporters by abruptly shutting off what had seemed to be a steady build-up toward a formal announcement that he would seek the presidency.

Declaring that he was not a candidate, "directly or indirectly, for the presidency of the United States," the New York governor said it was "clear at this time that the majority of party leaders want the candidacy of former Vice Pres. Richard Nixon."

Rockefeller left the door slightly ajar to a draft, but declared that he would "do nothing in the future, by word or by deed, to encourage such a call." He said he would support any candidate nominated by the GOP and would work on the issues and development of the Republican platform.

Tyler Examines 'Complex Panorama':

Conservative Threat Stressed In Analysis of Political Scene

Conservative forces could win the presidency and dominate Congress in the 1968 elections without getting a majority—or even a plurality of the popular vote, an article in the March issue of the AFL-CIO Federationist warns.

Author Gus Tyler, assistant president of the Ladies' Garment Workers and director of the union's education, political and training institute, analyzes the nation's "complex political panorama."

He weighs the impact of the Viet Nam war and opposition to it, the various presidential aspirants in both parties and the prospects of Pres. Johnson for reelection. Tyler looks to the campaign, the voting and beyond.

Although the article was written before Sen. Robert F. Kennedy (D-N.Y.) moved into the presidential race, Tyler describes the activity of his backers prior to the Kennedy announcement.

He lists three ways in which a conservative GOP candidate could win the White House without getting either a majority or plurality of the votes. Each involves third-party presidential candidate George Wallace, former Alabama governor.

One, Wallace could make a "deal" to release some of his pledged electors to the conservative in exchange for commitments to the Alabaman.

Two, if Wallace scores heavily enough and no candidate receives an electoral college majority, the election would go to the House of Representatives where each state casts a single vote to pick the President.

Not only could Wallace "wheel and deal" in this event, but even without his interjection the House voting system gives the traditionally small, conservative states equal strength with the more populous liberal states.

Third, the Wallace candidacy could conceivably involve the House in a deadlock to block a majority for any one of the three presidential candidates. In this case, the Senate would pick the President in the person of its choice for Vice President.

Thus, as Tyler points out, the elections to Congress become doubly important. Their outcome not only will determine the fate of labor legislation and social welfare programs, but could bear strongly upon who will be President.

When Pres. Johnson won his landslide victory over Goldwater in 1964, Tyler notes, the triumph also brought in a "Johnson Congress" that enacted "the most meaningful body of progressive legislation since the first 100 days of Roosevelt."

But in the 1966 elections, Tyler continues, 47 Democrats lost seats and the "conservative coalition" took over Congress and stifled further progress in many areas.

The 1968 election, the article emphasizes, poses the threat that the conservative gains of two years ago may be enlarged upon.

All 435 House seats are up for election this year and—as a chart accompanying the article shows—the Democrats have more seats at stake in the Senate than the Republicans, 23 to 11.

In the House elections, Tyler notes, there are about 100 marginal seats "where decisive battles" will take place.

State Contests

One or both houses of state legislatures will be contested for this year in 44 states. There will be 22 gubernatorial races for 14 seats currently held by Democrats and eight controlled by Republicans.

Tyler sees the "splintering" of the Democratic party by the candidacy of Sen. Eugene McCarthy (D-Minn.)—and now that of Kennedy—as a possible "bonus" for GOP presidential aspirant Richard Nixon.

Even so, he believes, the Nixon strength might have collapsed in a tough contest with Gov. Nelson Rockefeller of New York.

There are two factors, as Tyler sees it, that may cause Republicans to look upon Nixon "as a winner" by next summer:

First, if there is an appearance that "any Republican can win," the conservatives controlling the GOP will flock behind him: "He will be blessed by the pros."

Riot Factor

Second, if the Republican convention takes place in another summer of riots, the party may be looking for a white backlash candidate, with Nixon best filling the bill.

Tyler's judgment is that a Wallace candidacy will cut more deeply into Republican than Democratic votes.

At the same time, he sees Wallace also taking Democratic votes, and maybe in large quantities, "if rioting has unleashed counter-rioting" and a spirit of "vigilantism."

Despite the attacks on Pres. Johnson and his fluctuation in the opinion polls, Tyler thinks the President is in a "strong position," with "undeniable power" toward winning the nomination if he wants it.

"War and riot—painful as they may be—can prove to be the political pluses as the nation rallies around its President in time of peril," he concludes.

Brewery Union Endorses LBJ For Reelection

Cincinnati, O.—The Brewery Workers executive board at a meeting here endorsed Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey for reelection "in the firm belief that the actions they have taken are in the best interests of the country."

The endorsement resolution charged that the President and Vice President "are being unfairly harrassed" with political attacks from those "who put aside the safety of the nation for ther own political advancement."

It warned that the Administration's goals "to assure peace, improved economic standards of living and security for all peoples cannot be abandoned."

First Pilot Project:

Minneapolis Starts Union Arts Program

Minneapolis—A national AFL-CIO program to increase activity by union members in the performing and graphic arts made its debut here.

Representatives of the Minneapolis AFL-CIO and the locals it represents combined with a blue ribbon entourage from the city's arts and cultural society to launch the pilot program in two days of meetings.

Minneapolis is one of four cities chosen by the AFL-CIO to conduct pilot projects. Conferences next month will kick off programs in Louisville, Ky., and Buffalo, N.Y. The New York City demonstration project will be opened with a conference later in the spring, Leo Perlis, director of AFL-CIO Community Services Activities reported.

"The visual and performing arts representatives are pleased to be involved in this program with the AFL-CIO," Dean Myhr, executive director of the Minnesota State Arts Commission told reporters at a press conference.

Robert R. Bigelow, acting president of the labor central body noted that 99 percent of the people working in the performing arts are union members, including musicians and actors.

"We intend to engage in new ideas, as well as take part in current programs," Bigelow said. "The whole city should be proud that the AFL-CIO has confidence not only in our labor unions but in the community itself."

The central body is establishing an Arts Project Committee which will guide the activities of the demonstration project—a two-year program. Working with the committee will be similar committees in each local in Minneapolis.

Jack Golodner, executive secretary of the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes, told union representatives that success in the program will bring an added quality to the lives of union members.

"We hope to achieve a new enrichment of life for our members," Perlis told the audiences attending the conference. "This is a natural development in the labor movement, just as involvement in community services and political action were natural developments."

He noted that many unions have often been involved in the performing and visual arts.

Among those from the arts and cultural facilities who took part in the conference were representatives of the Walker Art Center, the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, the Minneapolis Theatre Co., the Minneapolis Society of Fine Arts, Northrup Auditorium, Minneapolis Public Library and the Minneapolis Institute of Arts.

House Action on Rights Delayed by Rules Unit

til Apr. 9 also picked up the support of two northern Democrats—James J. Delaney of New York and B. F. Sisk of California.

Democratic leaders saw a good possibility that at least one of the two would support the procedural resolution at the Apr. 9 meeting. That would make it possible to get floor action on the eve of the scheduled Easter recess—providing not too many congressmen began their holiday earlier. The day after the recess is the start of the Rev. Martin Luther King's "poor peoples' march" on Washington—and some House members are reported concerned lest a vote for the bill at that time would look like giving in to "pressure."

Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.), chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, said he thought the Senate bill could be passed "without any changes." It will be close, he said, "but we've counted noses and we can count on considerable Republican support."

The Senate bill bore a big bipartisan label, both in the drafting of the legislation and in the 71-20 vote by which it was passed.

In other congressional action:

- The House gave 381-0 approval of a bill giving the government authority to set standards for color television sets and other consumer devices that might emit harmful radiation.
- The Senate continued to debate a "code of ethics" for its members and employes. One of the provisions in the code recommended by the Senate's special Ethics Committee would have required senators to file financial statements in sealed envelopes which could be opened only if the committee were investigating the conduct of a senator. An amendment by Senators Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) and Clifford P. Case (R-N.J.) to require public disclosure of a senator's financial statement was rejected, 44-40, after heated debate.
- Just in time to prevent the United States from running out of gold to meet its international monetary commitments, the Senate voted 39-37 approval of a House-passed bill eliminating the requirement that the government keep gold reserves equal to 25 percent of the nation's currency.

Before the vote, all senators received a telegram from AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller urging approval of the legislation.

He warned that delay "only aids those waging economic warfare against this nation" and could "threaten the wages, jobs and security of every American."

Biemiller termed the gold reserve requirement "an outmoded, harmful anachronism."

Auto Insurance Probe Urged By AFL-CIO

Spiraling insurance costs, discrimination based on occupation and neighborhood as well as race, years of delay in court cases all point up the need for fundamental reforms in auto insurance, the AFL-CIO said.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller reiterated to a House Commerce subcommittee what he had told a Senate hearing the previous week—that the AFL-CIO "heartily endorses" legislation authorizing a comprehensive investigation of the automobile insurance industry by the Dept. of Transportation.

He told the House members that state AFL-CIO central bodies "have been engaged in continuing, though rarely successful, efforts to fight the spiraling rate increases" sought by the industry.

Biemiller said only about 50 cents of the premium dollar goes to compensate accident victims. "High administrative costs, including salesmen's commissions and excessive costs for claims adjustment" use up most of the balance, he charged.

A variety of proposals for changes in the auto insurance system should be considered by the commission, Biemiller said. He stressed that there is little hope that the needed reforms can be accomplished either "by voluntary action on the part of the insurance industry" or by action of the states.

'Judicial Review' Hit As Threat To Schools

Federal aid to education as well as the separation of powers in American government would be endangered by a pending "judicial review" bill, the AFL-CIO testified at House hearings.

A bill passed by the Senate last year would enable any person to bring a "taxpayer's suit" to block federal funds under nine major programs from going to any church-related school or institution.

Thomas E. Harris, the AFL-CIO's associate general counsel, said the proposed legislation would in effect mean that the Supreme Court would be compelled "to pronounce upon the legality of every action of the other branches of government."

That's a role it has refused to take, Harris said, ever since George Washington's time when the court ruled that it could not render advisory opinions to the President.

In practical terms, Harris told a House Judiciary subcommittee, the bill threatens to upset the delicate compromise over assistance to poor students attending church-supported schools which made possible the landmark Elementary & Secondary Education Act of 1965.

"The AFL-CIO believes that any holding banning all aid of any type to church-connected schools would probably destroy the entire program of federal aid," Harris said.

Historically, he pointed out, "taxpayer suits" based on constitutional grounds would probably have resulted in invalidation of many programs which are now generally acknowledged to be clearly constitutional.

He cited as an example an attempt to challenge the constitutionality of the Tennessee Valley Authority in the mid-thirties. The Supreme Court, in line with its historic position on separation of powers, refused to consider the case, Harris noted. But if it had, he said, the court majority at that time would probably have declared it unconstitutional. Later courts would have disagreed with that interpretation, but meanwhile "a great and much needed public project would probably have been destroyed."

Back-Door Attack

Harris cited an AFL-CIO convention resolution which termed the judicial review bill "a back-door attack on federal aid to education, civil rights, the war on poverty and many related programs."

The legislation was termed "unsound in principle" and likely "disastrous in practice."

Even if the expenditure challenged were eventually upheld by the Supreme Court as constitutional, lower courts would have been empowered to issue injunctions which might block programs during years of litigation.

"A greater opportunity for sheer obstructionism could hardly be devised," the AFL-CIO said.

Labor Urges Expanded Federal Aid To Vocational Education Programs

the AFL-CIO "strongly endorses" the section that would consolidate all vocational education laws within the 1963 law and apply its standards for the allotment of federal funds.

He pointed out that this change would permit federal grants to go to job training "in the total spectrum of all occupations" and would "greatly simplify administration, matching of funds, reporting and accounting."

A provision to extend federal training funds to the field of home economics won AFL-CIO backing because, as Young noted, it would help develop new programs of training low-income families in buying, home safety, child care and "other phases of family living."

The AFL-CIO also supported a provision for grants to states for new "exemplary" programs of experimentation in bridging the gap between education and work.

Federal funds would be available to familiarize junior high school students with occupations, for special guidance and counseling, to improve curricula and teaching materials, to exchange personnel between schools and government agencies as well as industry and to set up work-experience programs.

The federation "wholeheartedly" endorses this program, Young said, stressing that the "experimentation" should be directed particularly toward benefitting poor youths.

The AFL-CIO statement also endorsed sections of the legislation that would revise criteria required of states to become eligible for federal grants.

Among other things, the states would have to submit an annual evaluation of vocational education programs, see to it that the programs serve all groups in all communities, and plan long-range programs.

Young declared that the current level of financing all vocational education—"only $273 million was appropriated in 1968"—is far too low. He noted that the National Advisory Council recommends $500 million for the "comprehensive" programs alone — not including work-study, residential, exemplary and disadvantaged youth programs —and urged Congress to set "realistic" sums.

In the specific and separate section to set up "exemplary" programs of innovative and experimental projects, he stressed that the $15 million proposed could scarcely cover "even a minor part" and urged that it be raised.

The federation also "strongly opposed" a part of the bill calling for expiration in 1968 of work-study programs and residential vocational schools.

Machinists Win Virginia Election

Winchester, Va.—Employes of a Crown Cork & Seal Co. can plant here voted for the Machinists in an election contest with Mine Workers District 50.

The vote in a National Labor Relations Board election was 275 for the IAM, 63 for District 50, with 11 voting for neither and two votes challenged in a unit of 375 employes.

Crown workers joined the unaffiliated union three years ago but were unhappy over lack of service, inferior working conditions and low wages, IAM Vice Pres. Floyd Smith reported. The IAM will issue a new charter and prepare contract proposals, Smith said.

6-Month Report:

Wage Chiseling Up, Crackdown Pushed

ceding six months to $36.3 million—a nearly 2 percent increase.

The $36.3 million represented wage chiseling—some of it deliberate—broken down as follows: 138,834 workers who did not get overtime due them at the time-and-a-half rate; 78,652 who were paid less than the required minimum wage; 4,235 not paid the prevailing wage under the McNamara-O'Hara Service Contracts Act, and 2,514 not given equal pay for equal work.

Every classification showed an increase in numbers of employes unlawfully underpaid except one—that under the Equal Pay Act.

The increase in violations uncovered was 42 percent among employes covered by the Service Contracts Act, nearly 15 percent for minimum wage violations.

Total underpayments followed the same pattern. For the last half of 1967, minimum wage underpayments rose by more than $1 million, and service contracts violations were more than double—from $229,000 to $681,000.

Overtime underpayments dropped slightly from $25.6 million to $25.4 and equal pay violations from $1.8 to $1.2 million.

The data show a continuing need for a vigorous and sustained inspection program, the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research observed. Violations by employers are probably even more widespread than the figures indicate, the department said.

When the amendments supported by labor took effect 13 months ago, the AFL-CIO launched its own program to seek out violations and urged Congress to approve Pres. Johnson's request for more wage-hour inspectors.

Labor central bodies across the country offered their services to all workers, whether union members or not, in the drive to enforce the law against chiseling or underpayments by careless or uninformed employers. The statistics do not show how many complaints were filed at union request, the department said.

The wage-hour law requires payment of not less than $1.60 an hour for certain employes of firms in interstate commerce.

For hours worked in excess of 40 in any workweek, employes must receive at least time and a half their regular pay unless a specific exemption applies.

The Equal Pay Act of 1963, which amended the FLSA, prohibits wage discrimination based on sex for employes subject to the minimum wage provisions of the wage-hour law. Under the Service Contracts Act, workers for private employers doing government contract work must be paid the prevailing wage and fringe benefits as determined by the secretary of labor.

On Feb. 1, 1967, FLSA amendments raised the minimum wages for those previously covered and extended coverage to more than 9 million additional workers in hospitals and nursing homes, public and private educational agencies, laundries, construction jobs, and large retail firms, restaurants, hotels, motels and farms.

Further changes went into effect Feb. 1, 1968. They raised the minimums for most covered workers from $1.40 an hour to $1.60. Those brought under the act's protection by the 1966 amendments became entitled to $1.15 an hour and overtime pay after 42 hours.

Labor Urges White House Aging Parley

A call for a White House Conference on Aging in 1970 was endorsed by the AFL-CIO. The conference is proposed in a resolution now being considered by a special Senate Labor subcommittee.

In a letter to Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), chairman of the subcommittee, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller called for a favorable report on the measure.

Biemiller noted that 30 percent of the 20 million older Americans live in poverty, with another 20 percent "only a stone's throw away" from it.

"The need is obvious for an improved public policy when one of two elderly people live in poverty or on the brink of it," he said.

"Insufficient income, poor housing, shortcomings in health care, lack of community facilities with services to assist them in their problems, frequent isolation from the main stream, are a few of the conditions which frustrate older people."

A White House conference, Biemiller added, will provide "an essential curriculum for decision-making in our country's major attacks on the problems of age."

Sleight of Hand

MUSCULAR DYSTROPHY VICTIMS benefitted when the Fire Fighters celebrated their 50th birthday at a dinner in Washington. More than 1,000 guests paid $50 a plate, and the proceeds went to the Muscular Dystrophy Associations of America. Speakers included AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and comedian Jerry Lewis, MDAA chairman.

Medicare Doctor Bill Signup Ends Apr. 1

More than 500,000 persons over 65 who had not previously been enrolled for the voluntary doctor bill insurance under medicare "Part B" have signed up since last Oct. 1, the Social Security Administration reported.

For those who haven't, there's only until Apr. 1 to take advantage of the current open enrollment period. If they don't, they will have to wait another year for the next open period—and then pay a premium 10 percent higher. And those who wait three years past their first chance to enroll won't be able to join.

Just about everyone now 65 or over is eligible for the voluntary medical insurance, whether or not they have ever worked under social security and whether retired or still working.

Johnson Asks New Programs To Help D.C.

Pres. Johnson asked Congress to help make the District of Columbia a good place to live in as well as to visit.

He urged new and expanded programs of crime prevention, education and housing, to make up for years of neglect.

The President termed crime "the first problem in the nation's first city" and asked for a stronger, better-paid police force that could "serve as a model for all the cities of America."

He asked higher pay—and a $7,000 starting salary—for school teachers, along with a large-scale "community school" experiment to serve adults as well as children, offer recreation as well as learning.

Johnson urged "seed money" assistance to non-profit sponsors of low-income housing and called for legislation to prevent landlords from evicting tenants in retaliation for having reported building code violations.

He backed legislation to provide an elected school board and representation in Congress for the District of Columbia.

Johnson reiterated his support for home rule for Washington, declaring that "as long as I am President, I will work to hasten that day's arrival."

gathering, "to an organization which celebrates its anniversary with hardly a word about what it does for itself, but rather what it does for other people."

Meany spoke of labor's pride in the community service contributions of union members, and he spoke also of the thorny problem of collective bargaining for public employes such as fire fighters.

"One thing is for sure," Meany stressed, the solution "doesn't lie in punitive legislation."

He said municipal workers must have the same right to bargain collectively as other workers.

"No matter what a man's work is, he has the same living problems," Meany said. "Municipal workers have fallen behind other workers. Perhaps voluntary arbitration is an answer—with determination made by those who can look at the problem with a heart and a sense of justice to the workers."

He saluted "the partnership in behalf of muscular dystrophy victims which has been so fortunately formed by the Fire Fighters, the MDAA and Jerry Lewis, that funny but very serious man."

Fire Fighters Pres. William D. Buck welcomed the guests, and two veterans of the union's founding convention half a century ago were presented to the audience—William Gardner of Kansas City, Mo., and former Sec.-Treas. George Richardson of Silver Spring, Md. Gardner had brought to the anniversary observance for presentation to the union the original copy of the IAFF constitution and the proceedings of its first convention.

It was Jerry Lewis' birthday and he used a fire axe to cut the five-foot cake. There were speakers, entertainers and as many notables in the audience as at the head table. Mrs. Perle Mesta was honorary chairman of the anniversary banquet and the working committee included equally prominent Washingtonians.

The union's record of community service in past years, Meany told the gathering, is matched by its "determination to do even more in the future" and is part of the labor movement's recognition of its "obligations to the nation as a whole."

Dystrophy Unit Elects Kenin, Donahue

Musicians Pres. Herman D. Kenin and Assistant Sec. of Labor Thomas R. Donahue, Jr., are among the newly-elected vice presidents of the Muscular Dystrophy Associations of America.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Pres. William D. Buck of the Fire Fighters and Vice Pres. James H. Rademacher of the Letter Carriers were renamed to the organization's national board, and Retail Clerks Pres. James A. Suffridge was reelected a vice president.

Court Upholds Jobless Pay In Rail Layoff

The U.S. Supreme Court has upheld the Railroad Retirement Board's grant of more than $2.5 million in unemployment benefits to some 3,000 rail firemen whose jobs on diesels were eliminated under a 1963 compulsory arbitration award.

The high court declined to review a lower court ruling which sustained the board and rejected a challenge brought by the Western Pacific Railway Co. and the Southern Pacific Railway Co.

The board ruled that firemen with two to 10 years seniority were eligible for jobless compensation even though they also received severance pay under the award.

The deciding issue in the case, the lower court found, was that the board's grant of benefits is not reviewable under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, except to review a denial of benefits or determine who is an employer.

Meany Hails LBJ Record, Urges Labor Aid 'Friends'

Senate Ends Bond Tax Loophole

The Senate voted 50-32 to end the tax exemption of industrial bonds, which a growing number of communities have used as a lure to attract new industry—or pirate plants from other cities.

The labor-supported amendment to an omnibus tax bill was introduced by Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff (D-Conn.) in an effort to plug a loophole that has cost the federal government millions in taxes and provided a windfall in low-cost financing for some of the nation's wealthiest corporations.

Earlier, the Senate had voted to bar the Treasury Dept. from going ahead with its announced plan to end the tax exemption by regulation. But the vote for the Ribicoff amendment made it clear that the first vote merely represented an assertion of congressional prerogative to determine tax policy—and not a rejection of the change in policy.

Transition Period

The Ribicoff amendment would preserve the tax exemption only on bonds issued before Jan. 1, 1969. In effect it would provide a transitional period for the change.

Before the vote, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller wired senators that the industrial bonds are a "tax evasion device" which have not created new jobs and which have pushed up the cost of school and public works financing, thus causing job losses.

"WE ARE GOING to build that better America," Pres. Johnson pledges in a fighting speech to 4,000 delegates at the national legislative conference of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. "And we are going to build it even as we meet our commitments in a world where freedom is under attack."

At Building Trades Parley:

President Pledges Fight for Progress

Pres. Johnson pledged to American labor that he will carry on "our fight . . . to make life better for all the people."

The "mighty foundations" of progress have been put in place during the past four years with labor's help, the President declared, "and we are not going to sit by and let them be torn down in a partisan political election year."

Johnson was cheered repeatedly by the 4,000 delegates to the 13th national legislative conference of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

They had come from all parts of the nation, representing 3.5 million members of the department's 18 affiliated unions, to meet with their home-town congressmen and home-state senators.

The theme of the conference was set by BCTD Pres. C. J. Haggerty.

"We not only build America with the tools and materials of our crafts," Haggerty declared. "We build America with the economic and social legislation" which will benefit "every man, woman and child, regardless of race, creed, color or economic status."

During two days of visits on Capitol Hill, delegates sought to revive the stalled on-site picketing bill, to give a massive push to the important on-the-job safety legislation now being considered in House and Senate committees, and to press for enactment of the housing program proposed by the President and strongly backed in its main areas by labor.

They carried with them fact sheets covering labor's broad-ranging program in a dozen fields as well as legislation of special importance to the building trades.

Delegates filled out reports on their visits with congressmen and senators, to be tabulated and analyzed by union legislative experts.

Before starting on their two days of Capitol Hill visits, the delegates

Cites 4 Years of Legislative Gains

The congressmen, senators—and President—who supported labor's legislative program for the nation deserve labor's support on Election Day, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

And they will get it, he predicted.

"If we do not believe in supporting our friends at election time," he told delegates to the building trades legislative conference, "then we should stay away from the legislative halls of the state and nation."

Meany read the record of four years of legislative progress in education, health care, minimum wages, civil rights, social security, pollution control, consumer protection and a host of other major accomplishments.

"Some refer to it as the Johnson program," he said. "Some say it is the AFL-CIO program. I don't care what they call it. I know we have made progress.

LBJ Saluted

"But I do know that we could not have made that progress without the leadership of the man in the White House."

Samuel Gompers' advice to "support your friends" remains "good, sound philosophy," Meany said.

To the applause of the 4,000 delegates, he declared:

"I don't think we are going to turn our back on a friend just because he has a difficult task to perform at a time when he needs his friends more than ever. So come next fall, I am convinced that labor will discharge its obligation."

Meany blasted the sniping at Pres. Johnson by those seeking to make political capital of "the war that nobody wants." The "real hawks," he noted, want to drop "a few hydrogen bombs" to end the war.

"Well, of course it would end the

Glass Strike Settled At 17 Firms

Philadelphia—A 51-day strike by members of the Glass Bottle Blowers ended when a union committee voted to accept a new three-year package of benefits valued at up to 95 cents an hour for 35,000 production and maintenance workers. Still to be settled, however, are contracts for 15,000 skilled workers and West Coast production employes.

The strike settlement came after employers made a new offer at the request of GBBA Pres. Lee W. Minton following previous turndowns. The agreement, covering 17 firms with plants east of the Rocky Mountains, eases a bottle shortage that had spread to the drug, food and distilling industries.

At Minton's request, negotiations were resumed Mar. 27 for 10,000 glass machine operators and upkeep men in the "hot mills" represented by the union's National Automatic Machine Dept. Continuing also are talks covering 5,000 production and maintenance workers in plants west of the Rockies.

Copper Unions Push For Final Contracts

Copper unions came to terms with management for the bulk of the 60,000 workers on strike since last July 15, and pushed for settlements covering 8,500 employes in the fabricating end of the industry, the only unsettled sector.

The unions reached provisional agreement with the Kennecott Copper Corp., Anaconda Co. and American Smelting & Refining Co. for employes of their copper mining, milling, smelting and refining properties and their lead and zinc operations, and with Kennecott for a big Chase Brass mill at Cleveland, O. Contracts covering 6,000 Phelps Dodge Corp. employes were ratified a week earlier.

Approval of the pacts is conditioned on satisfactory settlement of local issues at each property, and ratification by each of the 26 unions involved in the long strike.

The striking unions also reached agreement with two smaller companies—Miami Copper Co. and Inspiration Consolidated Copper Co.—for 1,500 workers at Miami, Ariz. They warned that the strike against Anaconda's brass and wire fabricating plants and three small independent firms will continue unless agreement is reached in the next few days.

"Members of the six striking unions simply are not going to be forced by the companies to accept the substandard proposals they have

Price Rise Continues, Buying Power Gains

Consumer prices increased three-tenths of 1 percent in February for the fifth consecutive month, the Labor Dept. reported. At the same time, it announced that workers' purchasing power scored its biggest increase since last July during the month.

The Consumer Price Index climbed to 119 in February, 3.7 percent above the year-earlier level, the report showed.

This means that a market basket of goods and services cost the average city family $11.90 last month compared to a cost of $10 in the 1957-59 base period.

Charges for consumer services averaged four-tenths of 1 percent higher in February, accounting for nearly half the total increase in the index. Medical care services rose six-tenths of 1 percent, as hospital costs and doctors fees continued to mount, according to the report issued by the department's Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Prices for home decorating and repairs also went up in February and mortgage interest rose. Rents extended their long-term uptrend as did property taxes and insurance.

LABOR'S FRIENDS deserve—and will get—labor's support on Election Day, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany affirms at the building trades legislative conference. That's been the "good, sound philosophy" of the trade union movement since the time of Samuel Gompers, Meany declared.

Schoemann Bids Locals Help Negroes to Skills

Pres. Peter T. Schoemann has called on locals of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters to help make the "affirmative action" pledge of the nation's construction trades unions a meaningful contribution to easing racial strife and helping Negro youths become skilled journeymen.

Schoemann acknowledged that there remain "some deep-rooted feelings and attitudes" to be overcome, but stressed that difficulties should not be used as excuses.

"Let's quit arguing and pussyfooting and bellyaching about the objections and the difficulties," he declared.

The Plumbers' president spoke to hundreds of local union leaders at a luncheon in Washington during the legislative conference of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. Guests at the affair included AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and BCTD Pres. C. J. Haggerty.

Schoemann noted that he had "complained loud and long" about some of the federal government's actions and policies designed to assure nondiscrimination in apprenticeship. But, he stressed, locals in a number of cities—with encouragement from the international union—have practiced affirmative action in deeds.

He cited apprentice preparation programs developed in cooperation with such groups as the Workers Defense League, the A. Philip Randolph Education Fund and the Urban League.

These programs, Schoemann said, "recruit minority applicants for building trades apprenticeship programs, and they put these applicants through programs of special preparation to help them meet our qualifications and get ready for the entrance examinations and the interviews. Officers of UA local unions have taken a very active part in organizing some of these programs."

'Concrete Deeds'

He termed the results "substantial," declaring:

"We have demonstrated by concrete deeds that we do not discriminate on the basis of race or color. The sponsors of these programs have demonstrated that minority youth can be recruited to meet our qualifications. We have seen that they can acquire an interest in the skilled trades. . . ."

The union's members and leaders, Schoemann noted, "are neither social revolutionaries nor social stand-patters. . . . We are straight-line trade unionists."

But, he said, labor and management can't leave all of the troublesome problems to the government and expect to preserve freedom of action in other areas.

Schoemann said the international will assist local unions with special problems in winning the cooperation and support of the membership for affirmative action.

If the premise of the programs is right, he said, "few gestures can have so much meaning for racial harmony. . . . The good results of affirmative action for ourselves, for the people we seek to help, and for our nation, can truly surpass all expectation."

Pres. Buck of Fire Fighters Plans to Retire

Pres. William D. Buck of the Fire Fighters, who has held office in the union for 28 years, has announced he will not be a candidate for re-election at the union's convention in August.

In a letter to the union's executive board, which was published in the Fire Fighter magazine, Buck said:

"My family and my physician advise me not to seek re-election. Remembering the fate of my two immediate predecessors, who died in office, I find the urgings of my family and medical advisor persuasive."

Buck became a member of the St. Louis Fire Dept. in 1930 and rose to the rank of captain. Active in the union, he was elected a vice president in 1940 and secretary-treasurer in 1956. He was named president in 1957 and has been re-elected at each convention since.

He noted that the union has nearly tripled its membership since 1940 and has added a number of new functions in the fields of education, research, legislative activity and public relations.

Sec.-Treas. Albert E. Albertoni, who was first elected to that post in 1964, has announced he will be a candidate for another term.

'Foundations' Now in Place:

Johnson Pledges to Carry On Fight for Nation's Progress

heard from leading Democratic and Republican members of Congress. They gave them warm welcomes, respectful attention and generous applause.

But an applause meter would have been strained to the breaking point by the shouts and cheers that welcomed the President, punctuated his speech and continued until he had left the hall. Home-made placards waved in the aisles and hundreds of outstretched hands sought to clasp those of the President as if in response to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's declaration an hour earlier that "we should hold up the hands of our commander-in-chief."

Johnson, with the cadence of a veteran campaigner, recited the record of the last several years:

- "12 million Americans have risen from poverty—and that's progress.
- "16 million school children face a better future because of the great educational breakthroughs—and that's progress.
- "20 million older Americans—your mothers and fathers—no longer fear the crushing burden of medical bills—and that's progress.
- "41 million American workers are protected by a higher minimum wage—and that's progress.
- "75 million Americans are working in better jobs at higher wages than ever in our history—and that's great progress."

But this progress is only "a starting point," Johnson stressed.

"Every day—in a hundred ways—we are reaching out to those Americans still lost in the dark corners of our society.

"Let there be no cruel delusion that the job will be easy," he cautioned. "Let there be no false hope that the solutions will be quick. For we are cutting through a century of neglect. But we are cutting through. We are moving on and we are not going to be stopped."

Warmed by the audience response, the President departed from his prepared speech to talk of the basic needs and simple pleasures that the average American seeks—and is entitled to.

Shelter, Food

He listed some of them: "A roof over his head, clothes on his body, food in his stomach . . . a decent school for his children to attend . . . a church to worship in according to the dictates of his conscience . . . maybe a little recreation now and then."

And also, the President quipped, the chance "to watch a television program if the politicians are not monopolizing it."

Earlier the building trades delegates had heard from Speaker of the House John W. McCormack (D-Mass.), who warned that inaction by the United States when freedom is imperiled abroad would be a greater risk than action.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz appealed to the delegates to stop the "murder on the job in America" by pushing for passage of the worker safety bills.

When he testified before House and Senate committees on the legislation, Wirtz related, "the hearing rooms were packed."

But, he added, "they were packed with lobbyists opposed to doing anything about a workers' safety problem that meant the death of 14,500 people last year. . . . I count it as one of the real gut issues."

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told the delegates that union members must "get excited about elections, because Congress can make or break you. Congress can tell you how you can bargain, how you can enforce your contracts. And if they want to, they can tell you that you can't work together through your local building trades councils."

Vice Pres. Humphrey was scheduled to address the final report session of the conference.

Union Accepts New Pay Offer In Glass Strike

plant contracts, the union said, will be bolstered by the parties' agreement to seek a uniform wage structure in three steps over the contract term. Such a structure will bring substantial additional increases for many workers, especially in southern plants, according to GBBA.

Additional increases are provided for under a cost-of-living clause to take effect at the start of the second and third years of the agreement.

Wages under the pact will be raised 20 cents an hour the first year for all workers, plus an additional 10 cents an hour for skilled classifications, 4 percent in the second year, and 4 percent in the third.

Pension benefits were raised to $4 a month for each year of credited service. Retirement is possible at age 62 with no reduction in benefits.

Also improved were shift premiums and insurance, along with other fringe benefits.

A committee of union presidents voted 55-34 to accept the settlement offer by the Glass Container Manufacturers Institute, representing plants making 95 percent of the U.S. supply of bottles. Six weeks earlier they had turned down by a 62-31 margin a management package valued by the employers at 67 cents an hour.

Negotiations on new contract terms began Nov. 28 and continued a month past the expiration date. The strike began Feb. 1.

The strike-settling offer came in the third week of meetings between the union officers, the employers and representatives of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Meany Urges Support For 'Friends of Labor'

war. It might also end the world," he observed.

Equally unacceptable, he added, are the views of "the fellow who was laboriously trying to explain to the American people his program for honorable surrender on the installment plan."

And in an apparent reference to Richard Nixon, Meany commented:

"Then there is the fellow who aspires to be President. He is going to end the war. He has a secret plan to end the war but he won't tell us. Now, that's pretty mean."

It's easy, Meany said, to criticize from the sidelines, to make campaign promises, "when you don't have the responsibility."

But the fact remains, he stressed, that the United States has offered to negotiate, to halt all military activities when negotiation is accepted, but "the response from Hanoi has been no, no, no."

Meany opened his talk to the building trades conference with a vigorous affirmation of the AFL-CIO's vitality and effectiveness.

As a federation of 128 "autonomous and independent" unions, Meany stressed, the AFL-CIO flourishes when its affiliates flourish, fails when its national and international unions fail.

It must work to raise the standards of all Americans, not just its own members, because "no one segment of society can long profit at the expense of others."

While the AFL-CIO is not a community organization, "it does have concern for the community and must have, because that is where its members live."

And while labor is not a political organization, Meany stressed that "it must be politically active" because its goals and ideals are affected by legislation "and this means politicians."

Despite critics who say labor is "too powerful" or complain that "we are not doing too well," Meany said "we are still going to be moving forward in doing our job for our people and for our country."

'It's the Least We Can Do'

Members Authorize Strike:

CWA Sets Deadline For Bell Settlement

The Communications Workers will start a nationwide walkout against the Bell Telephone System Apr. 12 if no acceptable wage agreement is reached before that date, CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne announced.

"We don't want a strike," Beirne told a news conference. "We want an agreement." But it is evident, he said, that Bell is "not prepared to move" and a strike will be necessary unless management "reappraises its position" in wage reopening negotiations.

Beirne said he was authorized by the union executive board to set 3 p.m. Good Friday as a deadline for settlement at three Bell subsidiaries where strikes of 48,000 members have been authorized—Western Electric Co., where the union represents 22,500 installers; Ohio Bell Telephone Co., 19,500, and Illinois Bell Telephone Co., 6,000 state and suburban operators.

The CWA board authorized Beirne also to sanction strikes against all other Bell companies where members have voted for such action by the Apr. 12 deadline—a total of possibly 15 companies.

Some 165,000 members, according to CWA, could be involved by that date in the first nationwide Bell System strike since 1947, when the National Federation of Telephone Workers called a walkout. NFTW merged with other unions that year to become CWA.

In a letter to local CWA union officers, Beirne reported that "as things now stand, the industry's proposals are not sufficient. . . . The collision course" which he had warned against for several months "is now in sharper focus."

Union negotiators will "continue to do everything possible to get a satisfactory agreement" by Apr. 12, Beirne said. He expressed the hope that management would improve its current offers for a wage increase totaling 7.25 percent for the next 18 months of the existing CWA contracts.

"This is a controlled industry," the CWA leader said. "Its pattern in bargaining is to hold the line, to offer no more at one company than its top offer at another."

All Bell companies, Beirne noted, are affiliates of the giant American Telephone & Telegraph Co., which reported profits of $2 billion last year and exceeded even that high profit rate for the first three months of 1968.

The CWA president said that gross wages average $2.38 for phone operators—$95.20 a week before taxes; $2.79 for all telephone workers, $3.27 for equipment installers.

"Many people," he said, "don't realize that wages for many workers are so low that on Feb. 1, Bell had to raise the rates of a couple of thousand operators to meet the new federal minimum wage."

Beirne said Bell and the union are "still far from agreement" in four principal areas—wages, pay differentials between groups of cities, premium pay and "merit" pay.

Management's wage offer falls short by about 3 percent of the 10.25 percent figure that Beirne said he believes should be a fair minimum, in keeping with raises by other less profitable industries.

A DUES INCREASE for 1.2 million members of the Steelworkers was voted by a special one-day convention of 3,686 union delegates at Atlantic City. Picture shows a delegate waving for attention at microphone. The dues hike, first in 12 years, will provide a permanent defense fund to backstop strikes like the one in copper mines and mills, nearing an end after eight months.

Wage Hike Heads Contract Goals For Steel, Aluminum Negotiations

Atlantic City, N. J.—An equitable wage structure will be the major goal of the Steelworkers in negotiations this year in the basic steel and aluminum industries, delegates from 350 union locals agreed at conferences held here at the close of a special USWA convention called to raise union dues.

The two conferences, representing 480,000 members in basic steel and 30,000 in aluminum, reviewed conditions in their industries and adopted statements of objectives for union negotiators. Bargaining is due to begin Apr. 9 with aluminum firms and Apr. 15 with the steel companies.

A substantial pay increase is of major importance, the statements said, for union members squeezed by steadily rising living costs and erosion of rates and jobs.

Other factors cited were the profitability and productivity of the steel industry; the sustained growth of the U.S. economy, and the levels of contract settlements in other major industries—auto, rubber, and can.

Nearly 600 delegates from 300 basic steel locals stressed the need for an appropriate wage scale and proper job classifications.

The steel conference pinpointed these other objectives:

"Our search for methods of preventing and offsetting the loss of jobs must continue.

"The premium for overtime work should be increased to discourage excessive overtime.

"Prohibitions against subcontracting, especially by sending work outside the plant, and rules against performance of bargaining unit work by supervisors must be strengthened."

Greater protection against arbitrary reduction of crews and combinations of jobs should be sought, the conferees said. They asked for a system to protect the income of employes transferred to lower rated jobs due to reduced operations.

"Consideration also should be given to an approach towards earnings protection comparable to that negotiated in the can industry," they said.

The steel conference reported that the current job evaluation system has not adequately dealt with the effects of automation and changing technology. Job rates of some workers on new operations are being cut despite increased output and responsibility for expensive equipment.

"These injustices," the conference declared, "must be eliminated by modernizing our manual to assure a fair and equitable wage structure. Furthermore, the impact of new technology on maintenance and craft requirements should be appropriately reflected in the wage and job structure."

The union statements in both steel and aluminum called for better pension programs, expanded medical coverage, improved job and income protection, more holidays, improved severance pay, safety conditions and health facilities, and the upgrading of contracts covering office and technical employes.

California Turns Down Kingsport Press Offer

Sacramento, Calif.—A vigorous labor campaign against the award of a $120,000 school textbook printing contract to the struck Kingsport, Tenn., Press achieved success when the State of California rejected Kingsport's bid and assigned the work to the unionized state printing plant.

The plant is staffed by union craftsmen. The strike-bound Kingsport Press, operated by strikebreakers, entered a bid slightly lower than that of a union printer and bookbinder in San Francisco.

General Services Dir. Andrew R. Lolli heeded union objections that awarding the contract to Kingsport would cost the state and its workers many thousands of dollars more than the anticipated "saving" on the low bid.

More than 1,000 members of five AFL-CIO unions struck Kingsport Press five years ago for contract improvements and have been unable since then to get management to rehire the strikers under union contracts. The federation's Union Label & Service Trades Dept. has been conducting a "don't buy" campaign against the big book-printing plant, which operates with strikebreakers.

Union protests against a contract with Kingsport pointed out that such action would cost the state heavily in lost state income taxes, sales taxes and jobs. The protests to Gov. Ronald Reagan (R) were initiated by the State AFL-CIO, Bookbinders Local 31-125 and Lithographers Local 17-L with support by the San Francisco, Los Angeles County and Alameda County AFL-CIO plus the state Graphic Arts Council.

Three labor-sponsored bills to prevent unfair competition from substandard out-of-state firms await action by the California legislature.

In another development, the Detroit Board of Education voted 5-2 against a move to rescind the Kingsport Press resolution it adopted more than a year ago. The vote preserved a policy based on union objections to the use of Kingsport products.

Profits Down

Meanwhile, in Kingsport, company Pres. E. J. Triebe reported to stockholders that 1967 production increased about 1 percent while net income dropped from $1.3 million in 1966 to $553,000 in 1967, and per share net income from $1.60 to 67 cents.

Kingsport Press has been the largest U.S. producer of hardcover books. Production of such books in the first two months of 1968 totaled 5.3 million, a drop of more than 750,000 from production for the same period of 1967, the firm revealed.

The company "entered 1967 with expanded facilities, prepared to serve the continuing long-term growth" of the publishing industry but "that growth did not develop," the report noted.

Margolius Named To Consumer Panel

Sidney Margolius, consumer columnist for the AFL-CIO News and other publications has been named to a panel which will study the effectiveness of consumer protection laws.

Pres. Johnson named Margolius and six others to the National Commission on Product Safety. Arnold Elkin, New York attorney, is chairman. The panel will complete its study within two years and report to Johnson and Congress.

Other members are Emory J. Crofoot, Portland, Ore.; Hugh L. Ray, Chicago; Henry A. Hill, Cambridge, Mass.; Dana Young, San Antonio, Tex., and Michael Pertschuk, general counsel of the Senate Commerce Committee.

Copper Pacts Reached For Most of Strikers

made for these operations," said Chairman Joseph P. Molony of the unions' Nonferrous Industry Conference.

The six unions are the Machinists; Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Auto Workers, Steelworkers and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

Wage gains in the agreements ratified during national negotiations in Washington were put by the unions at 54 cents an hour at Kennecott, 56 cents at Anaconda and from 40 to 55 cents for ASARCO.

Pension Goal Reached

The ASARCO pact provides a long-time objective of all the striking unions—a company-wide pension plan. Also it calls for wage restructuring, steps toward eliminating the disparity between contracts at company properties, and extension of the severance pay program to all properties.

The Kennecott pact calls for an identical economic settlement covering all Western Mining Div. employes, members of 40 locals of a dozen international unions. Anaconda workers in Montana, Nevada, Arizona and New Jersey will work under similar wage scales and contract provisions.

Pension improvements in the latter two companies parallel those negotiated with Phelps Dodge Corp., the first big firm to settle, and ASARCO. Monthly benefits are increased to $5 per year of service. Workers retiring at age 60 may get $130 monthly supplements until they become eligible for social security benefits. Widow's pensions were won, and disablity pensions were raised to a minimum of $100 a month.

Most of the pacts call for five months' pay in the event of retirement, disability or death. Laid-off workers will receive $25 a week for the first 26 weeks, $50 for another 26 weeks for a maximum of $1,950. The two provisions are "firsts" for Anaconda workers.

Other contract areas that were improved include health and welfare benefits, vacations, holiday pay and shift differentials.

Still unsettled were contracts with three firms for nearly 1,000 workers—Cerro Corp., with brass mills at Cleveland, O., and Stamford, Conn.; New Haven Copper Co. for a brass mill at Seymour, Conn., and Hecla Mining Co., for silver and lead mines at Wallace, Ida.

Morris Riger Named To Manpower Post

The Dept. of Labor has named Morris Riger, former regional director for the Textile Workers Union of America, as manpower administrator for the mid-Atlantic states and the District of Columbia and coordinator of a new job-training program for 500,000 unemployed ghetto residents.

The Jobs Problem

THE MOST IMPORTANT single fact that emerges from the creation of the National Alliance of Businessmen is the recognition of the real and pressing need to solve the problem of hard-core unemployment.

Linked to this recognition is the understanding that new approaches and new programs are required to produce the remedies that will bring the hard-core unemployed into the mainstream of American life as usefully employed citizens.

The assumptions of previous years that continuing economic growth would provide jobs for all who wanted and needed them have proved faulty. In the economic growth since 1961 job opportunities multiplied, but there was a group that was left behind—the hard core of the jobless who were not equipped to hold a job in a modern economy.

They were not equipped for work in terms of education. They lacked work experience. And perhaps most important, they lacked the motivation to find and hold a job.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a recent meeting of the National Alliance of Businessmen:

"It is not enough, it will not be enough, to go into the ghettos and say, 'Here is a job.' The deprived Americans who make up the hard core of the unemployed need to be taught and need to be trained before they can fill a job. And even before that, they must be motivated by the desire to fill one."

Meany stressed that "those who have known nothing but deprivation, denial and discrimination, who have been rejected so often by society in the past are skeptical of new offers of opportunity."

The formation of the NAB is evidence that private enterprise operating along traditional lines cannot by itself handle the economic needs of all citizens, that there must be a cooperative effort by government, business and labor, the local communities, the school systems to crack the problem of hard-core unemployment.

There is no place in modern American society, Meany stressed, for "a substratum, an underground of poverty . . . for while it exists American society itself is not wholly free."

The Wage Chiselers

THE CHISELING EMPLOYERS are still with us. A Labor Dept. survey shows that violations of the minimum wage law in the last six months of 1967 took $36.3 million out of workers' pockets, an increase over the first six months of the year.

The 193,668 workers who were underpaid in terms of the government's survey do not by any means constitute the entire range of employer chiseling under the wage law. Labor Dept. inspectors stepped up their visits to business establishments, but they only covered 33,230 of the 1.9 million establishments in the six-month period.

Employers were found to be chiseling on overtime, paying less than the required minimum, failing to pay the prevailing wage under the Federal Service Contracts Act and violating equal pay for equal work provisions.

The survey demonstrates once again the need for a vigorous and sustained enforcement program by the Labor Dept. The violations reported are obviously only part of a larger pattern of employers—willfully or not—ignoring a federal law designed to protect millions of low-paid workers.

Success of Labor Movement Written in Gains of Workers

The following is excerpted from an address by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to the 13th National Legislative Conference of the Building & Construction Trades Dept.

THE AFL-CIO IS an organization of workers, with the simple purpose of raising the standards of life of the people it represents. This means wages, hours and working conditions of our members.

But when we set out to implement this simple purpose, we found out many years ago that in order to do an adequate job, we had to raise the standards of all because under our American democratic system, under the dynamic economy which we have in this country, it is quite obvious that no one segment of society can long profit at the expense of others.

Therefore, our efforts are to raise the standards of the entire community and, at the same time, raise the standards of our members. And, of course, it is obvious that in raising the standards, our people get a better share because they are organized people.

And let's look at the federation. Let's take a look at the organization. It consists of 128 national and international unions, autonomous and independent in every way, who have federated themselves together into a structure not dissimilar from the federal union of the United States.

It is not a social organization, but it does have responsibilities of a social nature.

It is not a community organization, but it does have concern for the community and must have, because that is where its members live.

It is not a political organization, but—and this is a great big "but"—it must be politically active because the standards and the ideals of our organization, the things that we aspire to, are controlled and influenced by legislation and this means politics.

The AFL-CIO is the sum of its parts. It is a coordinating organization to speak for labor with a united voice wherever a united voice is needed. If the AFL-CIO is not doing well, then its 128 international unions are not doing well. If it is moribund, then its internationals are moribund and stagnant. If it fails, then the internationals are failing.

But what are the facts in regard to the major preoccupation of this organization? Well, I am not going to attempt to give you any figures in regard to the simple purposes of the organization—wages, hours and so forth.

I am merely going to state that the wages are higher, the fringe benefits are better, the contracts are better, the welfare and pension plans are better for the entire trade union movement—as the result of collective bargaining by our organizations.

American workers today have the highest wages in their history. Their children are better clothed, better housed, have better educational opportunities. And this is because the trade union movement today has better contracts and we are a better organization.

So it would be a sheer waste of time to try to fill you in with figures on the simple question of wages and hours.

THEN ON THE QUESTION of organizing, which is important—the AFL-CIO does not organize on its own. It has no jurisdiction. The international unions have the responsibility to organize in their alloted jurisdiction. The AFL-CIO helps to bring about cooperation. And the success or failure of those efforts must be reflected in the per capita payments to the AFL-CIO by the national and international unions.

Let me give you a few figures, very simple figures. In June of 1964, there were 12,717,000 members in the AFL-CIO, June 1965, 12,971,000 members. June 1966, 13,385,000 members. June 1967, 13,985,000. And in January 1968, the membership was 14,951,000—an increase of 14 percent in 3½ years. Pretty good for an organization that is resting on dead center.

Now I would like to turn to a field where our activities, in addition to affecting our own members, affect the population of the entire country. This is the field of social, remedial, educational legislation at the state and national level. This means health, manpower, education, social security, minimum wages, civil rights, economic growth, poverty, housing, rural America, air and water pollution urban redevelopment, industrial safety and what have you. There are hundreds of other matters that affect the overall welfare of the nation.

We must lead in this field for two very simple reasons. One, it affects our membership and their families and their neighbors. Two, we are the largest organization of private citizens in this country and we must, of necessity, take the lead in the things that affect all the people—the big people and the little people—the things that are matters of vital concern to the nation as a whole.

Wirtz Tells Parley:

Viet Nam, Urban Crisis Test Same Basic Issue of Freedom

The following is excerpted from an address by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz at the National Civil Liberties Clearing House Conference in Washington.

I PROPOSE TO NOTE briefly what it seems to me "we have gained in the last few years," some of the current dangers of the losses through possible liberal division, and the reasons why the largest promise for the future of effective liberalism is under present auspices.

The record is plain and doesn't need detailing. It is relevant only for the credibility it gives representations about the future. It is a record, in short, of getting done in the past five years what we who call ourselves liberals had been talking about all our lives. For our talk about laws, and most of those laws have been passed.

It is more significantly, however, a record of realization that passing laws is only part of laying the foundation for improving the quality and equality of human life.

It is a record of making the human truth, the whole and the basic human truth, an effective ally of the public purpose—which is as close as I can come to identifying the central and distinguishing element of liberalism.

I know the talk about the "credibility gap." I'd like to say this to the credibility yappers: We've gotten down nearer as a people to more basic facts and issues and truths in the past five years than we ever came close to getting before.

We've had poverty called by its right name for the first time in history.

We've had our quiet, false arrogance about our educational system shot down, and been told that free education for the rich so that they can go on to college is a fraud on the poor who can't.

We've been told bluntly that our cities are rotting at the core.

We've seen a President state squarely that there is a right to earn a living, and that it includes the right to be protected against negligence that is causing 14,000 deaths and 2 million disabling injuries among American workers every year.

We've seen the recognition of consumer rights and interests—which had gone unrecognized before because we are organized in this country in our capacity as producers but not in our capacity as consumers.

We've seen the first President in history with the political courage to raise with the people the question of whether they shouldn't decide deliberately how many children to have.

We've been put to an assignment to protect freedom in the world and to pay for it in taxes which is unpalatable to a great many people.

A credibility gap? This country has never before in its life been asked to look so much truth so squarely in the eye. That truth hurts. But it is that truth which is the necessary straw in the bricks that will build the cathedral of quality and equality in human life in America.

It would be the worst evasion, in a discussion of threatened division today within the ranks of American liberalism, to leave out the critical factor of the cleavage regarding the war in Viet Nam.

The view of some, indeed a good many, is that no issue of "liberalism" is important this year—except for the issue of Viet Nam.

Let's be clear about this: Those of us who believe, as I do, that we are doing in Viet Nam what has to be done—that this is the necessary course to establish peace with freedom—and that neither is worth having without the other—find on that bitter testing ground the same issues we face here at home. Nothing less than a belief that freedom's future is at stake there would warrant the bitter price that is being paid.

Those who take a different view—and who are willing to chart another course which they consider right and responsible—are as entitled to that view as are we to our own belief. But on one important point, which links the issue of war in Viet Nam to the issues of "liberalism" here at home, there is more to be said: It is a dangerous half-truth—for this leaves it half-lie—that the war in Viet Nam is preventing the carrying out of essential social reforms in this country.

The half-truth of this is in the fact that the release of the money and the energies and the manpower presently committed to the fighting to preserve freedom in Viet Nam ought to increase the available resources for making our freedoms more meaningful here at home. I believe this part of it, and count it one of the compelling reasons for bringing those hostilities to the earliest possible responsible termination. The thoughts sometimes expressed—also, but inconsistently, by those who oppose the war—that it is being extended to prevent economic collapse, reflect a wretched lack of self-confidence. There will be an easier opportunity to do the things we want to do; and we will do them.

THE HALF-LIE of it is that Viet Nam is the reason we haven't done more of what needs doing in this country. This isn't true.

It isn't enough—but it is important—to be clear about the fact that we have done infinitely more to improve the human condition in America during this period of crisis in Viet Nam than during any other period in our history.

It isn't enough—but it is important—to be clear that a great many of those who now oppose doing anything about the most serious social problems in America on the ground that "we can't fight two wars at once" have always opposed doing anything about these problems—on one basis or another, as opportunism dictated or suggested. They were opposed before Viet Nam and they will be opposed after Viet Nam.

It isn't enough—but it is important—to be clear that there are ample means in this country today to do both what has to be done in Viet Nam and what has to be done in America's cities.

It all comes down essentially again to the necessity, if American liberalism is to be effective, of generating a new national will, a new idea of the sort of society we are to be in America.

Recruitment Affected:

Lagging Pay, Rising Hazards Hamper Local Fire Fighters

LAGGING PAY and growing on-the-job dangers seriously hamper recruitment of fire fighters in many communities, Fire Fighters Pres. William D. Buck said in a network radio interview.

New building and manufacturing materials, as well as attacks on fire fighters during riots and other disturbances, have added to the risks those men must face, Buck said. As a result, he said, "a young fellow looks at the job and the exposure—the hazards that go with the job—and he is just not attracted to the service." Buck appeared on the public affairs program, Labor News Conference, broadcast at 7:35 p.m., EST, Tuesdays on the Mutual Radio Network.

The union president renewed his call for federal legislation that will protect fire fighters from "attack during performance of their duties during a riot or civil disturbance."

"Police protection has to be stepped up," he urged, "so that we fire fighters can get protection while doing our jobs during a riot," which is important to both the fire fighters and the community. Noting that a proposal to make attacks on firemen under such conditions a federal crime has "bogged down" in Congress, he pledged that the union will continue its fight for the bill.

COMMENTING on the recent recommendation of an independent study commission that the Fire Fighters union modify its constitutional prohibition against strikes, Buck said that there is growing sentiment among the membership to change the restriction. This is the result of "better experience" in dealing with some public officials who take an "adamant take-it-or-leave-it position, in light of our no-strike provision," he asserted. The recommendation will be submitted to the union's August convention.

Reporters questioning Buck were Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Alan Adams of Business Week magazine.

ONE OF THE PROUDEST boasts of the average southern Chamber of Commerce is the industrial growth of the South, the progress that is being made in bringing in new plants and factories, the rising standard of living of its people, the picture of a South "on the march."

In an unusually thoughtful study in the March Monthly Labor Review, the U.S. Dept. of Labor has confirmed much of this development. Yet, with considerable courage for a government agency, it has pointed to the urgent need for southern acceptance of new concepts of social and economic change that center around racial discrimination, inferior educational systems and a myth-laden anti-union atmosphere.

Most of the monthly Labor Review is devoted to 14 articles written by distinguished southern college professors of economics and sociology. They paint a picture of an undeniably "changing" South. Since World War II, the occupational structure of the South has become increasingly industrial. Agricultural employment, once dominant, is fading rapidly, while craftsmen, operators and service workers are increasing.

With this change has come a growth in the skilled Southern labor force and an improvement in the standard of living to the point where per capita income in the South, as compared with the rest of the country, rose from 46 percent in 1929 to 51 percent in 1940 and to 69 percent in 1963.

Hopeful as is the thread that runs through most of the "Labor in the South" articles, there are warnings that the South has still a long way to go to overcome deeply rooted psychological prejudices of the past century if it is to catch up with the rest of the country.

Among them are treatment of the Negro as an inferior human being, the post-Civil War substitution of Negro and poor white labor for the slave system, a bitter anti-union prejudice that pressed into its services all of the South's institutions including the church and public officials, a second-class educational system that still is taking its toll of southern progress.

What more striking commentary on the South and its educational system can be made than the following:

"As much as the region has done to improve higher education, its universities are rarely rated above second-class levels. Not a single Nobel Prize winner has done his work at a southern university and none teaches there now. To staff its businesses and universities with talent of the highest rank, the South must send many of its sons outside to win scientific, engineering and doctorate degrees and then try to lure them back."

BUT IT IS IN its still current attitude toward labor and labor organization that the South is crippling itself. "When one comes to consider the status of the worker and his job, the South conventionally remains the home of non-union labor, the differential wage, racial discrimination and the lower standard of living," writes Prof. Rupert B. Vance of the University of North Carolina.

Promoters of industry in the South still cling to the fetishes of cheap, docile and anti-union labor, though they have stepped up vocational training in recognition of the need for more skilled workers. Most of them are still blindly anti-union, notably in the textile field.

"Labor in the South" makes for highly important reading both for union members and their unions. It makes for particularly important reading for the responsible leadership of the South and the northern industrialists who flee to the South for cheap non-union labor. If the South is really to enter into the mainstream of modern American life, it will clearly have to forget the myths of its too often tragic and self-defeating history.

In this struggle, the role of trade unionism is clearly of prime importance. As the Monthly Labor Review's leading article concludes:

"When southern labor comes of age, the term New South will also reach maturity."

RECRUITMENT of fire fighters is seriously hampered in many communities by lagging pay scales and growing on-the-job dangers, Pres. William D. Buck (center) of the Fire Fighters, said on Labor News Conference, aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on Mutual Radio. Questioning him were Stanley Levey (left) of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Alan Adams of Business Week magazine.

New Institute Formed to Aid Labor in Asia

Formation of a non-profit corporation to promote free trade union activity in Asia was announced by the AFL-CIO.

Chartered as the Asian-American Free Labor Institute, Inc., the labor group has launched a person-to-person emergency aid effort to provide food, clothing and bedding to trade union families dislocated by the Viet Cong's Lunar New Year offensive in South Viet Nam.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council granted an initial $35,000 for the emergency aid, and earmarked a $10.000 labor contribution to CARE for relief supplies. The Confederation of Vietnamese Workers (CVT) will administer the CARE relief program.

The federation said long-range programs in education, housing, vocational training, health and cooperatives for South Vietnamese labor will be implemented through a general agreement between the AAFLI and the Agency for Intl. Development (AID).

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany directed establishment of the institute in mid-January. The federation's Executive Council ratified that decision at its February meeting. Thereafter, Fernand Audie of the Retail Clerks was sent to Saigon to develop a coordinated program of assistance with the CVT. Accompanying him was Irving Brown, executive director of the African-American Labor Center, the AFL-CIO regional organization serving the African continent.

Meany was named president of the corporation and AFL-CIO Vice Pres. James A. Suffridge, secretary-treasurer. Other members of the institute's board of directors are AFL-CIO Vice Presidents I. W. Abel, Joseph A. Beirne, Joseph Curran, David Dubinsky, Karl F. Feller, Paul Hall, George M. Harrison, Paul Jennings, Joseph D. Keenan, A. Philip Randolph and Richard Walsh.

CITATION for "outstanding service" on behalf of the U.S. merchant marine was presented to Marine & Shipbuilding Workers' Pres. John J. Grogan (left) by John M. Thurman, president of the Propeller Club's Washington, D. C., branch. IUMSWA Vice Pres. Andrew A. Pettis (right) participated in the luncheon ceremonies honoring Grogan.

Grogan Cites Danger In 'Weak' Cargo Fleet

The nation's defense and its economy "are in grave danger because of the weakness" of the U.S. merchant marine, Pres. John J. Grogan of the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers warned a luncheon in Washington given in his honor.

Survival and revitalization of the merchant fleet, Grogan said, depend upon labor and management in the maritime industry finding "a common ground for coordinating our talents and policies."

The luncheon, attended by leaders in government, labor and the maritime industry, was given by The Propeller Club of Washington to honor Grogan's "outstanding" contributions on behalf of the maritime industry.

The Propeller Club, with membership in 50 chapters in ports around the world, is composed of union, management and government officials with an interest in maritime policies.

In his prepared text, Grogan pointed out that the U.S. merchant fleet is old—more than 80 percent of it over 20 years old—and carries only 7.3 percent of the nation's international trade.

Between 1951 and 1965, he noted, the active U.S. fleet "dwindled" from 1,955 ships of 22.4 million deadweight tons to 1,000 ships of 15.5 million tons. The U.S., he said, dropped from first to sixth place as a maritime nation.

By contrast, he continued, Russia's merchant fleet grew from 560 ships of 2.6 million tons to 1,250 ships of 9 million tons over the same 14 years—and the Soviet Union during that period advanced from 21st to seventh place as a maritime nation.

Soviet Strategy

The U.S.S.R. is well aware of the decline in the U.S. merchant marine, Grogan said, and plans to enlarge its own fleet so as to spread Communism and at the same time crack our policy of "containing" it.

"The burgeoning Soviet merchant marine," he declared, "is providing Russia with a weapon which is at the same time military, political, economic and psychological."

Estimating that the U.S. fleet, as small as it is, accounts for 1 billion dollars a year "in helping to wipe out the balance of payments deficit," Grogan said: "A strong, modern merchant marine could go a long way to help wipe out the entire deficit."

In Three Vital Areas:

Health Service Act Expansion Backed

Enactment of an Administration bill to strengthen the Public Health Service Act will demonstrate "federal support of health programs to the highest degree," the AFL-CIO told Congress.

Legislative Rep. Clinton M. Fair testified in support of the measure before a House Public Health subcommittee. He was accompanied by Richard Shoemaker, assistant director of the federation's Dept. of Social Security.

The bill has been introduced by Rep. Harley O. Staggers (D-W. Va.), chairman of the House Interstate Commerce Committee. It would amend the act, which includes a wide range of health service programs, in three areas:

- Extend for another two years the six-year-old Migrant Health Program which provides grants for health assistance to migrant farm workers. The bill calls for an appropriation of $9 million for this purpose in fiscal 1969.
- Enlarge the Regional Medical Program started in 1966, which allots funds for cooperative plans involving the federal government and the medical profession, medical colleges and other health institutions.

These arrangements are directed specifically to finding ways to reduce the toll of death and disability from heart disease, cancer, stroke and related illnesses. The legislation calls for a $65 million appropriation for this program in fiscal 1969.

- Authorize a two-year grant program for building, staffing and operating facilities for preventing and treating alcoholism and addiction to narcotics. Funds will be appropriated as deemed necessary.

Extension of the migrant health program, Fair said, "will bring better health to some of the nation's one million migrant farm workers and bring us close to the day when we have corrected what has been called 'America's shame.'"

He cited figures to show that among migrant farm workers the accident mortality rate, the infectious-disease mortality rate and the infant mortality rate greatly exceed the national averages.

Describing unsanitary and unsafe working and living conditions besetting migratory workers, Fair ticked off a list of "obstacles" that prevent them from getting adequate health care—poverty, lack of knowledge, isolation and fear of non-acceptance in the community.

The AFL-CIO not only supports the proposed extension of the Migrant Health Program, it also "strongly recommends" that the $9 million authorization for 1969 be "substantially increased," Fair testified.

In supporting the bill's provisions to enlarge the Regional Medical Program, he noted that it "strikes at the cause of death for seven out of 10 Americans."

He recalled that the recent President's Commission on Heart Disease, Cancer and Stroke reported that each of these disease is taking "a severe toll in human suffering" and reducing the strength of the nation.

Expressing support for the program to treat and prevent alcoholism and narcotics addiction, Fair viewed the legislation as a "model" that states might use in developing similar programs.

He pointed out that it includes "incentives and assistance from which each state can benefit in assuring that the medical needs of its citizens are met."

Court Upholds NLRB On Insurance Agents

The Supreme Court upheld a National Labor Relations Board finding that "debit agents" of the United Insurance Co. of America are employes rather than independent contractors, and laid down a set of principles to guide the courts and the NLRB in similar cases.

The court by a 7-0 vote, with Justices William J. Brennan and Thurgood Marshall not participating, reversed a ruling by the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Chicago, that the agents were independent contractors.

The justices ordered the appeals court to enforce an order requiring United to bargain with the Insurance Workers for 700 agents in the company's Maryland and Pennsylvania offices.

IWIU Pres. William A. Gillen said the decision was a "critical" one for the union in the sense that a contrary finding would have been highly damaging. But most of the insurance industry already bargains with the union for debit agents and has done so for several years, Gillen said.

IWIU first won an election among United agents in 1956 but the company refused to bargain and the 7th Circuit upheld its position without challenge from the NLRB. Later United bought a company the union had previously organized and, when the same appeals court refused to uphold an NLRB order that the company should start bargaining, the labor board went to the Supreme Court.

Justice Hugo Black wrote for the Supreme Court that there is no "shorthand formula or magic phrase" that can be applied in such cases, but that the NLRB made a choice between two fairly conflicting views and the appeals court erred in refusing to enforce its order.

Decisive factors in such cases, Black wrote, are these: the agents do not operate their own independent businesses, but do work that is an essential part of the company's normal operations; they are trained by company supervisors, do business in the company's name with company guidance, sell only company policies, follow rules made by the company and are covered by company vacation, insurance and pension plans.

Black said that probably the best summation of the agents' relationship with United was given by the company's board chairman in a letter to agents saying "if any agent believes he has power to make his own rules and plan of handling the company's business, then that agent should hand in his resignation at once.

The letter declared company officials have "managed for over 45 years very successfully . . . and we will not allow anyone to interfere with us and our successful plan."

WILBUR J. COHEN

Cohen, New HEW Chief, To Get AFL-CIO Award

Wilbur J. Cohen, the AFL-CIO's choice for the 1968 Philip Murray-William Green Award, has been appointed Secretary of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare by Pres. Johnson.

Cohen, who is largely responsible for medicare as well as a mountain of other social legislation, succeeded John W. Gardner. He had been Gardner's under secretary.

The new cabinet member will receive the Murray-Green Award at a dinner April 25 that will highlight the 13th annual AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said the federation's Executive Council chose Cohen "in recognition of his outstanding contributions to the health and welfare of the American people through his fruitful efforts on behalf of medicare, the extension of the social security laws and other legislation."

The Murray-Green Award was established by the AFL-CIO Executive Council in 1956. It is presented each year to individuals and organizations whose achievements in the general area of health and welfare have caused others to work for the common good.

Green was president of the former American Federation of Labor. Murray was president of the former Congress of Industrial Organizations.

Cohen had served as under secretary of HEW since June 1, 1965. He was previously assistant secretary for legislation, a post he was appointed to by Pres. Kennedy.

As an assistant secretary, he was responsible for coordinating 65 legislative proposals—including medicare—which became law. He gained further legislative successes as Gardner's under secretary.

Cohen is on leave as professor of public welfare administration from the University of Michigan, where he taught from 1956 to 1961. He chaired Pres. Kennedy's Task Force on Health and Social Security in 1960 which recommended medicare and other health and social security proposals.

The Murray-Green Award evolved from the Philip Murray Award which was established in 1947 and was presented to Gen. Omar N. Bradley.

The late Eleanor Roosevelt accepted the first Murray-Green Award. It has since been presented to Herbert H. Lehman, Dr. Jonas E. Salk, Bob Hope, former Pres. Truman, Mrs. Agnes E. Meyer, Luis Munoz Marin, Gen. Alfred M. Gruenther, Sen. Estes Kefauver, Henry J. Kaiser, Mr. and Mrs. Sargent Shriver and, last year, Dr. Albert B. Sabin.

Labor Asks Improvements In Pension Protection Bill

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to pass legislation to assure that workers covered by pension and welfare plans "actually receive the benefits to which they are entitled."

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller endorsed the intent of an Administration bill to provide stronger fiscal regulation of pension funds. But he told a House Labor subcommittee that a number of changes are needed if the legislation is to accomplish its goal.

Biemiller stressed that money set aside for pension-welfare benefits is not a "gift" from the employer. Rather it is "a part of the collective bargaining package . . . accepted in lieu of wages."

The Administration bill would rewrite the 1958 Welfare & Pension Plans Disclosure Act to require that trustees and administrators of the estimated $100 billion in pension fund assets be obligated to meet standards of "fiduciary responsibility."

There have been cases of employers using assets of pension funds to buy up control of companies, lending money on favorable terms to the company or its officers, and even buying stock at high prices from the officers of the corporation.

Biemiller said the AFL-CIO favors a uniform federal law to protect against breach of trust by pension administrators, which would take precedence over any state laws.

He urged that the Administration bill be expanded to provide minimum funding and vesting standards for all single-employer pension plans and proposed a national insurance system for all plans, to assure that no worker loses benefits because an employer goes out of business or defaults on payments.

As a minimum, Biemiller said, single-employer plans should provide vesting of benefits for workers with 10 years of service who leave before reaching retirement age. Employer contributions to the plan should be high enough to achieve full funding within 30 years.

These provisions are not needed in multi-employer, industrywide pension plans, Biemiller said, because the bankruptcy of a single employer will not drain the industry fund and a worker who changes his employer within the industry retains his pension credits.

A national insurance program, he suggested, could be established with a premium rate of less than one-tenth of 1 percent of the unfunded liability of each plan—an inexpensive but important safeguard.

While asking that the legislation be broadened in these areas, Biemiller said some of the provisions of the Administration bill are either unnecessary or undesirable.

He agreed with the concept that a worker covered by a plan should have the right to sue in federal court if the law is violated. But he said the law should be worded so as to avoid "nuisance suits." Likewise, he said, only the secretary of labor should be empowered to bring action to remove a trustee or administrator, "and then only on the basis of a specific complaint supported by reasonable cause."

Unions Harassed

Biemiller noted strong union objections to the type of "fishing expeditions" the Labor Dept. has sometimes engaged in under the Landrum-Griffin Act, where "with no substantive basis, honest union officials were harassed to no purpose."

He urged that the Labor Dept.'s authority to investigate possible violations "be limited to cases where there is reasonable cause to believe that violations are in fact taking place."

Biemiller also said the bill's provision barring persons convicted of various crimes from holding office in pension and welfare plans should be limited to crimes involving money and trust. As written, he noted, it could be interpreted to bar persons convicted of offenses stemming from legitimate union activities, such as strikes and picketing.

The principle governing use of pension funds, Biemiller suggested, should be "that no loan be made that might be adverse to the interest of the fund." But there should be no bar on an "adequately secured" loan or mortgage for such purposes as a housing project or a union health center.

Stressing labor's desire for meaningful safeguards to workers' pensions, Biemiller said the amendments sought by the AFL-CIO "are not offered to weaken the law, but to make it more equitable and more workable."

'Surplus' Rail Fireman Cited for Rescue of Tot

A 34-year-old railroad fireman—once removed from his job as unnecessary—received the annual safety award of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen for rescuing a 4-year-old boy from the path of a moving train.

The BLF&E award was presented to Hamdey J. Alley of Chicago, a Grand Trunk Western Railroad fireman, at a dinner in Washington attended by more than 400 leaders in government, labor and railroad management.

As the tenth annual award winner, Alley received a check for $500. His name will be engraved with those of past winners on the D. B. Robertson trophy, a silver replica of a diesel locomotive, named after a former BLF&E president.

BLF&E Pres. H. E. Gilbert and Sen. Gale W. McGee (D-Wyo.) were main speakers at the award ceremony. Guests included Mrs. Darlen Arlowe of Chicago and her son, James, the youngster rescued by Alley last Oct. 14.

Alley was the fireman on a freight train when he and his engineer, Joseph Eichstaedt, saw the boy ahead on the tracks, apparently frozen there in fear. While Eichstaedt applied the brakes, Alley jumped from the diesel, ran ahead, and scooped the boy from the path of the slowing but moving train.

In accepting the award, Alley recalled that he was separated from his job under the compulsory arbitration award in 1963, which allowed railroads to eliminate firemen. Fourteen months later he was rehired when GTW found it needed additional firemen.

"In 1963 I used to pick up the paper and see how much I wasn't needed. I guess I was one of those referred to as a featherbedder," Alley said, adding, "I'm only glad I could prove that I was needed."

McGee cited statistics to show a "deterioration" in safety on railroads: train accidents increased from 650 in 1966 to 762 in 1967, deaths from these accidents rose from 33 to 44 and employes injured on duty increased from 1,490 to 1,611.

He urged Congress to enact a bill sponsored by himself and Rep. John Moss (D-Calif.) to empower the secretary of transportation to issue and enforce new safety regulations on the railroads. The bill is backed by the Railway Labor Executives' Association.

Forest Miller Named Jobless Insurance Chief

Forest L. Miller has been named director of the Unemployment Insurance Service by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz. He succeeds William U. Norwood, Jr., recently appointed regional manpower director in Atlanta, Ga.

Miller, deputy director of the service since 1954, is a government career officer with 35 years experience in state and federal administration of employment service programs.

Election Issues Head Agenda for Auxiliaries

Legislative and political issues for 1968 head the agenda for the first national conference of the women of labor Apr. 29-May 1 in Washington.

The AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries announced the conference will be open to all AFL-CIO union auxiliaries and asked that international unions, state and local central bodies send delegates.

Speakers at sessions in the Willard Hotel will include Federation Pres. George Meany, COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan and Legislative Dir. Andrew Biemiller. Luncheon sessions will be addressed by Miss Betty Furness, assistant to the President for consumer affairs, and Mrs. Esther Peterson, assistant secretary of labor.

The scheduled program includes workshop sessions on consumer problems, with AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis as moderator; education, with a panel headed by federation Education Dir. Walter G. Davis; and panels on legislative issues and 1968 election prospects whose discussion leaders have not been determined.

The final conference session will be an executive one for officers of national and international auxiliaries at which activity programs for the pre-election period will be formulated.

The conference call was issued by Mrs. Beatrice Warwood, president; Mrs. Marcella S. Beatty, executive director, and Mrs. Novella Porter, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries.

URGENCY OF PROGRAMS to overcome hopelessness in the Negro ghettoes was stressed by speakers at National Civil Liberties Clearing House conference in Washington. Jacob Clayman, administrative director of Industrial Union Dept., (left) is chairman of the organization. AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis (standing) served as co-chairman of the conference, and Bayard Rustin, director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, was a principal speaker.

Civil Liberties Panel Warns of Race Crisis

A shared emphasis on the urgency of overcoming the nation's racial crisis emerged as the unifying theme of the annual conference of the National Civil Liberties Clearing House.

There was no "consensus" among speakers and participants in the two-day program—nor was there meant to be. The 20-year-old liberal coalition was set up to stimulate public discussion and concern, not adopt policy statements.

But in virtually all the sessions, whatever the scheduled topic, speakers probed the disturbing conclusion of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders—that America is drifting apart into a racially-divided society.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz described the commission's report as "truth that hurts," and declared: "I believe deeply that this report is right; that any weaker report would have been dangerously wrong."

But he stressed that the massive programs recommended by the commission can be achieved only if there is a national will to do so—the "essential basis" for government action.

Test of Liberalism

"The test of responsible, effective liberalism" is to bring about this change in public opinion, Wirtz stressed. (Excerpts, Page 5.)

Rep. John Conyers, Jr. (D-Mich.), whose Detroit district was torn by riots last summer, expressed concern that the nation is swinging to the right, with fear-ridden suburbanites arming themselves and police forces acquiring the armaments of armies.

The time remaining to reverse the course, Conyers warned, is growing short.

Bayard Rustin, the veteran civil rights leader and director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, saw the racial crisis as primarily an economic crisis.

Racism, he said, can be brought down to an irreducible minimum only through massive, multi-billion dollar programs to provide higher incomes.

In the decade from 1955 to 1965, Rustin said, protest was the dominant tactic of the civil rights movement because "the things that were bothering us at that time could be remedied by protest. . . . You could sit down until you got the right to eat."

But, he warned, "when billions are needed" to create the economic conditions for a just society, "marches won't get it." The need, he stressed, is "to put men in Congress who will vote for it."

Jacob Clayman, administrative director of the Industrial Union Dept., is chairman of the Civil Liberties Clearing House and co-chairmen for the conference were AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis and J. Francis Pohlhaus of the NAACP.

Army Reserve Marks 60th Year

The U.S. Army Reserve celebrates its 60th anniversary on Apr. 23 and throughout the week of Apr. 21-27. Members of AFL-CIO affiliates who are in the army reserve, will play a prominent part in many celebrations throughout the country.

Local army reserve units will mark the anniversary with parades, band concerts, open houses and other special events.

USAR is the largest of all the reserve components of the armed forces, with more than 1 million men on its ready, standby and retired rolls.

Marx Toy Pact Settles Strike, IAM Boycott

Erie, Pa.—A union boycott of toys made by the Louis Marx Co. ended with settlement of a nine-month strike by members of the Machinists.

Members of IAM Local 1520 voted 216-85 to ratify a new three-year contract and return to work.

Management originally offered wage hikes of 3.6 cents an hour over a two-year period. The final settlement provides increases of 5 percent this year, plus successive raises of 4 percent in each of the remaining two years.

The first raise, plus inequity adjustments, netted Marx workers increases of 15 to 26 cents an hour, the union said. The final raise will achieve rates ranging from $2.27 an hour for laborers to $3.90 for toolmakers.

The union also won a revamping of the incentive system, one of the major contract issues, and improvements in the hospitalization plan. Benefits were improved to cover full payment of hospital semi-private rooms for 365 days. Management also agreed to pay all costs of the $10,000 major medical insurance program.

The union credits its don't buy campaign, by the AFL-CIO Union Label & Services Trades Dept., with helping achieve a settlement.

In 'Easter Basket' Bill:

Senate Votes to End Bond Tax Loophole

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, the Senate was headed for a final vote on what has been described as an "Easter Basket" of tax legislation—all in the form of amendments to a House-passed bill to extend federal excise taxes on automobiles and telephone bills.

It included a combination of the 10 percent income tax surcharge sought by Pres. Johnson with a mandatory $6 billion slash in the President's budget which has been demanded by the congressional economy bloc as the price of a tax increase.

There was some question as to whether the major items added by the Senate—including the ending of tax exemption for industrial bonds—would survive a House-Senate conference committee. The House traditionally is jealous of its prerogative to initiate tax legislation and has balked in the past at Senate attempts to act first.

The omnibus bill on which the Senate was preparing to vote also:

- Imposed an import quota on textiles, based on the average annual imports during the 1961-66 period, unless other nations voluntarily agree to negotiated quotas.
- Repealed the "freeze" on federal aid to families with dependent children which was written into the Social Security Act last year.

The outlook for House acceptance of the Senate's open housing civil rights bill brightened with a strong push by Pres. Johnson and an endorsement by the two principal contenders for the Republican presidential nomination — Richard M. Nixon and New York Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller.

Johnson used a signing ceremony for a jury reform bill to invoke "the conscience of America" in a call "to quit fiddling and piddling" and pass the civil rights bill.

"The time for excuses has ended. The time for action is here," the President told congressional, labor, civil rights and religious leaders invited to the White House ceremony.

The Senate-passed bill is now tied up in the House Rules Committee, which is scheduled to decide on Apr. 9 whether to allow the House to vote on acceptance or rejection of the legislation. It postponed action at an earlier meeting by a one-vote margin, but supporters are hopeful that the motion will now be approved.

House Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford (Mich.) told newsmen he still wants the bill sent to conference, even though Nixon and Rockefeller both phoned him urging a vote on the Senate bill.

Ford acknowledged, however, that "some" House Republicans disagree with him, and supporters of the Senate bill report a growing number of Republican congressmen pledged to vote for bypassing a conference and approving the bill.

The jury selection bill the President signed in effect bars "blue ribbon" federal jury panels which exclude persons on economic and occupational, as well as racial grounds. It requires that juries be chosen at random from a fair cross-section of the community.

In other congressional developments:

- A House Agriculture subcommittee dropped from the Administration's poultry inspection bill a section opposed by labor and consumer groups.

Deleted was a provision which would have allowed state-inspected poultry to be sold across state lines—in effect substituting state inspection for federal inspection.

- The AFL-CIO urged a House Appropriations subcommittee to approve the full $10 million budget request to purchase land needed for the Indiana Dunes National Lakeshore.

The land cost is likely to rise sharply in the future, the federation warned, "because of large-scale speculation and rezoning."

- The House Ways & Means Committee rejected most of Pres. Johnson's request for a travel tax to reduce the drain on U.S. dollars. But it approved a 5 percent tax on airline tickets to countries outside the Western Hemisphere and voted a temporary reduction on the duty-free exemption of goods brought back by returning travelers.

RUBBER WORKERS' legislative conference hears from Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) at a luncheon session in the Senate Office Building. The union periodically brings local leaders to Washington for meetings with top officials of government.

AFL-CIO Updates Publications List

A new, revised list of AFL-CIO publications containing information on more than 60 leaflets produced by the federation is available from the AFL-CIO.

The AFL-CIO Publications List includes a brief description of each publication as well as prices in various quantities. It contains also a list of available reprints of articles from the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

The Publications List is available without cost from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 16th Street NW, Washington, D.C. 20006.

Pay-Pension Priority Urged in Bankruptcy

The Supreme Court has been urged to rule that a worker's claim for pension fund money should have the same legal priority in a bankruptcy case as his claim for unpaid wages.

Many modern unions negotiate a "package" of contract improvements that may include pension and health benefits along with wage increases an AFL-CIO brief noted. Therefore, the federation said, it is unrealistic to hold, as a high court majority did in a 1959 case, that claims for unpaid wages should have priority in bankruptcy proceedings over unpaid pension, health and welfare benefits.

The brief was filed by AFL-CIO General Counsel J. Albert Woll and his associates in a case involving Local 3, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Joint Industry Board of the Electrical Industry and Warren C. Schwartz, trustee in bankruptcy of A&S Electric Corp. of New York.

The federation said the high court's 1959 ruling in the Embassy Restaurant case has created substantial problems for unions anxious to provide secure welfare benefits for their members. It urged the court to reverse a lower court decision in the A&S Electric case based on the Embassy ruling.

The brief made these points:

- More than 78 percent of the employes covered by union contracts in 1960 had health and insurance coverage provided by employers and more than 60 percent had pension coverage.
- Many covered workers are employed in marginal businesses. When payments to pension and insurance plans are not made, plan managers must decide whether to cancel or lower benefits, or to allow a "reasonable amount of leeway" with the hope that the business may survive.
- When a delinquent employer fails, workers not only lose their jobs but also their fringe benefits.

For these reasons "and because of our firm belief that the majority opinion in Embassy Restaurant is an unwarranted departure from earlier authority, and is unsound in its reasoning," the AFL-CIO urged the court to adopt the "soundly reasoned" opinion of the dissenters in that case—Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justices Hugo L. Black and William O. Douglas.

Airline Pact Ends Impasse On Crew Size

Chicago—The Air Line Pilots and United Air Lines broke a 17-month deadlock and reached agreement on a new two-year contract that includes procedures for resolving a dispute over crew size on a new jet plane.

The previous contract had expired Jan. 1, 1967, and part of the $100-to-$500 monthly increase will be retroactive to that date.

The chief stumbling block, however, had been the issue of whether the new two-engine, 100-passenger Boeing 737 jet should have two or three pilots. The first of the 737s are scheduled to be put in service in April.

Under the agreement, all flights will carry three pilots for a six-month evaluation period. On half of them, specific flight duties will be assigned to all three pilots. On the other flights, only two of the pilots will perform assigned functions.

Results of the experiment will be evaluated by a four-man committee, two each from the union and the company. If the parties are deadlocked, three neutral members will be added to reach a decision by next Jan. 1.

The ALPA had been free to strike since Feb. 29, after having exhausted all procedures required by the Railway Labor Act. However, with the help of the National Mediation Board, negotiations continued until the settlement was reached.

New Film Explains Operations of EEOC

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has released a 7-minute, full-color film explaining its purpose and function in carrying out provisions of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

Individuals or groups interested in showing the film, "The EEOC," should submit requests to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, 1800 G Street, N.W., Washington, D. C. 20506, specifying whether they wish the English or Spanish version.

Goodyear Tire Ordered to End Benefits Bias

The National Labor Relations Board ordered Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. to rewrite pension and insurance plans that discriminate against salaried employes who join a union.

The order upheld a charge by the Rubber Workers that Goodyear maintains discriminatory retirement, annuity and insurance plans and a year ago threatened 30 nurses at six company hospitals in Akron, O., that they would be excluded from the plans if they joined the union.

The board ordered Goodyear to stop threatening the nurses with loss of benefits if they joined a union, to stop disqualifying them from company welfare plans excluding union members, to cease questioning them about their union activities, and to amend its plan and revise its employe pension and insurance plan booklets "by striking from each the offensive language."

Price Rise Continues, Buying Power Gains

creased by five-tenths of 1 percent in February. Prices of apparel, household furnishings, and gasoline and motor oil also rose. New car costs were unchanged, used car prices dropped.

As a result of the February price increase, some 112,000 workers will receive pay boosts through union negotiated cost-of-living escalator clauses, BLS reported. For 102,000, mostly aerospace workers, the increase will be 3 cents an hour.

Wholesale Index Up

BLS also reported that the February Wholesale Price Index rose seven-tenths of 1 percent to 108, up 1.9 percent from February 1967. Preliminary data pointed to a further rise of three-tenths of 1 percent in March wholesale prices.

Wholesale price increases in any month normally trigger even greater increases in retail prices in the following months, according to the trend of the past year.

Arnold Chase, who is assistant commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, predicted continuing price escalation at both the wholesale and retail level but declined to forecast just how much prices might rise.

The department's earnings report for February showed that take-home pay—gross earnings less social security and income tax deductions—averaged $85.27 a week for a single production worker and $92.85 for the worker with a wife and two children.

These after-tax earnings were up 91 cents and 96 cents respectively from January. Over the year, they were up $3.81 and $4.01.

Real spendable earnings in February, measured in 1957-59 dollars, were $71.66 for the worker with no dependents and $78.03 for the worker with three dependents, up 53 and 55 cents from January.

This influx in real spendable earnings—the largest one-month gain since July 1967—put the respective figures 70 and 64 cents above their levels in February 1967.

The gain in purchasing power was attributed mainly to a February increase in the length of the workweek and an advance in hourly earnings that more than offset the climb in living costs.

Humphrey Urged by Meany To Enter Presidential Race

Conferees Weigh Tax Package

A $6 billion cut in federal spending coupled with a 10 percent income tax surcharge was before a House-Senate conference committee as part of a heavily amended bill to extend auto and telephone excise taxes.

The Senate tied the surcharge-spending cut amendment to the excise extension measure by a 53 to 35 vote. It includes a spending ceiling for the fiscal year starting June 1, 1968, calls on the Administration to submit proposed reductions totalling $10 billion in new spending authorizations, and requires a cut in government employment by about 150,000 jobs.

Defense Exempted

Exempted from the Senate-voted spending ceiling of $180.1 billion would be costs of the Viet Nam war, interest payments and funds for veterans and social security benefits. Job cutbacks would not apply to the Defense Dept., Post Office or FBI.

The Senate, before passing the tax-spending cut amendment, rejected attempts to protect funds for education, anti-poverty, housing and manpower training. It also turned down a bid to require that cuts be made in the space program, military foreign aid and the defense budget.

The House had passed a bill to continue existing excise rates on telephone service and automobiles at 10 and 7 percent. They were due to drop to 1 and 2 percent at the end of March.

The Senate added a number of VICE PRES. HUMPHREY, urged by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to declare his candidacy for the presidency, is shown addressing COPE's 1968 Campaign Kickoff Conference in Washington.

Congress Pressed to Act:

Emergency Job Plan Called Key to Needs

The AFL-CIO and the Urban Coalition pressed for action by Congress to set up an emergency program of one million public service jobs for the nation's poor.

None of the nation's pressing domestic problems can be solved without full employment, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told a Senate Labor subcommittee.

He said labor considers "jobs at decent wages" the key to overcoming "the interrelated problems of poverty, deprivation and racial unrest."

The subcommittee is considering a bill drafted by its chairman, Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.), which would provide funds for local, state and other public service agencies to hire and train on the job 300,000 persons in the coming fiscal year, 600,000 the second year and more than a million by the third year.

Both Biemiller and Urban Coalition Chairman John W. Gardner said the need is so urgent that the million-job goal should be compressed into a shorter timetable.

Gardner, making his first congressional appearance since resigning as head of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, noted that the Urban Coalition's emergency convocation last August of 1,200 leaders from all walks of life had called for the creation of one million public jobs "at the earliest possible moment."

He praised the JOBS program launched by Pres. Johnson through the National Alliance of Businessmen to open doors in private employment for the hard-core unemployed.

"Nevertheless," Gardner stressed, "unemployment in cities, and in rural areas from which many of the urban jobless come, cannot be

Candidacy Linked To Nation's Future

By John M. Barry

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany "strongly" urged Vice Pres. Hubert Humphrey to "declare himself now as a candidate for the presidency."

In no other way, Meany said, "can the American public be assured of an effective spokesman and advocate for the programs needed to continue the social and economic progress of the past eight years and to unite the American people behind the defense of freedom and democracy in the world."

Meany's appeal to Humphrey came in a statement voicing labor's deep regret at the decision of Pres. Johnson not to seek renomination. (Text, Page 6.)

Meany cited organized labor's long support of the President and "the splendid legislative record of his Administration," declaring: "We had looked forward to the opportunity to support his candidacy. . . ."

He expressed the conviction that had the President decided to run, "the American people would have supported him, despite the unfair, unremitting, unconscionable personal attacks upon him."

He noted, however, that Johnson had withdrawn from the political race "in order that no one misread or misunderstand his actions in the pursuit of peace in the world and progress at home."

Meany called Johnson's decision as "courageous and selfless as any in the nation's political history" and said that America "therefore must and will accept it."

But while the President has "taken himself out of the race," he continued, "the vital programs and policies needed to keep Amer-

Unionists, Wirtz Ask HHH to Run

Two AFL-CIO conventions showed their enthusiastic support for Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey and told him by resolution and demonstration that they wanted him to declare as a candidate for the presidency.

Their views were underscored by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz who told one of the conventions that Humphrey is "best qualified" to succeed Lyndon Johnson as President.

The 350,000-member Operating Engineers meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla., enthusiastically adopted a resolution supporting the urging of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany that Humphrey become an announced candidate.

Wirtz, speaking at the convention, told the cheering delegates that "this is a time for choosing sides" and that "I can only hope, but hope greatly, that he (Humphrey) will give this country the chance to vote for what he stands for and what he is."

NLRB Wins Support In Conservative Attack

By Eugene A. Kelly

The National Labor Relations Board won strong support from witnesses at Senate subcommittee hearings into charges by conservative lawmakers and businessmen that it has exceeded the authority given it by Congress.

The labor law is a model of clarity compared with the laws governing agencies like the Federal Communications Commission and the Interstate Commerce Commission, one witness told a Senate Judiciary subcommittee. He was Prof. Bernard Schwartz of the New York University law school, who said of federal agencies in general: "Of course they engage in lawmaking. The statute compels them to."

A former assistant general counsel for the NLRB, when asked whether the present board decides cases according to the personal bias of its members, testified "that is exactly what the Eisenhower board did." Therefore, he said, its successors had to reverse its findings after they were overruled by the federal courts in a "fantastic" number of cases.

Four other law school teachers agreed that the NLRB must make

1-Man, 1-Vote Directive Extended to City Level

The Supreme Court has extended its one-man, one-vote doctrine to thousands of city councils and county governments.

It ruled that in local government—as in the state legislatures and the U.S. House of Representatives—election districts must be substantially equal in population.

The 5-3 decision completed the political revolution the Supreme Court set off in 1962 when it broke with past precedent and entered what an earlier court had termed the "political thicket."

That initial decision, in a Tennessee case, merely asserted the right of federal courts to judge the apportionment of a state legislature by the yardstick of the 14th Amendment's guarantee of equal protection of the law.

In subsequent decisions, the Supreme Court spelled out the requirement that both houses of a legislature be set up on one-man, one-vote population standards and said that "as nearly as is practicable, one man's vote in a congressional election is to be worth as much as another's."

The first of many cases involving apportionment of local governing bodies to reach the Supreme Court challenged the method of election of the Midland County, Tex., governing body.

Four of the five county commis-

Labor Scores Weakening of Pipeline Bill

The AFL-CIO protested "crippling amendments" by a House subcommittee in the natural gas pipeline safety bill and urged the full House Commerce Committee to "restore the bill to the form in which it was approved by the Senate."

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said the subcommittee amendments "would establish nothing more than a paper program of safety for the nation's gas pipeline."

He warned, in a letter to Committee Chairman Harley O. Staggers (D-W.Va.), that "they would weaken and impede a strong federal enforcement program, place an unworkable burden on the secretary of transportation . . . and provide inadequate funds for both the federal enforcement program and grants-in-aid to the states."

One of the subcommittee amendments, Biemiller said, "would distort the intent of the Senate bill by requiring actual inspection of all of the nation's nearly 1 million miles of gas pipelines before the secretary of transportation could make a determination of all the areas needing correction to make them safe."

Biemiller commented that "with the small appropriation for enforcement" in the bill, "the result would be a non-enforcement program completely nullifying the plain intent" of the legislation.

He noted also that the subcommittee "further watered down" the mild civil penalties provision of the Senate bill, enabled states to avoid federal jurisdiction over intrastate pipelines, and provided inadequate financing.

OPERATING ENGINEERS convention in Bal Harbour, Fla., was addressed by Major Alfred M. Worden (center), one of the nation's astronauts. Welcoming him are IUOE Pres. Hunter P. Wharton (right) and Sec.-Treas. Newell J. Carman.

Organizing Progress Marked in Mississippi

Jackson, Miss.—A coordinated organizing campaign started in this state late in 1966 already has achieved "remarkable success," delegates to the Mississippi AFL-CIO convention here were told.

At the same time, the three-day meeting unanimously adopted a resolution pledging to increase the drive's momentum because "many thousands of workers in the state still do not enjoy the benefits of a union."

Pres. Claude Ramsay reported at length on the organizing effort, which was approved by the 1966 convention. He told how the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organizing opened an office in Jackson and worked with union leaders in selecting organizing "targets."

Ramsay said that Robert W. Starnes, AFL-CIO assistant regional director, recently reported that unions in the state are winning representation elections at a rate of "better than two a month."

Other statistics on the campaign show that Mississippi unions organized 4,500 workers in 1967, increasing total membership by more than 7 percent. The unions won victories in 57 percent of the elections held.

"Many of these victories can be attributed directly to the coordinated effort and the fact that many jurisdictional problems between unions have been eliminated," Ramsay said.

AFL-CIO Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher, a convention speaker, congratulated labor in the state on the "great progress" it is making in organizing and said the federation "is pleased to be taking part in the effort."

"I think we really have a miracle in the labor movement . . . in our form, in what we are here for and what we are trying to do," Kircher declared.

Challenge Ahead

But, he added, the "miracle" can be sustained only if labor presses its efforts to organize the millions of workers still unorganized and continues to push for programs that benefit the entire nation.

Convention-adopted resolutions called for passage of a bill in the state legislature to establish a State Dept. of Industrial Relations, backed truth-in-lending legislation, urged unions to strengthen community service programs and pledged assistance to Mississippi State University in doveloping a newly-created industrial relations center.

The 200 delegates re-elected Ramsay, Sec.-Treas. Thomas Knight and the state's five vice presidents: James Jackson, Clothing Workers, Marvin Taylor, Carpenters, C. E. Shaffer, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, E. V. Edwards, Communications Workers, and H. H. Robbins, Office & Professional Employes.

All were re-elected without opposition as were 10 other members of the federation's executive board.

Convention speakers included Lieut. Gov. Charles L. Sullivan, State Supt. of Education Garvin Johnston, State Sen. E. K. Collins and former U.S. Rep. Frank Smith (D-Miss.), now a director of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

500 to Attend Parley On Community Service

The 13th annual AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services will bring some 500 delegates to Washington, D.C., Leo Perlis, AFL-CIO director of community services activities reported. The five-day conference will open April 21 in the Hotel Willard.

Central theme of the conference will be the role of community services in the labor movement—from the local to the international levels, Perlis said.

Joseph D. Keenan, secretary of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, will welcome the delegates and guests and outline the purposes of the conference.

Joseph A. Beirne, AFL-CIO Community Services Committee chairman and president of the Communications Workers, will address the delegates at a luncheon April 23.

Perlis said the conference will be keyed to showing how community service dovetails with the trade union activities in organizing, public relations, political action, education and other areas on the local, state and national scenes.

Ten workshops will be conducted, and evening sessions are scheduled on asthmatic and allergic diseases, summer youth employment and first aid.

The conference will be highlighted with the presentation of the Philip Murray-William Green Award to Wilbur J. Cohen, recently named Secretary of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare by Pres. Johnson.

Cohen is being cited "for his notable contributions to the health and welfare of all Americans, including his successful efforts toward passage of medicare."

Rail Unionist Cited for Aid In Viet Battle

A railroad union official now serving as a U.S. labor adviser in Viet Nam has received a citation from the Army for service under fire during the recent Communist attack in Saigon.

He is A. W. Bonnano, on leave as a general chairman for the unaffiliated Conductors & Brakemen on the New York, Susquehannah & Western Railroad.

According to a report received in Washington, Bonnano joined in helping the 716th Military Police Battalion after one of its patrols rescued him at his home in the Cholon district, which was virtually surrounded by Vietcong guerrillas.

The railman participated in patrols to rescue other residents of the area and helped in carrying cases of claymore mines and boxes of grenades away from the danger of enemy fire.

A "certificate of excellence" awarded by the battalion praised Bonnano for "an exceptional degree of proficiency and devotion to duty in support of military police operations" and for providing assistance during a "critical period."

Warns Against Complacency:

Wharton Challenges IUOE to Meet Future

By David L. Perlman

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Delegates to the largest convention in the history of the Operating Engineers were told that their union is strong, prosperous and growing—and were warned to shun complacency and "face up to the challenge of change."

Pres. Hunter P. Wharton said in his keynote speech that the union faces a bright future in jobs and wage scales because of the increasingly sophisticated technology in the construction field and in industries where IUOE members work.

"We are turning out new journeymen from our apprentice program" to fill these jobs, Wharton reported. But, he challenged the delegates, "are we turning out good union members" or a certificate of competency? "We must get our new members to know why they are members, why there is a union, and what the union means to them," Wharton stressed.

He spoke angrily of those who seek "to use the big club on the building trades unions" and impose rigid racial quotas. But he spoke proudly of the union's nondiscrimination practices and of what it has done to enlarge opportunities for Negroes and other minority groups.

"We will continue our efforts to aid the less fortunate and minority groups so that they may enjoy the fruits of our economy for the best interests of justice and for the welfare of our country," he pledged.

The 828 delegates represented 350,000 active members, a gain of nearly 50,000 since the last convention four years ago.

Speakers Heard

A broad range of speakers addressed the delegates during the first two days of the convention.

There were "trade talk" speeches by top officials of contractors' association. And there was an address by the president of Fordham University, the Rev. Leo McLaughlin.

"In different ways, using different tools," the Fordham president said, "labor unions and the universities have attempted to achieve goals which are so similar that they may almost be called identical." Both groups, he said, are dedicated "to the idea that every man has a right to higher education."

Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.) evoked vigorous applause from the delegates by declaring that Pres. Johnson will go down in history as a man who achieved the great things for America and sacrificed personal aspirations "in the interest of his country."

There were trade union speeches from Metal Trades Dept. Pres. B. A. Gritta and Joseph Lewis, secretary-treasurer of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. And there was something new for a union convention—an illustrated talk on America's space program by an astronaut who is currently training for a manned space flight—Maj. Alfred M. Worden.

The IUOE's strong concern for on-the-job safety was demonstrated in the first resolutions brought to the convention floor.

Pipeline Bill Supported

Delegates unanimously approved a resolution calling on the House to approve the Senate-passed pipeline safety bill and warning of "the potential for tremendous accidents and tragedies" in the industry.

The convention urged its locals to affiliate with the National Safety Council. Wharton is the council's past vice president for labor and is a trustee and board member.

A political action resolution expressed strong support for COPE and the union's own political education program. The 1968 elections will present a clear choice between liberalism and reaction," the resolution stressed.

Also adopted unanimously was a resolution affirming labor's support of the nation's commitment in Viet Nam and of "the Administration in its efforts to bring a just and honorable peace to the people of Viet Nam."

Wharton Re-elected

Wharton was re-elected by acclamation to his second full four-year term as president. Also elected unanimously were Sec.-Treas. Newell J. Carmen, nine incumbent vice presidents, and Peter W. Weber of New Jersey, who succeeds retiring 10th Vice Pres. Eugene M. Reardon, Sr.

Earlier, the delegates unanimously suspended—at least until 1972—a section of the constitution which would have compelled a change of presidents at mid-term through a provision for mandatory retirement at age 70.

Salaries of all officers were raised—from $55,000 to $75,000 for the president, from $42,500 to $60,000 for the secretary-treasurer, and from $15,000 to $20,000 for the general vice presidents. The salary of the executive vice president, Richard H. Nolan, continues to be set by the president.

Glass Union Wins Pact Covering Skilled Jobs

Atlantic City—The Glass Bottle Blowers extended a strike deadline just long enough to win a package of benefits for 10,000 skilled workers that union Pres. Lee W. Minton called "the best ever negotiated" in the industry.

Minton had extended the contract on a day-to-day basis starting Mar. 1, with a 72-hour notice set to expire Apr. 2. Negotiators for GBBA and 20 employers voted another eight-hour extension, during which agreement was reached.

A union conference committee approved the new 35-month pact by a vote of 43-41. The value of the agreement was put by both sides at from $1.09 to $1.19 an hour.

Machine operators and upkeep men in the forming departments of 101 plants will get wage increases of no less than 30 cents an hour the first year, plus two additional 4 percent raises at the start of the second and third years. All other groups of workers get at least 20 cents an hour this year, and two 4 percent raises at yearly intervals.

The pact also provides the same fringe benefits won for 32,000 production workers in a recent settlement with 17 East Coast employers. They include full pension rights at 62, a raise in pension benefits from $3 a month to $4 for each year of credited service, and a wage equalization program which was a key union goal in 1968 negotiations.

The top rate in the third year of the new pact will be $3.905 an hour, the union said.

Meany Urges Humphrey to Enter Race

Sees Candidacy Vital To Carry On Gains

ica moving forward at home, while fulfilling its responsibilities abroad, cannot and must not be taken out of the race.

"The people of this country . . . must have a genuine choice and a real opportunity to support those programs and objectives in the months ahead. . . . The American people must not be left with a choice only among candidates who themselves have symbolized the discord and disunity the President's action sought to eliminate.

"To insure that the issues will be fairly stated and the record adequately presented, defended and advocated there must be a presidential candidate as dedicated as the President himself to progress at home and freedom in the world, but who likewise places the welfare of the whole nation first and foremost.

"We, therefore, strongly urge that Vice Pres. Hubert Humphrey declare himself now as a candidate for the presidency. . . ."

Johnson's decision to withdraw from the campaign and devote his full attention to the search for peace was announced in a nationwide television broadcast, Sunday evening, Mar. 31.

'Historic' Campaign

It was the latest and most stunning in a series of political surprises that have already stamped the 1968 campaign as historic. These have included the withdrawal of Michigan Gov. George Romney before the first Republican primary in New Hampshire, the strong showing of Minnesota Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy in that state's Democratic primary, the entrance of New York Sen. Robert F. Kennedy in the presidential contest, and the refusal of New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller to actively seek the Republican nomination.

The President's action propelled Humphrey to the forefront among the presidential prospects, but the Vice President refrained from an immediate announcement of his candidacy. He said he would take the time needed to give the matter full consideration, but added to reporters: "I'm as interested in this as you are."

Earlier, Humphrey had called Johnson's decision "a very sad moment for me." Serving with the President, he said, "has been one of the great privileges of my life. . . . As time passes, people will come to recognize his very singular achievements."

Kennedy said the President's action reflected "both courage and generosity of spirit," and McCarthy called it a "generous judgment" which he viewed as a "personally sad and difficult moment for a man who has given so many years to the service of his country."

On the Republican side, Nixon, too, applauded the President's decision and said he would refrain from discussing the Viet Nam war in his campaign appearances for two or three weeks to "avoid anything that might, even inadvertently, cause difficulty for our negotiations."

Johnson's action also prompted Rockefeller's supporters to step up pressure on the New York governor to reconsider his withdrawal from the contest for the Republican nomination.

The President held meetings at the White House with both Kennedy and Humphrey two days after his announcement. In it he had served notice that he would not "devote an hour or a day of my time to any personal partisan causes or to any duties other than the awesome duties of this office. . . ."

Kennedy and McCarthy, the only two declared candidates for the Democratic nomination, promptly scrambled to woo Johnson supporters and convention delegates previously committed to the President. Humphrey backers sought to guard against a wholesale shift to one or the other.

Johnson's political decision nearly overshadowed the announcement that he was ordering a "de-escalation" of the fighting in Viet Nam by curtailing bombing of the North in the hope this would encourage Hanoi to come to the negotiating table.

North Viet Nam, after first denouncing Johnson's move as a "perfidious trick," said nevertheless that it was willing to make contact with U.S. representatives to discuss the conditions for negotiations.

COPE Conference

Two days before the President's historic broadcast, he addressed the AFL-CIO COPE 1968 Campaign Kickoff Conference, reviewing the record of his Administration in achieving such social advances as medicare, federal aid to education, civil rights protections and expanding the federal minimum wage.

Concluding his speech to the COPE delegates, Johnson declared:

"We are going to finish the work that we have started—the work of building a better, a more prosperous and a more peaceful country. That will not be two Americas; that will be one America. . . .

"We are going to be a united people. We are going to do what we must do at home—and we will, while we are doing that, fulfill every responsibility that America has in the world in which we live."

PRES. JOHNSON
"I shall not seek and I will not accept the nomination. . . ."

ALL MAJOR television networks covered AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's announcement expressing deep regret at Pres. Johnson's decision not to seek re-nomination and urging Vice Pres. Humphrey to become a candidate to continue "social and economic progress" and unite the nation in defense of "freedom and democracy in the world."

McCarthy, Nixon Win Heavy Votes, Inconclusive Victories in Wisconsin

Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy of Minnesota and Richard M. Nixon claimed major victories in the Wisconsin presidential primary election, but the big vote totals both received against "non-candidates" appeared less than conclusive.

In the Democratic primary, McCarthy drew 406,098 votes, or 57.6 percent of the total, against 249,518, or 35.4 percent, for Pres. Johnson. The President easily carried the two congressional districts comprising the city of Milwaukee.

Nixon received 385,052 votes, more than 81 percent of the Republican total. California Gov. Ronald Reagan, who did not campaign, received 51,574, just under 11 percent, and perennial candidate Harold Stassen drew 28,453, or six percent.

These were the only candidates on the Wisconsin ballots, and two days before the election Pres. Johnson pulled out of contention with his announcement that he would neither seek nor accept his party's nomination.

Nevertheless, the unexpectedly large vote given the President in these circumstances took the edge off the McCarthy victory. It was uncertain, too, how much of the Minnesota senator's total came from Republican crossovers, which are permitted in Wisconsin. New York Sen. Robert F. Kennedy, who had announced his candidacy too late to enter the Wisconsin primary, had urged his supporters to cast their votes for McCarthy. But 43,207 of them, 6 percent of the total vote, refused to do so and wrote in Kennedy's name. Write-ins for Vice Pres. Humphrey and former Alabama Gov. George C. Wallace totaled about five-tenths of 1 percent each.

Nixon's Republican percentage, on a par with his victory in New Hampshire last month, again was achieved in the absence of active opposition. Although he received more than 81 percent of the Republican total, his vote fell short of the total for McCarthy in achieving 57 percent on the Democratic vote.

Write-ins on the Republican side amounted to 1.5 percent for New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller and three-tenths of 1 percent for Wallace.

Nixon won all 30 of the state's delegate votes at the Republican national convention next August. McCarthy captured 52 of the 60 Democratic convention votes, the remaining eight going to Pres. Johnson on the strength of the Milwaukee support for him in areas of heavy concentrations of Negro and labor voters.

In Madison, the state capital, an anti-war resolution calling for withdrawal of U.S. troops from Viet Nam was defeated 58 percent to 42 percent. Organized labor in the city had vigorously opposed the resolution.

The next major presidential primary in Indiana, May 7, will be the first to pit McCarthy and Kennedy in a head-to-head contest. But following Johnson's withdrawal, Indiana Democratic leaders began a strong drive to commit the state's 63-vote convention delegation to the favorite-son candidacy of Gov. Roger D. Branigin. Before the President's announcement, Branigin was running as a stand-in for Johnson.

Conventions, Wirtz Join In Appeal to Humphrey

In Pittsburgh 2,500 persons at the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO convention staged a four-minute dancing, shouting demonstration as Humphrey entered the hall for a 50-minute address that was interrupted by applause at least 50 times.

The Vice President did not touch on his political plans for 1968 but told the delegates "we've been together a long time and if we stick together a little longer, we'll be together a lot longer."

He said a decision on his candidacy will come in "due time," that he will do nothing at this moment that would hinder the President's peace efforts. "I call upon all Americans regardless of party or persuasion to stand together now in unity behind the President in our national quest for peace."

Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel told Humphrey at the end of his speech that "I concur completely" with the statement by Meany urging Humphrey's candidacy. Abel said that while he was disappointed that the Vice President did not get into the race in Pittsburgh, he could understand Humphrey's position in light of the President's trip to Honolulu on the Viet Nam situation.

Humphrey told the convention, representing 1.2 million AFL-CIO members, he was "very grateful" for Meany's statement and said it is a great honor to have his support.

The Operating Engineers' resolution said of Humphrey: "We believe that by responding he will furnish the people of our country a real and significant opportunity to judge with intelligence, not emotion or hysteria, that candidate who is best qualified to occupy the great office of President of the United States."

Wirtz spoke of the effective liberalism of Woodrow Wilson, Franklin D. Roosevelt, Harry S. Truman, Adlai Stevenson, John F. Kennedy and Lyndon Baines Johnson. It is necessary now, he noted, "to have a change of the stewardship of that tradition but not in the tradition itself."

He said: "The one best qualified steward of this authentic tradition of 20th Century effective liberalism —for he has helped shape it by deed as well as words, with magnificent independence when that was needed and by unswerving loyalty when that was the assignment his country gave him—is, for me, Vice Pres. Hubert Humphrey."

Macy's Workers Get 2-Year Pact

New York, N.Y.—A two-year contract providing wage increases of $11 a week for 8,000 employes of Macy's stores was ratified by members of Local 1-S, Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

The settlement, reached just in time to head off a strike, provides general wage increases of $6 a week retroactive to Feb. 1 and another $5 next Feb. 1, a boost in pension benefits from $3.25 to $3.75 per month times years of service, and improvements in sick leave, hospitalization benefits, and medicare coverage for employes aged 65 and up.

ACWA Unit Starts Housing Project

Chicago — Clothing Workers' plans to build middle-income cooperative housing in the Chicago area were reported to a two-day meeting of 200 leaders of housing cooperatives and government housing officials.

Among sponsors of the Illinois Housing Cooperative Institute was the United Dwelling Foundation, established by ACWA to build cooperative housing here patterned after successful union programs in New York.

Murray H. Finley, manager of ACWA's Chicago board and head of the foundation, said it now has "completed paper work" on its first project here, Kenwood Park.

A SYMBOLIC GARBAGE CAN collects donations to support striking sanitation workers in Memphis, Tenn., represented by State, County & Municipal Workers Local 1733. The money was contributed during a rally at Mason Temple in Memphis attended by 15,000 persons. The strike, for union recognition and an initial contract, is at an impasse in its seventh week. It is receiving strong support from the city's civil rights leaders and Negro clergymen.

Meany Calls on City of Memphis To Bargain on Sanitation Pact

The city of Memphis, Tenn., was urged by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to make "a new start" toward settling a bitter seven-week strike of 1,300 sanitation workers there.

Meany said the AFL-CIO is ready "to lend its good offices in search for an honorable and mutually satisfactory agreement" to end the walkout which began Feb. 12.

In a statement on the strike, Meany stressed that the workers—members of State, County & Municipal Employes Local 1733—are seeking "the most rudimentary trade union rights."

The strike's goals of union recognition, a voluntary dues checkoff, "urgently needed" wage boosts and an "equitable" grievance system have been achieved "by hundreds of thousands of public employes in hundreds of communities," he declared.

Noting that the union "has shown itself willing to negotiate at all times," Meany pointed out that "good faith bargaining is the best way of getting a fair and satisfactory" settlement of the dispute.

By contrast to the union's position, Meany said, "It has been the reluctance of the city government to enter into negotiations that has so compounded the problems of the city and its people."

Meany deplored the fact that these issues have been "obscured" by newspaper headlines on demonstrations and violence that have occurred during the strike.

The Memphis civil rights movement and Negro clergymen have rallied solidly behind the strike and have held a number of demonstrations in support of the workers, nearly all of whom are Negroes.

On March 28, violence broke out when about 30 youthful militants not connected with the union broke away from a march to back the walkout. They looted stores and clashed with police. A 16-year-old Negro boy was killed and about 50 persons were injured.

In cases where the strike itself has received national press and television attention, union leaders contend that most of these reports "distort" the issues and do not adequately give the union's side.

An SCME statement pointed out that the reports falsely emphasize that wages are the key issue. As important as demands for "decent" wages and other benefits are, the union says, "The main issue is union recognition with a dues checkoff."

The union also charged that the "intransigency" of Memphis Mayor Henry Loeb prolonged the strike.

The mayor "refuses dues deduction even though the city has a dues checkoff agreement with the predominantly white transit union," SCME noted. All efforts of the union to compromise on the issue "have been rebuffed," it added.

Regarding wages, the SCME statement continued, the mayor insists that the most the city can offer is an 8-cent increase, effective July 1, "even though the city council has recommended a 10-cents increase immediately."

Another issue in the dispute is the union's request for a "meaningful" grievance procedure in which the local would have the right to seek resolution of grievances "with arbitration as the final step."

The mayor's answer to this, the union says, is that employes can speak to him at his weekly "open house" at City Hall.

Discrimination Charged

The SCME observed that it is natural that the strike should be tied in with civil rights since Negro employes of the city's public works department often perform the same jobs as white employes "at less pay."

"There is out-and-out discrimination in the department," the local charged.

Meanwhile, SCME Pres. Jerry Wurf has announced that the union has set a goal of raising $200,000 to meet the "increasingly critical" financial needs of the strikers and their families.

In a letter to top officers of the union's locals, Wurf and Sec.-Treas. Joseph L. Ames called for contributions to the fund and have asked them to urge "our brother AFL-CIO unions to join us in this fight."

'Electioneering' at Polls Voids NLRB Election

The National Labor Relations Board has amended its rules by deciding that prolonged conversations between voters at NLRB polling places and representatives of any party to an election will be considered grounds for voiding an election.

Reversing a 1957 rule laid down in a Houston case, the board set aside an election won in May 1967 by the unaffiliated Teamsters and ordered a new vote among employes of Milchem, Inc., at four company locations in Washington County, Missouri.

The 1957 ruling was that conversations alone at a polling place would not be cause for voiding an election.

But reconsideration of the problem convinced three NLRB members, they said, that the "potential for distraction, last-minute electioneering or pressure, and unfair advantage from prolonged conversation" with voters waiting to cast ballots "is of sufficient concern to warrant a strict rule against such conduct, without inquiry into the nature of the conversations."

In the Milchem case, the union secretary-treasurer "stood within a few feet" of workers waiting to vote and talked to them for several minutes.

In a related case, the board set aside an election won by Local 1968, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and ordered a new vote for employes of the Star Expansion Industries Corp., Mountainville, N. Y.

It held that a union business agent stood near the polls during voting hours despite three requests that he stay at least 50 feet away. The agent was "electioneering," the board ruled.

Union Wages Rise 7.5% in Canada

Ottawa, Ont. — Union contract settlements in Canada last year brought average wage increases of 15.3 cents an hour or 7.5 percent, a Federal Labor Dept. survey shows.

Since consumer prices went up 3.4 percent in 1966 and 4.5 percent in 1967, the average increase in purchasing power was about 3 percent in each year, the department said.

At Hearst Paper:

L.A. Strike Solution Sought by Mediators

Los Angeles—City-appointed mediators opened a full-scale assault on the stubborn 16-week strike-lockout at the Hearst Corporation's flagship newspaper, the Herald-Examiner, in an exploratory session Apr. 2 with leaders of 10 AFL-CIO unions.

Nothing definitive emerged from the session to indicate an early return to work of the 2,000 workers.

But there were signs Mayor Sam Yorty and his tripartite panel were diligently trying to crack the dispute, now the longest in California newspaper history.

Meanwhile, new strike problems loomed for Hearst in Seattle, where Newspaper Guild members at the Post-Intelligencer voted 112 to 16 to walk out. No date was set.

An earlier strike by ITU Mailers at San Francisco was settled last month after shutting down Hearst's Examiner and the independent Chronicle for 55 days.

Nationally-known arbitrator Lloyd H. Bailer, chairman of the Yorty panel here, said a brief meeting with Publisher George R. Hearst, Jr., last week produced nothing, but that "we intend to explore the situation further with management."

The dispute erupted last Dec. 15 when 1,100 members of the Guild and 15 members of the Machinists struck over contract improvements. Hearst promptly locked out about 600 other craftsmen, including printers, mailers, pressmen, stereotypers and paper handlers.

The Herald-Examiner, the nation's largest evening daily before the strike-lockout, has been publishing limited editions with the aid of imported professional strikebreakers and regular non-union personnel.

The mediation panel's meeting with labor was the first since its creation Mar. 16 by Yorty in response to a City Council resolution urging the move.

An influential cross-section of Southern California labor not directly involved attended the Apr. 2 session. They voiced both grave concern over continuation of the strike-lockout and determined support of the unions' position vis-a-vis imported strikebreakers and equity at the bargaining table.

Top leaders of the Retail Clerks, Building Service Employes, Auto Workers, Teamsters, and the Intl. Longshoremen's & Warehousemen's Union attended.

Bailer produced letters from officials of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service and the California Conciliation Service pledging cooperation and urging the parties to use the city panel's good offices.

Disputed Issues

At the heart of the dispute were work rules, manning, wages and fringes.

The panel was urged not to abandon its peace-seeking mission without reporting fully to the City Council and the public the nature of the deadlock, the issues involved and possible solutions.

Labor's advertising - circulation boycotts of the Herald-Examiner have cut deeply into the revenue of the paper, a substantial breadwinner for the Hearst newspaper empire.

A first-quarter survey showed that average size of the paper has slipped from nearly 75 pages daily to 46. Percentage of available space occupied by paid display advertising has dropped from 65 percent to 43 percent.

Income is now about 39 percent or pre-strike income, the survey found.

Wages, Fringes Found Highest in Union Plants

Workers in union plants receive more pay and benefits and stand a better chance of getting improvements in a given year than their counterparts in non-union plants, a Texas professor has found.

The findings emerge from a study by Vernon T. Clover, economics professor at Texas Technological College. Details are reported in the January issue of the Industrial & Labor Relations Review.

Clover analyzed Bureau of Labor Statistics surveys, taken between 1960 and 1965, in 23 industries and reported that wages averaged 18 percent higher in union than in non-union plants.

Union plants were defined as those in which a majority of workers were covered by labor-management contracts. Non-union plants were those in which none or a majority of workers were under contract.

The margin by which union wages exceeded non-union wages ranged above 20 percent in seven industries. Differences were greatest in meat packing (66 percent), structural steel (42 percent) and clay products (39 percent).

When the data were analyzed by geographical regions, it was found that union wages were higher than in non-union plants in 71 out of a total of 76 regional surveys.

Clover noted that the difference between union and non-union wages would undoubtedly be even greater if it were possible to strip out the fact that unions gains "tend to cause an increase in wages in non-union plants."

"Further evidence of the influence of unions upon wages," Clover said, was a finding that in each of seven years between 1959 and 1965 "a greater percentage of workers in union than in non-union plants received wage increases."

The differences ranged from a low of 8.2 percent in 1963, when 77.8 percent of the union employes and 69.6 of non-union workers got wage increases, to a high of 29.3 percent in 1961, when pay hikes went to 83.3 and 54 percent of the union and non-union workers, respectively.

Examining other BLS figures, Clover found that each of 11 kinds of major supplementary benefits "were improved among a greater percentage of workers in union than in non-union plants" in each of six years between 1960 and 1965.

The percentage of union workers receiving increases in four categories of benefits—holidays, vacations, pensions and health and welfare plans—was more than double the percentage of non-union workers receiving such improvements in most of the years.

The single, firm conclusion that Clover drew from his study was "that earnings and supplementary benefits in union plants are characterically higher than in non-union plants."

Labor Kicks Off '68 COPE Campaign

THE AFL-CIO kicked off the 1968 election campaign with a nuts-and-bolts conference keyed to electing labor's friends and advancing labor's program for a better America and a world living in peace and freedom.

More than 1,000 persons representing AFL-CIO national and international unions and major state labor bodies heard Federation Pres. George Meany (above) keynote the conference, outlining the great stakes involved in the elections and labor's need to mobilize all its resources for the contest.

Pres. Johnson told the conference—held two days before his speech to the nation taking himself out of the election as a candidate—that the progress of the past four years must be continued. Flanked by presidents of AFL-CIO affiliates (left), he was given a standing, shouting ovation by the conference.

Vice President Hubert H. Humphrey (below) rallied the delegates with a ringing speech on America's historic role in seeking peace and freedom throughout the world. (Excerpts, Page 7.)

The conference discussed liaison with national COPE, registration campaigns, communications, and programs to help reach all members on the issues and the candidates.

KITS OF MATERIALS for use in the 1968 election campaign were given delegates to the campaign kick-off conference as they registered at the Washington Hilton.

THE LIBERAL MARGIN IN CONGRESS was a discussion area at the conference with delegates given a rundown on how the 1966 liberal losses resulted in many key labor-supported programs being sidetracked, defeated or cut back.

THE NEED for an all-out effort by the trade union movement in the 1968 elections was stressed by National COPE Dir. Al Barkan who chaired the conference.

A Call to Humphrey

WE DEEPLY REGRET the decision of Pres. Johnson not to seek re-nomination. We have long supported the President; we have hailed the splendid legislative record of his Administration; we have respected and admired his steadfastness and courage in the defense of freedom and in the search for an honorable, durable basis for world peace and order.

Now the President has decided not to seek re-election in order that no one misread or misunderstand his actions in the pursuit of peace in the world and progress at home.

We had looked forward to the opportunity to support his candidacy as President of the United States.

We are convinced the American people would have supported him, despite the unfair, unremitting, unconscionable personal attacks upon him. No man—and certainly no President—should have been subjected to such a torrent of abuse from the press and from other politicians—including some in his own party upon whom he was entitled to rely for support, but who instead have cultivated and exploited division and disunity for their personal political advantage.

But the President has made his decision, as courageous and selfless as any in the nation's political history. America therefore must and will accept it.

The President has taken himself out of the race. But the vital programs and policies needed to keep America moving forward at home, while fulfilling its responsibilities abroad, cannot and must not be taken out of the race.

The people of this country, of all ages, races and walks of life must have a genuine choice and a real opportunity to support those programs and objectives in the months ahead, leading up to the final choice of the next President of the United States. The American people must not be left with a choice only among candidates who themselves have symbolized the discord and disunity the President's action sought to eliminate.

To insure that the issues will be fairly stated and the record adequately presented, defended and advocated there must be a presidential candidate as dedicated as the President himself to progress at home and freedom in the world but who likewise places the welfare of the whole nation first and foremost.

We, therefore, strongly urge that Vice Pres. Hubert Humphrey declare himself now as a candidate for the presidency. In no other way can the American public be assured of an effective spokesman and advocate for the programs needed to continue the social and economic progress of the past eight years and to unite the American people behind the defense of freedom and democracy in the world.

'What We Won Must Not Be Lost'

Johnson Seeks National Unity As He Decides to Step Aside

This is the section of Pres. Johnson's Mar. 31 television speech to the nation in which he announced that he would not seek re-election.

FINALLY MY FELLOW Americans let me say this:

Those to whom much is given, much is asked. I can not say—no man could say—that no more will be asked of us. Yet I believe that now— no less than when the decade began, this generation of Americans is willing to 'pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship, support any friend, oppose any foe, to assure the survival and the success of liberty.'

Since those words were spoken by John F. Kennedy the people of America have kept that compact with mankind's noblest cause. We shall continue to keep it. Yet I believe we must always be mindful of this one thing:

Whatever the trials and tests ahead, the ultimate strength of our country and our cause will lie not in powerful weapons or infinite resources or boundless wealth, but in the unity of our people.

This I believe very deeply.

Throughout my public career, I have followed the personal philosophy that I am a free man, an American, a public servant, and a member of my party—in that order, always and only. For 37 years in the service of our nation—first as congressman, as senator, as vice president, and now as your President, I have put the unity of the people first, ahead of any divisive partisanship.

In these times, as in times before, it is true that a house divided against itself—by the spirit of faction, of party, of region, of religion, of race—is a house that cannot stand.

There is a division in the American house now. There is divisiveness among us all tonight. Holding the trust that is mine—as President of all the people—I cannot disregard the peril to the progress of the American people and the hope and the prospects of peace for all peoples. I would ask all Americans, whatever their personal interest or concern, to guard against divisiveness and all of its ugly consequences.

Fifty-two months and ten days ago, in a moment of tragedy and trauma, the duties of this office fell upon me. I asked then for 'your help and God's,' that we might continue America on its course, binding up our wounds, healing our history, moving forward in new unity to clear the American agenda and to keep the American commitment for all our people.

United, we have kept that commitment, and united, we have enlarged that commitment.

Through all time to come, America will be a stronger nation, a more just society, a land of greater opportunity and fulfillment because of what we have done together in these years of unparalleled achievement.

Our reward will come in the life of freedom and peace and hope that our children will enjoy through ages ahead.

WHAT WE WON when all our people united must not now be lost in suspicion, distrust and selfishness or politics among any of our people.

Believing this as I do, I have concluded that I should not permit the Presidency to become involved in the partisan divisions that are developing in this political year. With America's sons in the field far away, with America's future under challenge here at home, with our hopes and the world's hopes for peace in the balance every day, I do not believe that I should devote an hour or a day of my time to any personal partisan causes or to any duties other than the awesome duties of this office, the Presidency of your country.

Accordingly, I shall not seek and I will not accept the nomination of my party for another term as your President.

But, let men everywhere know, however, that a strong and a confident, a vigilant America stands ready to seek an honorable peace and stands ready tonight to defend an honored cause, whatever the price, whatever the burden, whatever the sacrifice that duty may require.

Humphrey Tells COPE:

U.S. Dedicated to Winning Peace, Freedom, Social Justice

The following is excerpted from an address by Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey to the AFL-CIO COPE 1968 Campaign Kick-Off Conference in Washington. The address was made two days before Pres. Johnson announced he would not be a candidate for re-election.

THIS NATION has never sought to conquer. In victory we have been magnanimous, but we sometimes, in order to have peace, have had to fight for it.

Abraham Lincoln was as peaceful a man as ever graced this continent. Yet Abraham Lincoln had to finally resort to the generalship of Gen. Sherman, who literally ransacked, ravaged and burned his way through the South, along with Gen. Grant, whose sledgehammer blows brought unbelievable suffering and tragedy to the enemy, our own fellow Americans.

Yet that beloved Abraham Lincoln was as much a man of peace as the men of the cloth are of the Church. He loved peace, and he loved humanity.

Gen. Grant at Appomattox did not help heap scorn upon Robert E. Lee. He put his arm around him and said, "Take your horses and men and go back to your farms and villages in peace."

Now, this is the history of this country: After World War I, feeding the hungry, loaning our money, much of which was never repaid; after World War II, a hundred billion dollars in grants, millions and millions of tons of food, clothing, medical supplies. Your nation has not acted like an imperialist. We have never sought to violate the peace.

We are not aggressors. We are not murderers. We are not killers of innocent women and children. This is a nation-building nation. This is a peace-loving nation. This is a nation which has done more to promote social justice in this world than any other in the history of the world. This is a nation that seeks no territory, no conquest, no domain.

But we have learned tragically, painfully, through the loss of 50 million lives in World War II, that aggression unleashed is aggression unchecked, that the appetite of the aggressor has never been satisfied, that there is no end to what he will do.

We have learned that when you seek to obtain political objectives through the use of brute force, violence, lawlessness and aggression, that it is dangerous to everybody.

We have taken our stand in Viet Nam not for war, not for conquest. We have taken our stand in Viet Nam under the principles of the United Nations, which called upon us to resist aggression and to promote self-determination. We are there to give people a chance to develop their own lives. We are there in our own national self-interest. We are there in the terms of the security of free Asia and the free world.

I am going to say to you what I have said to every audience across America, that those in this country who say that we want peace peace, peace, and try to make it appear as if Pres. Lyndon Johnson didn't want it, if any of them can produce at any time an authoritative representative of North Viet Nam or the Viet Cong and put them at the bargaining table of peaceful negotiations, I can tell you, as the Vice President that within 24 hours the President of the United States will have somebody there to negotiate an honorable peace.

Shame on those who say that this President does not want peace. Shame on them.

We did not escalate this struggle. It was the enemy that launched the Tet offensive. Make no mistake about it. It was the enemy that burned the villages. It was the enemy that attacked the children and women and assassinated the officials. We did not seek to escalate.

NOW WE ARE GOING to get out and do a little campaigning one of these days. I just thought I would come in and get warmed up with you. I intend to see you about this country.

I have served now as your Vice President for a little over three years. I served in the Senate of the United States for 16 years. I have had the rare privilege of having your support. My whole desire is that I can continue to be worthy of it.

I want to tell you about one thing. I am not going to run, cut bait and run. I will run for office, but I am not going to run backwards.

I am not asking for any change in my contract. I am perfectly willing to renegotiate the contract on the last terms you gave me.

I want to warn you that on November of this year you are going to negotiate. We are going to negotiate. We are going to make a contract with a man who will be President of the United States, and that contract has no reopener in it, not subject to any renegotiation. It even hardly provides a good grievance procedure.

That contract that you will make on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November is a four-year contract, and when you make that contract, you are going to determine the course of this country not merely for four years, but policies will be established which will help determine the course of this country for decades.

So I want you to be prepared to look over the participants, those who are the contestants. I hope that you will take the message out to your families and to your unions and your communities and wherever you go, to tell those that you talk to, to take a good look at the record, to take a look not only at the word but the deed, to take a look not only at the promise but the performance.

Basic Reforms Sought:

Welfare System Inadequacies Probed At Labor Conferences

THE AFL-CIO'S director of social security called for "fundamental reforms" in the present welfare system to meet the needs for which it was designed.

Low payments, exclusion of "far too many poor people" who need help, red tape and "demeaning requirements" make the present system inadequate and "should not exist in a system which is intended to help the poor people in our country," said Bert Seidman on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference. He noted that the federation's Dept. of Social Security is in the midst of a series of regional conferences and workshops, designed to inform union members about recent changes in social security, welfare and poverty programs, and "get their ideas."

Seidman said that participants in conferences held so far have shown "no great disposition" to adopt such proposals as the negative income tax or guaranteed minimum income to attack poverty and welfare problems.

"They feel this is not really a proper approach —that there are just too many bugs in these apparently simple answers to very difficult problems," he reported.

"We think that what is needed is a multi-pronged approach to the problem of poverty, beginning with full employment at decent wages . . . the fullest possible use of social insurance, including adequate training, education, health and housing programs."

"PRES. JOHNSON and his Administration have been exceedingly sympathetic to the needs of the most-disadvantaged people in our country," Seidman continued, pointing out that there have been "substantial improvements in social security and health programs."

"The regressive changes in the public welfare system enacted in the last session of Congress certainly can't be laid at the door of the Johnson Administration," he declared.

Reporters questioning Seidman on the public affairs program, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Radio Network, were William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News and J. V. Reistrup of the Washington Post.

By Press Associates, Inc.

OF ALL THE MANY elements that make up the cost-of-living index, few have risen so high and so fast as the cost of medical care.

Almost every aspect of medical care costs has soared—doctor fees, dental fees, drugs, hospital services.

Several months ago the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that doctor fees have risen by almost 40 percent and hospital charges doubled in the last ten years.

In his message to Congress on health, Pres. Johnson noted that between 1965 and 1975 the cost of living is expected to rise about 20 percent. However, the cost of medical care will increase nearly 140 percent and the biggest item in this is general hospital services which are expected to jump some 250 percent.

From the White House down to the most modest home the conclusion is inescapable: unless positive action is taken—and taken mighty soon—soaring costs will push our most scientifically advanced medical care system beyond the reach of many, if not most, citizens.

For one thing, the very scarcity of beds for hospital and nursing homes is a factor in the high costs. More than one-third of existing short-term hospital beds in the United States are functionally or structurally obsolete.

It is estimated that 67,000 existing general hospitals have more than a quarter of a million beds requiring modernization or replacement.

The question is how to provide the beds, the hospital modernization and still not contribute to rising hospital costs.

THERE ARE NO simple answers, but there is currently bipartisan support in Congress to fund hospital construction and modernization through a mortgage insurance method.

In recent years most of the construction and financing has been through the Hill-Burton Act which has funneled some $2.86 billion to hospitals. It provided needed subsidization, but it also made hospitals wasteful and dependent on federal, state and local community support.

Mortgage insurance for clinics, similar to that enacted in the 1966 Model Cities Act, would be a boon to group medical programs which, many experts believe, are the greatest hope of limiting cost increases. Organized labor has helped to pioneer group medical practice.

An example of what group medical practice can accomplish was given by the National Advisory Commission on Health Manpower. It studied the Kaiser Foundation Health Plan and concluded that "the average Kaiser member obtains high quality medical care for 20 to 30 percent less than the cost of comparable care outside the plan."

Studies have shown that comprehensive, group practice prepayment plans, which more and more unions are participating in, are able to provide quality medical care with but one-half the number of non-maternity hospital days as compared with the national averages on hospital utilization.

There is nothing new in this approach. Thirty-five years ago it was recommended in the report of a government committee on the cost of medical care.

Last year a presidential commission, studying health manpower and medical care also expressed concern that most health insurance plans encourage doctors and patients to choose hospitalization, even when other less costly forms of care would be equally effective.

The commission felt that, above all, the problem of hospital charges placed no penalty on inefficient operations and made it difficult to maintain effective control over hospital costs.

Sound mortgage insurance would be a mighty boon to group plans which, even now, are experiencing such great difficulty in constructing or expanding their own hospitals.

FUNDAMENTAL REFORMS in public welfare are essential to make the system meet the needs for which it was intended, declared AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman (center), on Labor News Conference. Reporters J. V. Reistrup of the Washington Post (left) and William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News questioned him on the public service interview on Mutual Radio.

How to Buy:

'Games' Used to Distract Public From Higher Gasoline Prices

By Sidney Margolius

WHILE GASOLINE PRICES have been going up this year, car owners are having their attention distracted with games, "platformate," a "tiger in your tank," and other advertising devices.

The "tiger in your tank" is the ad slogan most loathed by the auto insurance industry. It feels it has enough troubles with Detroit's horsepower brags, without having gas companies encouraging speed.

"Platformate" is like the "big gallon." Every brand of gasoline has it. "Platformate" is merely a technical term referring to an ingredient gas used by most oil companies for at least the past 15 years. A platinum catalyst is used during this process to rearrange the molecules of gasoline. This enables the refiners to offer higher octane fuel without adding so much of the tetraethyl lead which causes trouble in some cars.

The exposure of the Shell Co.'s TV ads which compared mileage of a car using gasoline with "platformate," with one using a specially-produced blend without it have led the company to change its ads. It now says, "The good mileage you get from Super Shell doesn't depend on Platformate alone." It has "five different ingredients blended in just the right proportions to give you good mileage. . ."

Well, so do the other companies have the same or similar ingredients, including the phosphate compound which Shell calls TCP. (Shell did pioneer in this additive, which helps reduce or eliminate "wild ping." This phenomenon is caused by lead deposits on the spark plugs, which cause them to misfire.)

In fact, most brands of the same grade of gasoline are very close to each other in the chief measure of quality—the octane rating. This includes the lower-price private brands. One proof of this, in addition to testimony by gas companies before government agencies, is that they sometimes switch supplies among each other in various areas.

Some owners may pay extra for premium gas without actually needing it. Octane rating of both regular and premium has been raised over the years as car manufacturers have increased the compression ratio of their engines. Thus, today's regular grade is close to the premium or high test of a few years ago.

Your owner's manual will tell you if your car really needs premium grade. But since the octane requirement does vary even among the same model, especially as the car ages, you can try this test: When your tank is practically empty, fill it with regular grade. If you hear a ping or knock when you accelerate, you may need higher-octane fuel or an engine tune-up.

In general, keeping your car serviced and adjusted properly saves gas. So does moderate driving. You especially lose mileage over 40 mph.

YOU DON'T HAVE to spend a lot of money to stop ironing this spring. The low prices of children's garments in the preferred polyester-cotton permanent press blend are one of the few items of good news for consumers this year. Children's dresses and blouses in this blend are now available in the $3-$4 range; boys' shirts and slacks, in the $4-$5 bracket.

With food prices rising more sharply this year, threats of more picketlines and boycotts are being heard from women's groups in Denver, where the first boycotts originated two years ago, and other cities.

Some of the women report themselves disillusioned with boycotts because food prices went back up again. Instead they are planning letter-writing campaigns to congressmen. Others are considering selective boycotts.

U.S. Unions Help:

Viet Labor Centers Spur Social Reform

By Gene Klare

The author, editor of the Oregon Labor Press, has recently returned from a tour of Viet Nam and Southeast Asia.

ALONG an alley that meanders through Saigon waterfront slums is a neat stucco building that stands out in sharp contrast to the hovels surrounding it.

The one-story building houses one of the social welfare centers run by the Vietnamese Confederation of Labor (CVT).

The center provides schooling for children from kindergarten through second grade during the day; at night it is the scene of literacy classes for adults.

There is also a dispensary, where a nurse treats sores, illnesses, injuries. And a sewing class for girls, using machines donated by the German labor movement.

Within the limits of its financing, each center tries to furnish a carton of milk and a piece of bread with sugar on it to each child daily.

The CVT operates 22 social welfare centers, nine in the Saigon area—where 2.5 million people are crammed into a city built for about a third that many—and the rest in other cities and in the countryside. The cost runs about $18,000 annually, figured in U.S. currency.

"A quiet campaign . . . bringing literacy and social reform to thousands of families in Saigon and throughout the country"—is how the CVT describes its social welfare program.

The only qualification for welfare center assistance is the need for help. A good number of those who benefit from them are not members of a union.

To help offset the cost and to stress the self-help aspect of the program, a membership fee, equal to about two U.S. cents per month, is solicited from each family.

In addition to the basic skills of reading, writing and arithmetic, the principles of hygiene and sanitation are taught. All of these are important in a nation where the illiteracy rate is estimated at 40 percent and where children and adults sometimes can be seen relieving themselves on street corners and in parks.

TAN QUOC BUU, president of the CVT, explains the operation of the social welfare centers:

"Once established, a new CVT center encourages members to form teams and visit families for discussion of matters of common interest and community improvement. We leave the operations of each center entirely in the hands of its members for we believe that those living in the area know best what needs to be done.

"Our long-range social welfare goals include the elimination of social ills and the organization of community cooperatives to deal with unfair business practices; but the immediate objective is to provide basic education and medical aid. The latter is mostly in the form of first aid treatment and innoculations, although some centers provide a doctor once a week or more."

In using union members' dues to finance the centers, the CVT takes this position: "Those with stable employment and steady income have a responsibility for the well-being of their less fortunate neighbors."

Unions from throughout the world are helping CVT with its social welfare and other programs.

For example, the AFL-CIO Steelworkers last year collected some $13,000 from its members to send canned chocolate milk and other supplies for the welfare centers. The other supplies included classroom kits, sewing kits and physical education material.

Members of the AFL-CIO Machinists donated more than $7,500 to help finish construction of a center at My Tho and to erect an addition. The Auto Workers contributed $25,000 worth of pediatric medicines and equipment and the Electrical & Machine Workers have given $30,000 for various programs, one of which involves resettlement of refugees in the Cam Ranh Bay area. Soup to Nonsense:

Aunt Hattie's Birthday Again? Give Her a Gift, Not a Present

By Jane Goodsell

TO JUDGE from the attention it receives, The Gift Problem (or what to give Aunt Hattie for Easter) is one of the most perplexing concerns of our time. The smart shops, in particular, have taken the gift dilemma to heart, and their counters sparkle with Unusual and Distinctive Gift Suggestions for those difficult people — the discriminating hostess, the top bracket executive, the born-to-the-manor child. But the object of tenderest concern is the person-who-has-everything.

Gift-giving, like the graduated income tax, began on a small scale, and now look what's happened to both of them. In neither case is there much hope of turning back the tide.

In the days when gifts were called presents, we exchanged them only a few times a year. There was Christmas, of course, and birthdays and important anniversaries. On Valentine's Day, we sent each other valentines (made of paper and lace, not cashmere or leather or nylon.) On Easter, children got eggs, and if mother received a box of candy on Mother's Day, she considered herself lucky.

That was about it. Presents were things like handkerchiefs and stationery or maybe a nice pair of pinking shears. These things were recognizable as gifts only because they were wrapped in tissue paper and tied with fancy ribbons. Today, we have a special category of merchandise known as Gifts—with a big, flowery capital G.

These objects (jewelled pillboxes, monogrammed lingerie cases, vermouth atomizers, highball glasses with pictures of dancing girls who shed their clothes as the glass is drained, perfumed coat hangers, miniature playing cards) are gifts, pure and simple.

Travelers lug home souvenirs to give to the people who gave them going-away gifts. Expectant mothers toddle from stork shower to stork shower, and no bride says her I-do's without being kitchen-showered, linen-showered and bathroom-showered.

HEARTWARMING AS IT IS, this feverish exchange of gifts poses some pretty problems. Take Aunt Hattie, for instance. What in the world can you give her? A nice hair brush? Maybe she already has one. Stationery? No, you gave her that three birthdays ago. A blouse? No. She probably wears a size 40, but she'd be insulted at anything bigger than a size 16. A book? What book? Well then, what.

This is where the distinctive and unusual gift (the hand-painted felt apron, the poodle-painted soap dish, the zodiac desk calendar) saves the day. These frothy bibelots don't exactly solve the little problems of gift-giving. They rise above the problems with a gay toss of the head.

But even in the rarefied sphere of distinctive giftware, caution must be exercised. Nothing becomes old hat faster than a unique gift. If its recipient already has one—or if she's even seen one before—it is no longer amusing and original. It's just another one of those magnetized pencil deals like the one Marge gave Doris at her shower.

4 Million Covered:

'68 Bargaining Due On 800 Major Pacts

More than 800 contracts covering in excess of 4 million workers will be open this year for negotiation in major U.S. industries, including aluminum, steel, aerospace, airline, communications and men's clothing.

Many additional contracts covering smaller employe units—less than 1,000 workers each—also will come up during the year for negotiation or reopening on bread-and-butter issues, according to the March issue of the American Federationist.

The magazine, in a collective bargaining preview by Rudolph Oswald and Mitchell Sherr of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, noted that contracts between the Steelworkers and the basic steel companies for 330,000 workers expire Aug. 1. Aerospace pacts start expiring in April, and other major agreements from then through mid-December.

The authors report that an additional 4.7 million workers will get deferred wage increases this year under union contracts —2.4 million in manufacturing, 2.3 million in other areas of the economy.

Deferred increases will average 3.5 to 4 percent or 14.15 cents an hour above previous levels, the Federationist said. Workers in auto, farm and construction equipment, trucking, rubber, oil and meat packing will get raises in contracts negotiated last year. Employes in electrical manufacturing, ladies' garment and the maritime industry will get hikes negotiated in earlier years.

The auto and electrical pacts call for a 3 percent wage improvement and also provide modified cost-of-living escalator adjustments. The meat packing industry will pay 11 cents more an hour, plus adjustments for living cost changes.

The article says that machinists working for five major airlines are scheduled to get a 5 percent increase in May and a living-cost adjustment.

A 5 percent increase is due July 1 for 137,000 railroad shopcraft workers, and an additional 10 cents for skilled workers in the shops.

A raise of 15 cents an hour will go to 93,000 rubber workers, the article says, and 80,000 ladies' garment workers will get increases of $5 to $8.50 a week.

Deferred increases in the construction industry will average 4 to 4.5 percent, according to the Federationist. More than half the building tradesmen receiving deferred increases will get 25 cents an hour or more.

Last year, workers in the steel, aluminum, can and aerospace industries got deferred increases. Their contracts are up for renegotiation this year.

Wage boosts in major contracts negotiated in 1967 averaged 5.7 percent during the first contract year, the economists reported. When averaged over the full life of the contracts, however, the typical increase was 5 percent a year.

The authors compared these increases to an annual wage gain of 3.9 percent in 1966, 3.3 percent in 1965 and 3 percent in 1964. Thus wages negotiated in 1965 for a three-year term have barely kept even with rising prices, they noted.

Living costs as measured by the Consumer Price Index of the Labor Dept. rose 2.8 percent in 1967, but the increase was at a faster pace toward year's end. In 1966, living costs rose 2.9 percent; in 1965, 1.7 percent and in 1964, 1.3 percent.

Nearly 2 million of the 4.4 million workers for whom unions won wage increases in 1967 received hikes of 6 percent or more in the first year of the agreement, the Federationist said.

Workers not covered by cost of living clauses had to get an increase of at least 2.8 percent in 1967 to keep pace with price increases. Wage gains in the pay envelope were quickly diminished by higher prices—for housing, clothing, medical services and public transit, according to the review.

Elizabeth Kuck Sworn As EEOC Commissioner

Elizabeth J. Kuck, a former supervisor for personnel policies at Intl. Harvester Co. in Chicago, was sworn in as the fifth commissioner on the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission on March 15 at EEOC headquarters in Washington.

Miss Kuck, appointed by Pres. Johnson, won Senate confirmation.

5 More Cities Launch Apprentice Tutoring

AFL-CIO building trades unions in five more major cities in as many states are cooperating in new programs to recruit apprentices from minority youth groups.

New programs have started in St. Louis, Los Angeles, Pittsburgh, Columbus, Ohio, and Jacksonville, Fla., according to AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman.

The unions will work with the Urban League in four cities, and with the Opportunities Industrialization Center in Pittsburgh, he said.

The programs are conducted with the help of federal funds through the Labor Dept.'s Manpower Administration.

Youngsters will be recruited through state employment service offices, apprenticeship information centers and social service agencies, as well as civil rights groups.

AFL-CIO building trades unions have been working with the federal government and civil rights organizations in conducting the programs for three years. Known as "Apprenticeship Outreach," the programs are now operating in 26 major cities across the nation. Several more cities will be added, Slaiman said.

The tutoring concept was initiated in cooperation with the Workers Defense League in New York City. The league is now operating programs in conjunction with craft unions in six communities.

The unions are being aided in recruitment and training programs by the Urban League in 11 cities under the Labor Education Advancement Program (LEAP).

Other programs are being conducted with the help of the OIC, the Trade Union Leadership Council in Detroit and by the AFL-CIO building and construction trades councils themselves.

HISTADRUT, Israel's labor federation, has long welcomed Arabs into its membership and its cooperatives have helped to upgrade their living standards. In repelling aggression last June, Israel extended its borders and now there are more Arabs among its population. As a result, Histadrut has launched a drive to enroll new Arab workers and at the same time improve their life. These photos, taken in East Jerusalem, illustrate the effort: Top left, Arab youngsters cheer the opening of a Histadrut youth center in Um-El-Fahm. Lower left, an Arab leader speaks at its dedication ceremony. Lower right, Arab boys learn woodworking at a Histadrut center in Kafr Kara. The labor movement also has established clinics, workers' training centers and cultural centers in East Jerusalem and is providing scholarships for Arab students.

Flood of Letters Gets Message To Struck Giumarra Vineyards

Edison, Calif.— Grape grower Joseph Giumarra depends on armed guards and state police to keep 950 striking employes from entering his gates, but the strikers' message is getting through to him just the same.

The messages keep flooding in through a sort of invisible picket system—the pickets being letters mailed from every part of the nation where Giumarra grapes are sold.

AFL-CIO unions have rallied their members to support the farm workers with money and clothing as well as letters, and the federation's convention last December pledged accelerated backing for the strikers.

The letters are the latest manifestation of support from unions, church groups and civic organizations in the long struggle of the grape pickers for recognition and a union contract.

"The 10,000 Italian cloakmakers of Local 48, ILGWU, are shocked," says one from New York City garment workers, "to realize that our own beloved America is still guilty of permitting the exploitation . . . of workers.

"We are urging our members and their families not to purchase California grapes grown by the Giumarra Vineyard Corp. until . . . your company recognizes that the workers are not slaves and are entitled to the fruits of their labor."

The Rev. L. Robert Adams writes from St. Joseph's rectory, Brooklyn, N.Y., to announce that the Spanish-speaking members of St. Joseph parish have "decided to refrain from buying (your) grapes until a union contract is signed."

From the same borough, the South 3rd Street Block Association informs Giumarra "we intend to urge all . . . neighborhood associations to boycott all . . . (non-union) grapes and raisins until Giumarra signs a contract with the United Farm Workers, AFL-CIO."

Letters with similar messages have come to Giumarra from the Wisconsin State AFL-CIO, the Spanish Young Christian Movement, the Puerto Rican Community Development Project Inc., United States Youth Council, Presbytery of New York City, the Association of Catholic Trade Unionists, and hundreds of other groups representing a wide cross-section of American opinion.

The struggle in Delano, 40 miles from Edison, began almost three years ago when the union, headed by Cesar Chavez, struck the grape growers. In mid-August of 1967 the strikers launched a nationwide consumer boycott of Giumarra's principal grape labels. The union reports this sequel:

"Suddenly Giumarra flooded the market with the labels of the 30 struck growers, which were pasted on top of his own labels. The union immediately reported this to the U.S. Food & Drug Administration, the California Industrial Welfare Commission and the New York City commissioner of markets."

But "Giumarra has continued his illegal practices," the union reports. It calls the big firm "by far the largest and most repressive" of the growers who have resisted all efforts at recognition and collective bargaining.

Other growers have come to terms with the union—DiGiorgio Corp., Christian Brothers, Almaden —but not the group spearheaded by Giumarra.

When the strike began, Giumarra "obtained a strike-crippling injunction from the area's grower-dominated judiciary and replaced the strikers with scab labor imported from Mexico," the strikers report.

The result has been intensification by the union of the boycott, and its extension to all California table grapes except those grown by DiGiorgio.

Since New York is Giumarra's largest market, the union sent 50 pickets there to tell the story of the strike and boycott in their own words. When they picketed the Hunts Point terminal in the Bronx, headquarters of Victor Joseph & Son, Giumarra agent, they were "harassed, threatened and insulted," they said. Police arrested 22 pickets and a six-year-old child, later released them when the charges were dropped.

The 1967 AFL-CIO convention pledged its continued support to the farm workers. When Pres. George Meany declared "we are with you, and we are going to stay with you," Chavez told the delegates: "Your support will help us to tell every agricultural employer . . . that we are not by ourselves and that they cannot expect to break us."

Farm workers are not protected by the labor relations act. Reporting recent violence in Delano, they say the "growers' men now carry shotguns and pistols, and one of our organizers was beaten so badly he had to be hospitalized."

Public Service Jobs Program Called Vital

solved fast enough by private employment alone. Only with a major program of public service employment can jobs in sufficient volume be produced with the speed which the urban crisis demands."

Biemiller acknowledged the "substantial progress" the nation has made in reducing unemployment in recent years—with the help of government manpower training and anti-poverty programs.

But having said this, he stressed, "we must recognize that many of the problems—in all their severity—are still with us. And they require immediate action."

The need for jobs corresponds with "a huge backlog of public service needs," Biemiller pointed out.

He urged that the legislation provide job opportunities for the underemployed as well as the jobless, that the effort be directed at providing "meaningful jobs" with training opportunities which will enable persons hired to aspire to advancement.

Wage Goals

While the federal minimum wage may be applicable as a "floor" under wages, the legislation should be aimed at creating jobs which pay more than the $1.15 hourly minimum which now applies to schools and hospitals, Biemiller said.

The problems of hard-core unemployment, he stressed, can't be met by merely saying that there are jobs available and "anybody who really wants a job can find one." For the most part, the jobs that do exist can't be successfully filled by persons with the educational, skill and motivation handicaps of the hard-core jobless, or else are located far from where the poor live.

The public service sector, he stressed, would combine training and supportive services with meaningful work in areas of heavy unemployment.

CONGRESSIONAL as well as union and industry leaders turned out to honor Seafarers Pres. Paul Hall in New York as he received the Man of the Year award from the Anti-Defamation League, the B'nai B'rith civil rights organization. From left: Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), Hall, and House Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.).

Pepper Scores Delay Of Civil Rights Vote

New York—Failure of the House of Representatives to give prompt approval to the Senate-passed civil rights bill drew sharp criticism here from Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.).

Speaking at a dinner given by the Anti-Defamation League in honor of AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Paul Hall, Pepper charged that the blockading tactics in the House were part of the "seamy side" of politics. He warned that delay could lead to new unrest in the ghettos, thus endangering final passage of the legislation.

"This delay was engineered by those who want to fan the fires of emotion," the congressman declared. "They hope there will be a resurgence of many of the prejudices which we thought had been allayed."

The liberal southerner said that the refusal to move quickly on the Senate-approved measure was "callously conceived and executed by people with sinister designs. The victim is the integrity of America and the future of some of our fellow countrymen."

"All over America," Pepper added, "we still have exclusions based on race, creed, color and national origin. Despite what we may say, we still have not gained all of the citadels of reason and understanding."

More than 1,500 people jammed the grand ballroom of the New York Hilton to honor Hall, president of the Seafarers, who received the ADL's Man of the Year Award. The plaque, presented by ADL National Dir. Benjamin R. Epstein, cited Hall for his "devoted efforts and leadership in helping to build a world of freedom, equality and justice."

Both Alabamans

Pepper noted that he and Hall were native Alabamans, adding: "I don't know where he got his liberalism, and I don't know where I got mine, because there was not much of it where we come from in the old days."

But times are changing, the congressman went on, adding that Hall and liberal Supreme Court Justice Hugo Black, another Alaman, "are more symbolic of the emerging spirit and sentiment of that state than George Wallace."

The Florida Democrat cited the SIU president for having waged a continuing struggle "for the rights of working men," and for having devoted his efforts to "helping young people overcome the obstacles that lie between them and a better life."

In the area of race relations, he observed, Hall has been "a champion of civil rights—he could have embraced no other sentiment, because somewhere in the red hills of Alabama he saw a dream of equality for all men, and he wanted to have something to do with the perfection of that dream."

Fifth Case:

New NLRB Ruling Hits Stevens Firings

A trial examiner for the National Labor Relations Board ruled that J. P. Stevens & Co., the nation's second biggest textile manufacturer, violated the legal rights of its employes by firing four workers who joined a union.

The ruling, by examiner Louis Libbin after four days of hearings, was the fifth consecutive finding against the giant textile chain, a major government contractor, in its attempt to smash an organizing drive by the Textile Workers Union of America and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

The NLRB sustained the examiners' findings in the first four cases. U.S. appeals courts affirmed the board in two cases and two are pending.

Appeal Denied

The Supreme Court refused to review the facts in one of the appellate cases. Stevens was forced to comply with the ruling and offer jobs to 71 union members it fired "flagrantly, cynically and unlawfully," as the NLRB described the company's misconduct.

The latest examiner's finding was that Stevens found out about a TWUA organizing meeting last August and September in Dublin, Ga., and shortly afterward invented excuses to fire four of the workers who attended the meeting and signed union cards.

Libbin recommended that Stevens be ordered to offer the four employes immediate and full reinstatement to their former or substantially equivalent positions without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, to make them whole for loss of salary, and to pay 6 percent interest from the date of their firing in 1967 to the date of reinstatement.

Dismissal of charges involving two other fired workers was recommended by the examiner.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock said the recommended order demonstrates that the Stevens firm "is still traveling the low road in defiance of the National Labor Relations Act."

The decision "justifies the need for unusual remedies to halt this company's flagrant violations," said Pollock, who added: "In any event, nothing this company can do will alter the fact that its workers want organization, nor will it alter our determination to help them achieve it."

In the four cases on which the NLRB has ruled, Stevens was charged with spying on employes, threatening them with reprisal if they joined the union, intimidating workers, changing working conditions to thwart union activity, and using the weapon of discharge in defiance of law.

The recent AFL-CIO convention urged Pres. Johnson to issue an executive order barring "wilful and repeated violators" of the Taft-Hartley Act from receiving federal contracts for goods and services. Stevens was called the "most flagrant" example of such violators. In 1966 the company was granted $76 million in federal orders, and it still is a major supplier for the government.

Humphrey Hails Labor On Poverty, Bias Fights

Labor's helping hand to victims of poverty and discrimination can prevent America from splitting into "two separate and unequal societies," Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey declared.

Humphrey spoke to the final session of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.'s legislative conference—to round after round of applause from 4,000 delegates who had come from every section of the nation.

He spoke movingly of the trade union movement's role as "a bridge to self-respect and human dignity for millions of Americans," including generations of immigrants.

But he stressed that many Americans, with "skins that don't happen to be white," have yet to cross that bridge.

Unemployment is at depression levels in the slum neighborhoods, "where the garbage is collected least often . . . schools are often obsolete and ramshackle . . . playgrounds and park services are inadequate," Humphrey said.

The people living there "cannot return to the rural poverty from which they or their parents fled. But they don't have the jobs, the skills, the education and training to make their way alone in an America that glitters and shines with prosperity wherever they turn."

'They Need Your Help'

He told the delegates, "They need your help . . . in finding work, in finding skills, in finding hope."

Humphrey praised the trust of the report by the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, declaring: "It documents the challenges facing a country striving to overcome generations of discrimination, alienation and deprivation—and does it well."

He spoke with pride of the record of the Johnson Administration—in education, health, jobs and opportunity.

"It is an Administration that says: 'Give every man a chance. Judge him by what he can do—not where he was born or what his name is.'"

The concluding session of the four-day conference also heard from Senators Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) and Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.) and chairman Carl Perkins of the House Labor Committee.

Tax Hike, Spending Cut Weighed by Conferees

amendments to the excise rate measure before finally voting for the surcharge-spending cut. The entire bill was passed by a 57 to 31 vote.

There was some question as to whether the items added by the Senate would survive a House-Senate Conference Committee. The House traditionally initiates tax legislation. The Ways & Means Committee has been opposed to the surcharge proposal and some of its members indicated they favor a deeper cut in government expenditures.

In his address to the nation taking himself out of the 1968 political contest, Pres. Johnson called on Congress to quickly pass the tax surcharge and indicated he would not object if it was tied to "expenditure control that the Congress may desire and dictate."

During the seven-day debate in the Senate the following important amendments were added:

- Revoking the tax exemption for industrial bonds which a growing number of communities have used as a lure to attract new industry or pirate plants from other cities.
- Repeal of a scheduled freeze due to take effect July 1 on federal payments for aid for dependent children.
- Tax exemption of advertising income of some magazines published by non-profit organizations.
- A directive to the Administration to send to Congress by the end of the year its proposals for comprehensive reform of the income tax laws.
- Imposition of an import quota on textiles based on average annual imports during the 1961-66 period unless other nations voluntarily agree to negotiated quotas.

The AFL-CIO has supported the concept of the income tax surcharge proposal of the Administration, but has urged that it be modified in a number of ways to make it more equitable.

In other congressional action:

- The House Commerce Committee approved a resolution calling for the Dept. of Transportation to make a two-year study of the nation's auto insurance system. The Senate Commerce Committee has approved a similar bill but with an 18-month limit on the study.
- The House passed and sent to the White House a bill to allow residents of the District of Columbia to elect their own school board. The board is currently appointed by U.S. district court judges.

Kentucky Enacts Fair Housing Law

Frankfort, Ky.—Kentucky became the first state south of the Mason-Dixon line to have a fair housing law, prohibiting discrimination in the sale or rental of homes and apartments.

Republican Gov. Louis B. Nunn allowed the bill passed by the legislature to become law without his signature.

It closely parallels the Senate-passed bill, exempting individuals who sell their homes directly, without going through a real estate broker.

Kentucky is the 22nd state to outlaw housing discrimination.

Cantor, MacDonald Join Research Staff

Arnold Cantor and Ray MacDonald have joined the staff of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

Cantor, a labor economist with the Manpower Administration and the Economic Development Administration, had served as research director with the Upholsterers and as a research associate with the Industrial Union Dept. He will concentrate on state and local financial problems and regional development.

MacDonald, director of research and education for the Molders, had been an AFL-CIO research intern and a steward, local union officer and district officer for the Machinists. He will concentrate on special projects including the economic background for bargaining, farm labor and education programs for young members.

Responsibility 'Inescapable':

U.S. Urged to Aid Uranium Victims

Federal responsibility to provide workmen's compensation protection, medical care and rehabilitation services for uranium miners and their families "is inescapable," the AFL-CIO declared.

Legislative Rep. Clinton M. Fair called on Congress to combine "the best features" of two bills being considered by a House Labor subcommittee.

The bills have been introduced by representatives James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) and Melvin Price (D-Ill.) with Administration backing.

Both measures authorize the secretary of labor to pay benefits to miners or their dependent survivors for permanent total disability or death from lung cancer arising from exposure to radiation in uranium mines.

Payments may not exceed the difference between benefits paid under applicable state workmen's compensation law and compensation as measured by the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act.

The bills contain provisions for benefits where there is no coverage under the state's workmen's compensation law. They also allow grants to states for research on the effect of radiation on miners.

Fair testified in support of all these provisions. In certain areas, however, he declared that neither bill "goes far enough" and in other respects he favored one bill over the other.

He supported a "broader scope of disabilities" included in the Price bill in comparison to limitations in the O'Hara bill that would restrict benefits to cases of total disability or death.

The AFL-CIO, Fair said, also backs a feature of the Price bill that permits federal reimbursements to states that have provided workmen's compensation protection to uranium miners or their dependent survivors in the past. O'Hara's bill has no such provision.

On the other hand, Fair noted that the O'Hara bill covers a period running from April 1, 1948, to five years after the date of its enactment, whereas the Price bill would terminate Dec. 31, 1970.

Fair pointed out that the AFL-CIO "as early as 1959" called attention to the pressing need for protection of uranium miners against radiation hazards.

However, he continued, no federal regulatory action was taken until 1967 when the secretary of labor issued "mandatory standards" under the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act and undertook enforcement programs to reduce radiation hazards.

'Tragic Situation'

Fair also recalled that last year Congress centered attention on the "tragic situation" of uranium miners so that for the first time the facts became known to the public.

Emphasizing the need for federal help for the miners and their dependents, he cited a U. S. Public Health Service estimate that "as many as 500 miners may die from lung cancer caused by exposure to radon daughters gas."

"Even that horrible figure could be too small," he added, pointing to an estimate made for the State of Colorado by a nationally known actuarial firm "which indicates there could be more than 1,100 possible deaths."

Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson testified on behalf of the Administration in support of the legislation to provide added federal benefits for the uranium miners.

She described the uranium miner with lung cancer as a "tragic side effect" of the atomic revolution. "We can't eliminate the tragedy . . . we can, however, eliminate the financial tragedy," she stated.

LEGISLATIVE CONFERENCE of the Textile Workers Union of America hears from Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff (D-Conn.), one of many legislators, government officials and union experts who spoke to the union delegates.

Postal Union Hails Truck Wage Rule

The Post Office Motor Vehicle Employes have won a year-long effort to prevent the contracting of postal trucking service to contractors paying substandard wages.

The Labor Dept. announced that it will go ahead with plans which had been deferred last year to determine prevailing area wages and fringe benefits for truck drivers carrying mail under federal contracts. The union had contended that a number of private firms had been used for mail hauling, in place of federal employes, because of a lower wage scale.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Research had assisted the union in pressing for the wage-setting procedures under the Service Contracts Act.

New Holiday Serves As Timely Reminder

New York, N.Y.—Transport Workers Union Local 100 has won a new and unusual paid holiday for employes of Westchester Street Transportation Co.—the anniversary of the day each employe joined the union.

A new two-year contract makes the new holiday effective next January. Also it gives union members a 12 percent pay increase, a $50,000 assault and disability insurance policy, and other benefits.

Part of the pay increase is retroactive to last Dec. 1, expiration date of the old contract.

Canadian GM Strike Pact Sets Parity

Toronto—A 47-day strike of 25,000 Canadian auto workers at General Motors plants won a package of improvements that include wage parity with U.S. workers by 1970.

UAW members at seven locations returned to work after voting to ratify the new terms minus some of the retrogressions that GM management had demanded.

Wage hikes retroactive to Nov. 6, 1967, are effective Apr. 8. They provide 20 cents more an hour in the first contract year for production and maintenance workers, 50 cents for skilled tradesmen, and additional increases in the second and third year. Improvements also are written in pensions and insurance and a special fund is set up to finance wage parity for 1,600 GM workers not covered by the Canada-U.S. automotive trade agreement.

Negotiations with Ford of Canada continued with a new deadline set for settlement—Apr. 8.

Across the border, the UAW settled a strike of 3,000 members at the Kelvinator plant of American Motors Corp., whose 14,300 auto plant employes had won contract gains without a strike. Also settled after scattered strikes was a contract dispute with Eltra Corp. covering 5,800 workers in U.S. and Canadian plants.

Strikes over local issues were reported at three of the last seven GM plants in the U.S. which have not agreed on local supplements. Also out are workers at Massey-Ferguson tractor plants, and plants of Ex-Cell-O Corp. and Kelsey-Hayes Corp.

ILPA Issues Warning On New Racket Paper

A new racket, calling itself the "Nationwide Labor News," is seeking bribes from employers, in the guise of advertising, on the claim that it can "protect" them from unions, according to Sec.-Treas. Kenneth Fiester of the Intl. Labor Press Assn., AFL-CIO.

The solicitations are being made by long-distance telephone by a person who identified himself as John O'Connor, Fiester said, offering these two examples of his technique:

- An Indiana manufacturer was told that for a $2,500 "ad" the name of his firm would "be removed from the master organizing list of the AFL-CIO." When the manufacturer returned the call he was told the price had gone up to $5,000, "because we've already done it."
- A machinery company in Madison, Wis., was assured that $1,500 in "advertising" would prove to be of "enormous help" to management in its pending negotiations with the Steelworkers.

Sought Funds

The "Nationwide Labor News" first came to notice when a letter, dated Feb. 26, was widely distributed throughout the labor movement. Many recipients sent copies to ILPA.

The letter, bearing a North Miami, Fla., address and signed by a Louis Lytton, announced the establishment of a new all-labor publication, to appear in "a minimum of four issues a year." It asked recipients to become "sponsors" at a subscription price of $2.50.

At that time ILPA warned its members by mail that:

"There is about one chance in 100,000 that Lytton and his associates (if any) are fresh-faced idealists seeking to fill what they think is a void in trade union communications. The odds, then, are 99,999 to one that this is another enterprise designed to extract money from businessmen for worthless advertising."

The warning proved to be an understatement. On Mar. 5, Dallas W. Sells, president of the Indiana AFL-CIO, reported the first incident. Sells promptly alerted the state manufacturers' association, and made his letter public. Since then there have been similar calls.

The Madison firm had actually drawn a check for $1,500 when one of its officials thought to call Richard H. Huffman, editor of the Union Labor News, official AFL-CIO monthly in the area. Huffman phoned Fiester, who—with some difficulty—talked the company out of it.

The facts have been sent to the Bureau of Deceptive Practices of the Federal Trade Commission, to the Fraud & Mailability Division of the Post Office Dept. and to the National Better Business Bureau. Fiester urged that any other incidents be reported to the same agencies and to ILPA.

5 Unionists Join Mediation Service

The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service assigned 13 new mediators, including five with union experience, to fill staff vacancies.

Among those who completed a two-week training course are John E. McClarren, formerly of the Steelworkers' staff; Lewis J. Moore, former Machinists business representative; Frank M. Perles, former Oil Workers local president; Frank S. Schoeppel, former Office & Professional Employes business representative, and Simon P. Zuiker, former Operating Engineers business manager.

Housewright Leads RCIA Nominations

Vice Pres. James T. Housewright has been nominated for international president of the Retail Clerks by a margin of three-to-one over John T. Haletsky in the contest to succeed RCIA Pres. James A. Suffridge, who has announced that he will not seek another term.

The ticket headed by Housewright was named by a similar ratio over the rival slate headed by Haletsky, who is director of organization for the Southwestern Division of RCIA.

Incumbent Sec.-Treas. William W. Maguire is unopposed in the quadrennial referendum election since Murray Plopper, a retired member who sought the office, has been declared ineligible because he did not meet the qualifications of active membership set forth in the RCIA constitution.

Balloting for international officers will take place in June at meetings of RCIA local unions. The results will be tabulated and certified by an international canvassing board which meets in July. The new term of office begins Sept. 1.

1-Man, 1-Vote Directive Extended to City Level

sioners were elected from districts of grossly unequal size.

One commissioner represented the city of Midland, the county's only urban center, with 67,906 people.

Three commissioners were elected by districts with populations ranging from 814 to 852.

After two lower state courts disagreed, the Texas Supreme Court took a compromise position. It said the districts were too far out of line to meet the requirements of either the Texas or U.S. Constitution. But it said that the redistricting did not have to follow one-man, one-vote guidelines but could take into account such factors as "land areas, geography, miles of county roads and taxable values."

The U.S. Supreme Court majority overturned this verdict and directed that population be the only criterion for redistricting.

The decision, written by Justice Byron R. White, declared that wherever "the votes of some residents have greater weight than those of others . . . the equal protection of the laws has been denied."

It stressed also that "a city, town or county may no more deny the equal protection of the laws than it may abridge freedom of speech, establish an official religion, arrest without probable cause, or deny due process of the law."

Justice John M. Harlan, who has consistently dissented from one-man, one-vote decisions, sharply disagreed with this one also. Dissents were also recorded by Justice Abe Fortas and Potter Stewart.

Fortas argued that the court was imposing an overly rigid standard. He said "gross underrepresentation" of the city should be remedied, but county government should be permitted to allow "an adequate, effective voice" for rural areas even if this means departure from one man, one vote doctrine.

Labor Board's Foes Open Fire at Hearing

policy because Congress can't anticipate all the problems that arise or is so pulled by conflicting pressures that it cannot pass a clear-cut labor relations law.

NLRB Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and General Counsel Arnold Ordman came to the Capitol to testify but had to postpone an appearance when the Republican leadership objected to committees meeting while the Senate was in session.

McCulloch said in releasing the text of his prepared testimony that the NLRB does not exceed its authority in "over 99.44 percent of the cases" and "never knowingly" oversteps the bounds. The "main current" of its decisions passes muster with the courts and interested parties, McCulloch declared.

Courts Dispose

Ordman said the validity of board findings is determined in the last analysis by the courts. The board's position was sustained in whole or in part in 81.2 percent of U.S. appeals court decisions in fiscal 1967 and by a margin of 86.5 percent in the first half of fiscal year 1968, he noted.

Mozart Ratner, board attorney from 1942-1952 who has some unions among his clients, declared Eisenhower-era board members made it clear that they conceived their function to be "to implement the labor policy of the Republican Party and the Administration rather than the Taft-Hartley Act."

For the first time, Ratner said, the former board "actually did, on a wholesale basis, what its predecessors had been unjustly accused of doing, namely, substituting personal policy" for legal criteria.

Ratner charged that the attacks on the present board from "employers and their partisans" are "meretricious." The board has been accused, he said, of "the very malfeasance of which the Eisenhower board was guilty" by the same forces which "instigated and applauded the performance of the Eisenhower board."

Other witnesses before the subcommittee embroidered the theme of business spokesmen that the NLRB is "prejudiced" against employers and biased in favor of labor.

Conservative Sen. Sam Ervin (D-N.C.) is chairman. Other members are John L. McClellan (D-Ark.), Quentin N. Burdick (D-N.D.), Everett McKinley Dirksen (R-Ill.) and Roman L. Hruska (R-Neb.).

Ervin opened the hearings with a call for congressional action. The lead witness was Sen. Robert P. Griffin (R-Mich.), coauthor of the Landrum-Griffin Act, who urged establishment of a labor court to replace the labor board.

Business Views

Other testimony came from former Rep. Fred A. Hartley, Jr. (R-N.J.), whose statement was read in his absence, and J. Mack Swigert of Cincinnati, O., who represents employers. Swigert urged that unfair labor practice cases be turned over to federal courts, with a separate agency set up to conduct representation elections.

Hartley's statement was read by John Kilcullen, Washington attorney. It listed four NLRB decisions that Hartley charged were in violation of the intent of Congress. Burdick, the only subcommittee member who said a good word for the board, said the four cases represented "tough, hard questions" and added "the board just happened to be right in all of them"—it was upheld by the courts in all four.

Last January a vice president of the National Association of Manufacturers urged business leaders to "start drumming up public opinion against unions." To prepare the way for new union-hobbling legislation, business must create the kind of public climate "which resulted in the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin Acts," William H. Zinke told employers in Cleveland, O. The speech was part of a long-range campaign by the NAM and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce for what they call "labor law reform."

SOCIAL ACTION CONFERENCE sponsored by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers at the Willard Hotel in Washington heard members of Congress and big city mayors discuss the urban crisis and the civil rights movement. NLRB Counsel Warns Budget Cuts Aggravate Rising Caseload Problem

Budget reductions and a clampdown on hiring pose "many problems" for regional and Washington staffs of the National Labor Relations Board as they face an ever-increasing load of new cases, NLRB General Counsel Arnold Ordman warned in a report to the President and Congress.

Board offices that take in more than 30,000 unfair labor practice charges and election petitions every year have been subjected to cuts in appropriations and a moratorium on new hires, Ordman reported. Nevertheless, he noted, they have managed to promote voluntary settlements in four out of every five valid unfair practice cases and to secure election agreements in three out of four cases.

In a summary of operations for fiscal 1967 and the first half of fiscal 1968, the NLRB counsel reported that regional offices have managed to conclude 80 percent of pending cases within 45 days.

As to the future, budget cuts and staff turnover may mean the "deferment of unfair labor practice hearings" and possibly affect the agency's ability to carry out its duties under the National Labor Relations Act, the report noted.

The major challenge for NLRB offices, Ordman said, is to "find ways to cope with the workload problems created by an annual volume of over 30,000 cases" and also to realize our continuing goal of improving service to the public."

In trying to achieve the goal, he said, his office put special emphasis on the quality and speed of case handling, voluntary settlement and adjustment of cases by the parties involved, and a better public understanding of the agency's policies and procedures.

The goals were achieved in large measure, he said, but the record case intake of fiscal 1967 "had to be handled by a field staff which increased at a much lower rate—1.7 percent—than case intake—4.9 percent—and by a staff which experienced a 13.2 percent turnover among professional employes."

The manpower problem was "particularly aggravated," the general counsel said, by a four-month moratorium in hiring in mid-year "pursuant to a government-wide program to maintain employment at the July 31, 1966, level."

Despite the large increase in filings and the smaller rate of increase in staff, Ordman declared that "one of the greatest accomplishments of the NLRB as a regulatory agency was the number of cases handled in the regional offices and administratively closed" without formal action by trial examiners or the labor board.

Ordman reported that some 92.3 percent of the 16,360 pending unfair labor practice cases were closed either by withdrawal (38.6 percent), dismissal (26.9 percent) or voluntary adjustment (26.8 percent).

Most Cases Settled

Of the 12,724 election cases closed, only 19 percent required formal hearing and decision.

Out of all cases closed—29,084—more than 25,000 or 87 percent were disposed of by regional offices without a formal hearing and decision, the report said. Ordman called this a "real contribution to industrial harmony and democracy."

Without this "excellent record of achievement, the increasing tide of labor board cases would have yielded a rash of . . . hearings which would have further crowded the dockets of the board and the courts," Ordman said.

One problem, he noted, is inability to replace experienced personnel lost to private business. Another is a reduction in travel and the deferment of investigations, which could mean more time spent later to investigate cases.

These problems and others "could quickly nullify the years of productive effort" spent in establishing the principle that excessive delay will not be permitted in starting field investigations and deciding on the merits of cases pending, Ordman observed.

Among new services of the agency offered in 1967, he listed the practice of inviting new union officers, industrial relations directors and attorneys to visit regional offices to meet the staff, familiarize themselves with NLRB procedures and exchange ideas.

Race Coverage Pilot Study Set By Guild Fund

A newspaperman's bequest to his union will be used to help the press do a better and more responsible job of reporting news from the nation's Negro communities.

The recent "riot commission" report—issued by the President's Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders—indicted the press for "failure to report adequately on race relations and ghetto problems." This failure, the commission said, "contributed to the black-white schism in this country."

The Mellett Fund for a Free and Responsible Press is seeking to face up to this criticism. It will finance "a pilot press council composed of representatives of the news media and Negro and other minority groups in a major American city this summer and fall."

It has asked several universities to consider administering such a program designed to increase "communication across racial lines."

The fund was established with money left to the Newspaper Guild by the late Lowell Mellett, editor, columnist and a former aide to Pres. Franklin D. Roosevelt. Mellett asked the union to use the money to explore ways of encouraging responsible newspaper performance without infringing on freedom of the press.

Ben H. Bagdikian, president of the Mellett Fund, said the press council project would be set up on the same basis as other projects the fund has undertaken. The Mellett Fund will put up the money, but the project will be administered independently.

Boys Clubs Salute Labor For Support

The Boys Clubs of America saluted organized labor for contributions and assistance that aided some 65,000 boys last year in 65 clubs across the nation.

The organization also announced that it will present its "Man-Boy Award" to AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis during the federation's national conference on community services in Washington, Apr. 21-25.

In a report marking its 108th anniversary, the organization praised unions for helping to build, repair and maintain and remodel club facilities and swimming pools.

Other "gifts of personal time contributed" by union members, it said, included support of camping, recreational and sporting activities carried on by the clubs.

In addition, the report pointed out that many unions made cash contributions to boys clubs.

Labor-Negro Ties Stressed As 40,000 March for King

MEMPHIS STRIKE LEADERS were in the front rank of the march memorializing Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., slain while he was in the city to aid the 1,300 striking sanitation workers. Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes is at center. To his left is Pres. T. O. Jones of SCME Local 1733, which represents the strikers.

Slain While Aiding Striking Workers

By John M. Barry

Organized labor mourned Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., with a special grief.

Acclaimed by the world as the apostle of non-violence in the civil rights movement, as a spiritual leader of American Negroes, and as a Nobel Peace Prize winner, Dr. King died in a union cause as a brother to trade unionists.

He was murdered in Memphis by a sniper "while aiding striking members of an AFL-CIO union in their struggle for human dignity," Federation Pres. George Meany noted on the night of the assassination.

"That is how Dr. King spent his entire life—at the side of the most oppressed in this nation. He died in that struggle and all who cherish human dignity mourn tonight."

Dramatic evidence of labor's solidarity with the civil rights movement was presented to Memphis itself as more than 40,000 persons, black and white, marched silently through the city's streets on the day before Dr. King's funeral.

It was the very march that he had come to Memphis to organize and lead. Only now it was his own memorial, with his widow walking in his place in the front rank.

But the march also retained the purpose Dr. King had given it—a demonstration of nationwide support for the Memphis

Fund Started For Strikers In Memphis

Creation of a special trade union fund to aid the striking Memphis garbage workers, with an initial contribution of $20,000 from the AFL-CIO, was announced by Federation Pres. George Meany.

Meanwhile, in Memphis, negotiators for the State, County & Municipal Employes, representing the 1,300 Public Works Dept. strikers, reported that the issues in the dispute had been narrowed, with wages posing the big remaining stumbling block.

House Votes Civil Rights Bill; More to Be Done, Says Meany

By David L. Perlman

Congress moved the nation a step closer to the goal of racial justice, sending to Pres. Johnson a civil rights bill which includes a strong ban on discrimination in housing.

The President promptly signed the bill into law, terming it "a victory for every American."

The House voted 229-195 to take up the Senate-passed bill, thus avoiding the risk that the legislation might be gutted in conference or face a renewed Senate filibuster. It then passed the bill by a big, bipartisan 250-171 margin.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany termed the House action "deeply gratifying." He said "it sustains the position that we in the AFL-CIO have long held and removes one more barrier to equality of opportunity—a cause to which we are completely dedicated."

But, Meany stressed, "much more must be done in this country before any of us who believe in equality can rest satisfied."

The new law, he said, will have "real meaning" for Americans living in ghetto slums only when there is enough housing to meet the nation's needs — "available at price levels all Americans can afford."

Meany added: "Congress has solved one problem. Now we urge it to move with speed to other unsolved problems—those of jobless Americans and those of Americans who live in slums."

In a dramatic first step towards meeting those other needs, the Senate refused to accept sharp cuts in funds for summer jobs in the slums and in the Head Start pre-school program.

A House-Senate conference committee had agreed to a $100 million cut in funds for the two programs —money the Senate had added to a special appropriations bill. The Senate repudiated its conferees by a more than 2-1 majority—54-24. It voted to request a new conference and instructed the Senate's negotiators to insist that the $100 million be restored.

Non-Whites Make Up 20% of Nation's Jobless

By Robert B. Cooney

The nation's jobless rate edged down to 3.6 percent in March as employment continued its slow but steady growth, the Labor Dept. reported.

The monthly job report showed non-farm payroll employment rising by 350,000 to 66.8 million, a high for March.

The job rise was 143,000 more than seasonal, with the major job gains in retail trade, state and local government and service industries.

Peter Henle, chief economist of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, described the general employment picture as "quite strong."

But, Henle added, the unemployment rate for non-whites persists at more than double the rate for whites.

The jobless rate for whites was 3.2 percent in March compared to 6.9 percent for non-whites, the vast majority of them Negroes.

Asked about the effect of the

Meany Tells Mrs. King 'We All Share Your Loss'

Following is the text of the letter from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to Mrs. Martin Luther King, Jr., Apr. 5:

Last night I expressed the shock and grief of the AFL-CIO at the murder of your husband. Let me now offer the deepest condolences of us all to you and your children.

This morning I re-read Dr. King's memorable address to the 1961 AFL-CIO convention. In passage after passage he eloquently affirmed the common bonds of Negroes and the labor movement—the unity of purpose to which he has now given his life.

The labor-hater, he said, "is virtually always a two-headed creature, spewing anti-Negro epithets from one mouth and anti-labor propaganda from the other." Though confident in the ultimate triumph of justice, he foresaw that lives would be lost:

"But if a physical death is the price that some must pay to free their children and their brothers from a permanent life of psychological death, then nothing could be more moral."

Dr. King said to us, "The duality of interests of labor and Negroes makes any crisis which lacerates you, a crisis from which we bleed."

The tragedy which has befallen you has, as well, befallen every human being who cherishes the cause of human brotherhood. In our own ways we all share your loss.

MORE THAN 40,000 mourners, Negro and white, filled the plaza before Memphis City Hall following the march through the city memorializing Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and fulfilling his pledge for a non-violent demonstration of support for the striking Memphis sanitation workers.

cial fund, said the Memphis garbage workers "are fighting for the most basic of trade union objectives" and deserve the support of the entire labor movement.

"Their fight," he declared, "is the fight of all American labor."

He named a two-man subcommittee of the AFL-CIO Executive Council—Vice Presidents A. Philip Randolph and Paul Hall—to coordinate the fund-raising campaign and urged all affiliates of the federation "to contribute generously."

Bargaining efforts in Memphis were being pressed in lengthy sessions by Under Sec. of Labor James J. Reynolds, assigned by Pres. Johnson to mediate the dispute following the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

The entire Negro community of Memphis has rallied to the cause of the strikers, under the leadership of the Committee on the Move for Equality, formed by Negro ministers of the city. Dr. King had gone to Memphis on their appeal to lead a demonstration on behalf of the strikers.

The first march, on Mar. 28, was disrupted when about 30 youthful militants broke away to smash store windows and engage in looting and clashes with police. A 16-year-old boy was killed and 50 persons injured in the outbreak.

Dr. King was shot from ambush and killed after returning to Memphis to carry out a promise to lead a new, non-violent march to press the cause of the strikers, 90 percent of whom are Negroes.

The dispute originated last Jan. 31 when 22 Negro garbagemen were sent home after it began to rain. White employes of the department were not sent home and resumed work when the rain stopped, receiving a full day's pay. When the Negro workers complained, the city agreed only to give them two hours' pay.

The Negro workers then turned to SCME Local 1733, which has been trying for nearly three years to obtain recognition as collective bargaining agent. The strike was called Feb. 12, centering on the primary issue of union recognition.

Throughout the dispute Mayor Henry Loeb has taken an adamant position against recognizing the union. He stands in the eyes of the Negro community as the symbol of the city's intransigence and failures in areas of housing, welfare, jobs, education, and police attitudes as well as collective bargaining

Loeb branded the strike illegal and obtained an injunction against it. The injunction was based on an earlier one, issued in 1966, which the city obtained to end a one-day walkout by the sanitation workers.

The strikers nevertheless refused to return to work, and jail sentences and fines for contempt of court were issued against SCME Pres. Jerry Wurf, Field Staff Dir. P. J. Ciampa, Organizers William Lucy, Jesse Epps and Joseph Paisley, Local Pres. T. O. Jones and Steward Nelson Jones. They remain free in bond pending appeal.

Public attention was focused on the strike from its early stages through daily marches by the sanitation men to City Hall.

The city council, whose three Negro members have publicly identified themselves with the union movement, sought to resolve the dispute and proposed that the garbage workers be given an increase of 10 cents an hour. Loeb has insisted that no more than 8 cents an hour is available. Pay for most of the men averages $1.70 an hour.

Other key issues in the dispute are voluntary dues checkoff, which the mayor rejected on principle even though the city already deducts the dues of union transit employes, and grievance procedure. Loeb's comment on the latter issue was that the employes are free to voice their complaints during his weekly "open house" at City Hall.

The workers' protest has been extended to include a consumer boycott of major merchants, including a chain of laundries and barbecue restaurants owned by the mayor's brother, William.

MULE-DRAWN CASKET, symbolic of his concern for the poor, bears the body of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., through the streets of Atlanta, leading thousands of marchers in the funeral procession for the slain civil rights leader.

Workers on Strike Set February Peak

The number of workers involved in work stoppages that began in February was the highest for any February on record, but lost time remained at a relatively low level—33 hundredths of 1 percent, the Labor Dept. reported.

The monthly report of the departments Bureau of Labor Statistics noted that February time lost reached 3.8 million mandays, the highest for the month since 1950.

Fair Housing Enacted:

Major Victory Won By Rights Coalition

Disorders, told the Senate soberly: "The last six days reminds us how acute is the need for funds."

Passage of the open housing bill was not directly tied to the wave of national concern over America's racial rift in the aftermath of Dr. Martin Luther King's murder.

The showdown vote had been scheduled before the assassination and weeks of lobbying by the Administration and a coalition of civil rights, labor, religious and business groups had laid the groundwork for passage.

In legislative terms, it was almost a miracle that an open housing bill stronger than the one which failed to pass the more liberal 89th Congress became law in the 90th Congress.

Earlier Bill Died

Two years ago, a less comprehensive open housing bill narrowly passed the House—and then only after weakening amendments. It never came to a vote in the Senate because of a southern filibuster and the strong opposition of Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen.

This year, the House passed only a much-amended civil rights protection bill. At the urging of the Civil Rights Leadership Conference, a bipartisan group of senators agreed to make the effort to attach a fair housing amendment to the House bill. But in the face of a Senate filibuster, the effort appeared to most observers to be a quixotic tilting with windmills.

Dirksen was still joining with the Dixie bloc in saying "never." And without a substantial majority of Republicans—conservatives as well as the liberal-moderate bloc—the filibuster could not be broken.

Gradually the mood shifted. A solid majority of Democrats lined up behind a strong bill. Over the weeks of desultory debate, Republican support picked up—until on a close but unsuccessful attempt to muster a two-thirds majority to end the filibuster, Dirksen found himself in a minority of his own party.

Dirksen Shifts

Then, as he had on the historic 1964 Civil Rights Act, the GOP leader moved to the front of the troops and worked with the bipartisan civil rights coalition and the Administration in shaping the final form of the legislation.

The filibuster was broken; the Senate passed the bill by an astounding 71-20 margin.

The problem was now in the House, where Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford insisted—as he was to do until the end—that the legislation go to conference to seek a compromise between the innocuous House bill and the strong Senate version.

There were two big procedural hurdles before the House could vote on whether or not to accept the Senate bill.

First the Rules Committee had to bring out a resolution making it in order for the House to consider the Senate bill. Then the House would have to approve the resolution.

The initial effort to get Rules Committee clearance failed last month when two northern Democrats joined with the committee's five Republican and Chairman William M. Colmer (D-Miss.) in voting to defer committee action until April 9. Seven Democrats, including three liberal southerners, opposed the delay.

The needed one-vote switch at the April 9 session came from a Republican, Rep. John B. Anderson of Illinois.

On the decisive House vote to approve the procedure, 152 Democrats were joined by 77 Republicans, while 106 Republicans and 89 Democrats voted against taking up the Senate bill.

A scattering of northern city Democrats, fearful of "backlash" from constituents, deserted the civil rights ranks. But there were also southerners such as Rep. Hale Boggs (D-La.), who opposed open housing in 1966, but this time stood up for it.

"Either we move ahead as one people or we move toward a police state," Boggs told the House.

The new law takes effect in gradual stages.

Initial Impact Slight

The initial coverage merely gives the force of law to Pres. Kennedy's executive order which banned discrimination in the sale or rental of housing built with federal financial assistance or mortgage guarantees since Nov. 20, 1962, except for single-family owner-occupied homes.

The first big step comes next Jan. 1, when all apartment houses and real estate developments will be covered.

On Jan. 1, 1970, coverage extends to single-family homes that are sold through a real estate broker. Only if the owner sold the home himself could he reject a potential buyer because of race or religion.

There are a few exceptions—the so-called "Mrs. Murphy's boarding house" and non-profit housing operated by religious groups for their own denominations. But by 1970, an estimated 80 percent of all the nation's housing will be under the discrimination ban.

Other sections of the civil rights bill make it a federal crime to interfere with persons exercising specified civil rights, such as voting or using public accommodations; provide stiff penalties for persons crossing state lines with intent to incite or participate in a riot; bar transportation of firearms or explosives for use in a riot; and make it a federal crime to interfere with a law enforcement officer or a fire fighter in a riot situation. It also includes a "bill of rights" for American Indians.

MESSAGE born by a Memphis marcher's sign conveys the feelings of more than 40,000 persons who took part in the demonstration.

Labor-Negro March Mourns Slain King

Meany Stresses Strong Links Of Unions to Civil Rights Cause

garbage workers in their struggle to win from the city the most fundamental of trade union rights.

The march brought a day-long recess in efforts to achieve a settlement in the nine-weeks old strike. They had been pressed throughout the night by Under Sec. of Labor James J. Reynolds, sent in to mediate the dispute by Pres. Johnson following the assassination.

Meany expressed labor's condolences in a letter to Dr. King's widow, Mrs. Coretta King. (Text, Page 1.)

He stressed the strong identification the slain civil rights leader felt with the labor movement. He recalled Dr. King's address to the 1961 AFL-CIO convention in which he told labor that the interests of trade unions and Negroes are so tied together that "any crisis which lacerates you, (is) a crisis from which we bleed." (Excerpts, Page 5.)

Meany also announced the establishment of a special fund to aid the 1,300 Memphis garbage workers, members of State, County & Municipal Employes Local 1733, in whose behalf Dr. King had gone to the city of his death. The fund was started by an initial contribution of $20,000 from the federation, and Meany called on all affiliates "to contribute generously." (Story, Page 1.)

Pres. Johnson gave voice to America's grief in proclaiming a day of national mourning, Sunday, Apr. 7, and ordering the U.S. flag to be flown at half-staff at all federal installations until Dr. King's burial. It was the first time such a tribute had been accorded to a Negro.

The AFL-CIO flew its U.S. flag at half-staff and closed its headquarters building on the day of burial, Apr. 9, as a symbolic expression of all labor's mourning.

SCME Pres. Jerry Wurf declared that "the shame of Memphis is the sorrow of the nation." He called the assassination "a calamity for the people of America," and said "there can be no greater memorial to Dr. King than to carry on the struggle for human rights, for which he died."

Shock, grief and indignation were expressed in statements and messages from leaders of free trade unions around the world. (Excerpts, Page 7.)

Another, ugly reaction erupted in Negro ghettos across the nation. A wave of violence, looting and arson required the use of federal and National Guard troops and the imposition of curfews to restore order in many cities. But while the assassination of the leader of the non-violent movement ironically provided the spark, the tinder and fuel for the violence were abundantly present in grinding poverty, crowded slums, unemployment and despair.

Mrs. King issued an eloquent appeal for order and calm if only in respect to the memory of her husband. "Nothing hurt him more than violence," she reminded the rioters.

The Memphis march started at Clayborn Temple African Methodist Episcopal Church, only five blocks from the Lorraine Motel where a sniper's bullet had taken the life of Dr. King. Its ranks were filled by a huge outpouring of the Negro community and many white persons.

Supporters and sympathizers came, too, from all U. S. points. Five chartered planes arrived from New York just before the march, bearing SCME members led by District 37 Dir. Victor Gotbaum, members of the New York City teachers' union led by AFT Pres. Charles Cogen and local Pres. Al Shanker, and a delegation of AFL-CIO entertainers headed by Actors & Artistes Vice Pres. Jeanna Belkin.

Seafarers' members from all major ports were on hand, and delegations from central bodies as distant as Maryland were observed by an AFL-CIO News reporter.

Representatives of the AFL-CIO, designated by Meany, included Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman, Organization Dir. William L. Kircher, Education Dir. Walter G. Davis, Sec.-Treas. William H. Bowe of the Sleeping Car Porters, Sec.-Treas. Sol Stetin of the Textile Workers Union of America, Vice Pres. Robert Powell of the Laborers, Sec.-Treas. Alvin E. Heaps of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, and members of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights staff, Robert McGlotten and E. T. Kehrer.

Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther led a group of UAW officials, and Executive Sec.-Treas. Peter M. McGavin represented the Maritime Trades Dept.

Key roles in the organization of the march were played by Dir. Bayard Rustin and Associate Dir. Norman Hill of the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

The marchers moved away from Clayborn Temple eight abreast in ranks that took more than two hours to pass the starting point. They walked under leaden skies, in occasional drizzle, escorted by carbine-carrying motorcycle police.

Along the one-mile route to City Hall, hundreds of spectators jammed the sidewalks, and many of them heeded the appeal of marshals to join the march.

Signs worn by the marchers declared: "I Am a Man," "Union Justice . . . Now," and "Honor King—End Racism."

Mrs. King, whose plane had been delayed by the weather, joined the march at the intersection of Main and Beale Streets, her three oldest children by her side.

She was welcomed by the Rev. James Lawson and the Rev. H. Ralph Jackson, leaders of the Committee on the Move for Equality, the Memphis ministers' group rallying support for the sanitation strikers.

Also greeting her was Mrs. Rosa Parks, the Negro woman who was jailed because she refused to move to the rear of a Montgomery, Ala., bus in 1955 because her feet hurt, precipitating the Negro boycott of the bus system that catapulted Dr. King to the forefront of civil rights leadership.

Later, addressing the Memphis marchers as they jammed the plaza before City Hall, Mrs. King challenged the throng to continue her husband's work "to make all people truly free and to make every person feel that he is a human being." (Excerpts, Page 4.)

Wurf recited the history of the sanitation workers' strike that had brought Dr. King to Memphis and recalled that after being "maced and gassed and pushed," union officials had been told "the city of Memphis has been doing things the same way for 50 years and no one is going to change it."

"Then something magnificent happened," he said. "The garbage workers found some allies. The Memphis ministers, the NAACP, the whole black community of Memphis declared that 'we are with these men. So long as they are not free and have no dignity, then none of us has freedom or dignity.' "

He drew a roar of approval when he declared:

"I pledge to you that no matter how long it takes, until we have justice and decency and morality, we will not go back to work."

Slaiman read to the crowd Meany's statement condemning the assassination and reported the creation of the special AFL-CIO fund to aid the strikers.

"This is no longer a day of mourning," he said. "It is a day of redemption. Because this meeting here today on the banks of the Mississippi brings together thousands and thousands of people, black and white, dedicated to a new America."

Reuther presented a UAW check for $50,000 that went to the Citizens' Committee to aid the Public Works Employes and declared, "if it takes more than this, there'll be more coming."

"You are going to win this struggle, but there is much work to be done in America," he said, citing the words of Dr. King that "we will be judged not by what we have, but by what we do with what we have."

Many of the trade unionists present were veterans of other non-violent struggles with Dr. King to achieve civil rights and labor goals, including the march from Selma to Montgomery, Ala., in 1965 to win voting rights, the Chemical Workers' Scripto strike in Atlanta in which Dr. King had picketed, and the struggle of Philadelphia teachers to win union recognition in which he had lent strong support.

Following the march, most of the unionists went on to Atlanta to attend the funeral of Dr. King. The group included 100 of the sanitation strikers in buses chartered by the SCME.

Hundreds of other union officials were observed at the funeral, joining the historic procession to Morehouse College with the poor Negroes and whites to whom Dr. King had dedicated his life. Among them were Service Employes Pres. David Sullivan, Actors & Artistes Pres. Conrad Nagel, Steelworkers Vice Pres. Joseph P. Molony, Georgia AFL-CIO Pres. W. H. Montague, Sr., AFL-CIO Region VI Dir. Oliver Singleton, Pres. Paul Jennings and Sec.-Treas. George Collins of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City AFL-CIO, and Organizational Dir. Nick Zonarich of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

THE STRONG LINK between the labor and civil rights movements in their struggles and goals was emphasized by Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., in his address to the AFL-CIO's 1961 convention and is symbolized in this photo taken of him at the convention with Federation Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph.

TAKING THE PLACE of her slain husband, Mrs. Coretta King leads the Memphis march fulfilling his pledge to come back to help the striking sanitation workers. By her side are her two sons, Martin III, 10, and Dexter, 6, and to her left, the Rev. Ralph D. Abernathy, new head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. At far right is Bayard Rustin, director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, who helped organize the march.

RANKS OF THE MEMPHIS MARCH were swelled by labor delegations from all parts of the country. This group included, from the right, AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman, Auto Workers Pres. and Mrs. Walter P. Reuther, Pres. T. O. Jones of State, County & Municipal Employes Local 1733, the Rev. H. Ralph Jackson (foreground) of the local ministers' group spearheading support for the strikers, and SCME Pres. Jerry Wurf.

'Deep In Our Hearts . . .'

THERE ARE MANY ways to measure the life of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., but to American workers there is the simple fact that he was murdered while aiding members of an AFL-CIO union in their struggle for human dignity.

There has been an outpouring of grief, deep and poignant, at the cutting down in his prime of a great national leader. And his death is perhaps most deeply felt by American workers, for he understood their needs and their aspirations, the link between the civil rights movement and the labor movement.

Some years ago Dr. King told an AFL-CIO convention that the "unity of purpose" of the two movements "is not an historical coincidence. Negroes are almost entirely a working people. There are pitifully few Negro millionaires and few Negro employers. Our needs are identical with labor's needs, decent wages, fair working conditions, livable housing, old age security, health and welfare measures, conditions in which families can grow, have education for their children and respect in the community."

From the days of the Montgomery bus boycott to the strike of garbagemen in Memphis Dr. King fought and bled for these goals. And as his courage and fervor touched the wellspring of America's conscience and helped weld together a mighty coalition of civil rights, labor and religious groups, new equal rights protections were written into the law.

But the new laws alone could not solve the injustices and brutalities of 300 years of discrimination and deprivation. As Dr. King noted in 1965: "What good does it do to be able to eat at a lunch counter if you can't buy a hamburger?"

A massive cloud of frustration settled over the large segments of the Negro community as economic progress came slowly and new groups of "civil rights militants" and liberal intellectuals abandoned the struggle for equal rights for self-defeating racial and cultural nationalism that gave aid and comfort to bigots and segregationists.

King fought on, raising ever higher the banner of non-violence, calling on the white community to keep the struggle alive as the militants readied for violence in the streets and those who blocked progress on equal rights prepared for combat in the name of "law and order."

HE DIED helping Memphis's mostly Negro garbagemen win the right of their union to be recognized by the white community without resort to violence.

The struggle for civil rights in America has been intensively waged for less than two decades. It cannot overcome without great tribulation and pain the centuries of brutal slavery, discrimination and inequality. But overcome it must and it will.

A first condition for progress toward the kind of society for which King lived and died is to treat the cancer of racism—black racism and white racism. For as long as racist indictments continue—of either the white community, as such, for the slaying of Dr. King or the Negro community, as such, for looting and arson—there can be no progress toward the economic and social justice that he sought.

There is no goal, no program that has a higher priority for the American labor movement.

'I Have a Dream'

Mrs. King Tells Marchers:

'We Are Going to Go Forward . . . to Make People Truly Free'

Mrs. Martin Luther King, Jr., spoke at Memphis City Hall after leading the march on behalf of the city's striking garbagemen—the march her assassinated husband came to the city to lead. Following are excerpts from her address.

I COME HERE today because I was impelled to come. During my husband's lifetime, I have always been at his side when I felt that he needed me—and he needed me most during the 12 years of our struggle for human rights and freedom for all people.

I have been in complete accord with all the things that he stood for.

I came because whenever it was impossible for my husband to be in a place where he wanted to be, and felt that he needed to be, he would occasionally send for me to stand in for him. And so today I felt that he would have wanted me to be here.

I need not say to you that he never thought in terms of his personal welfare but always in terms of a cause which he dedicated his life to.

That cause we shared with him, and I have always felt anything I could do to free him to carry on his work—that I wanted to do this and it would be the least that I could do. Three of our four children are here. They came because they wanted to come, too.

And I want you to know that in spite of the times he had to be away from his family, his children knew that Daddy loved them. The time that he spent with them was well spent. I always said it's not the quantity of time that's important but the quality of time.

I have been deeply gratified and my spirit has been uplifted because so many thousands of persons and followers of my husband like you have done so many wonderful things and said so many kind things to lift my spirits and that of our family.

My husband was a loving man, a man who was completely devoted to nonviolence, and I don't need to say that. And he, I think, somehow was able to instill much of this to his family.

This hour to me represents much more than just a time to talk about and to eulogize my husband, who I can say was a great man, a great father and a great husband.

And we know that his spirit will never die. And those of you who believed in what Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., stood for, I would challenge you today to see that his spirit never dies and that we will go forward from this experience which to me represents the crucifixion—on toward the resurrection and redemption of his spirit.

How many times have I heard him say that with every Good Friday there comes Easter. When Good Friday comes, these are the moments in life that we feel that all is lost and there is no hope. But then Easter comes and the time of resurrection and rebirth of hope and fulfillment.

WE ARE GOING to go forward. We are going to continue his work to make all people truly free and to make every person feel that he is a human being.

His campaign for the poor must go on.

He was concerned about the least of these—the garbage collectors, the sanitation workers in Memphis. He was concerned that you have a decent income and protection that was due you. And this is why he came back to Memphis to give his aid.

We are concerned about not only the Negro poor but the poor all over America and all over the world. Every man deserves a right to a job or an income so that he can pursue liberty, life and happiness.

Our great nation, as he often said, has the resources. But his question was—Do we have the will? Somehow I hope in this resurrection experience the will will be created that has a heart and mind and soul and spirit of those who have the power to make these changes come about.

If this can be done, then I know that his death will be the redemptive force that he so often talked about in terms of giving his life to a great cause and the things he believed in.

He often said that unearned suffering is redemptive and if you give your life for a cause in which you believe, and which is right and just, and if your life comes to an end as a result of this, then your life will not have been lived in a more redemptive way. And I think that this is what my husband has done.

But then I ask the question—How many men must die before we can really have a free and true and peaceful society? How long will it take?

If we can catch the spirit which I believe we can, and the true meaning of this experience, I believe that this nation can be transformed into a society of love, of justice, peace and brotherhood where all men can really be brothers.

Speech to AFL-CIO Convention:

King Saw Labor, Negro United By Same Aspirations—and Foes

On Dec. 11, 1961, Dr. Martin Luther King delivered a memorable address to the Fourth Constitutional Convention of the AFL-CIO in Miami Beach, Fla. The following is excerpted from that address.

NEGROES ARE almost entirely a working people. There are pitifully few Negro millionaires and few Negro employers. Our needs are identical with labor's needs, decent wages, fair working conditions, livable housing, old age security, health and welfare measures, conditions in which families can grow, have education for their children and respect in the community.

That is why Negroes support labor's demands and fight laws which curb labor.

That is why the labor-hater and labor-baiter is virtually always a twin headed creature spewing anti-Negro epithets from one mouth and anti-labor propaganda from the other mouth.

The duality of interest of labor and Negroes makes any crisis which lacerates you, a crisis from which we bleed. As we stand on the threshold of the second half of the Twentieth Century, a crisis confronts us both. Those who in the second half of the nineteenth century could not tolerate organized labor have had a rebirth of power and seek to regain the despotism of that era while retaining the wealth and privileges of the Twentieth Century.

Whether it be the ultra right wing in the form of Birch societies or the alliance which former President Eisenhower denounced, the alliance between big military and big industry, or the coalition of southern Dixiecrats and northern reactionaries, whatever the form, these menaces now threaten everything decent and fair in American life.

Their target is labor, liberals, and the Negro people, not scattered "reds" or even Justice Warren, former Presidents Eisenhower and Truman and President Kennedy, who are in truth beyond the reach of their crude and vicious falsehoods.

Labor today faces a grave crisis, perhaps the most calamitous since it began its march from the shadows of want and insecurity. In the next 10 to 20 years automation will grind jobs into dust as it grinds out unbelievable volumes of production. This period is made to order for those who would seek to drive labor into impotency by viciously attacking it at every point of weakness.

HARD CORE UNEMPLOYMENT is now an ugly and unavoidable fact of life. Like malignant cancer, it has grown year by year and continues its spread. But automation can be used to generate an abundance of wealth for people or an abundance of poverty for millions as its human-like machines turn out human scrap along with machine scrap as a by-product of production. Our society, with its ability to perform miracles with machinery, has the capacity to make some miracles for men—if it values men as highly as it values machines.

To find a great design to solve a grave problem labor will have to intervene in the political life of the nation to chart a course which distributes the abundance to all instead of concentrating it among a few. The strength to carry through such a program requires that labor know its friends and collaborate as a friend. If all that I have said is sound, labor has no firmer friend than the 20 million Negroes whose lives will be deeply affected by the new patterns of production.

To say that we are friends would be an empty platitude if we fail to behave as friends and honestly look to weaknesses in our relationship. Unfortunately there are weaknesses.

Labor has not adequately used its great power, its vision and resources to advance Negro rights. Undeniably it has done more than other forces in American society to this end. Aid from real friends in labor has often come when the flames of struggle heighten. But Negroes are a solid component within the labor movement and a reliable bulwark for labor's whole program, and should expect more from it exactly as a member of a family expects more from his relatives than he expects from his neighbors.

THE TWO MOST DYNAMIC and cohesive liberal forces in the country are the labor movement and the Negro freedom movement.

Together we can be architects of democracy in a South now rapidly industrializing. Together we can re-tool the political structure of the South, sending to Congress steadfast liberals who, joining with those from northern industrial states, will extend the frontiers of democracy for the whole nation.

Together we can bring about the day when there will be no separate identification of Negroes and labor. There is no intrinsic difference as I have tried to demonstrate. Differences have been contrived by outsiders who seek to impose disunity by dividing brothers because the color of their skin has a different shade.

I look forward confidently to the day when all who work for a living will be one with no thought to their separateness as Negroes, Jews, Italians or any other distinctions.

This will be the day when we shall bring into full realization the American dream—a dream yet unfulfilled. A dream of equality of opportunity, of privilege and property widely distributed; a dream of a land where men will not take necessities from the many to give luxuries to the few; a dream of a land where men will not argue that the color of a man's skin determined the content of his character; a dream of a nation where all our gifts and resources are held not for ourselves alone but as instruments of service for the rest of humanity; the dream of a country where every man will respect the dignity and worth of human personality—that is the dream.

And as we struggle to make racial and economic justice a reality, let us maintain faith in the future. We will confront difficulties and frustrating moments in the struggle to make justice a reality, but we must believe somehow that these problems can be solved.

In Time of Attack:

Humphrey Rallied Support for Labor

In July 1959 then Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey rose on the floor of the U.S. Senate to deliver an historic speech entitled "What's Right with American Labor." The speech came during a period of vitriolic attack on the trade union movement. Following are excerpts of that memorable Senate speech.

FOR TWO YEARS NOW we have been hearing much about what's wrong with the American labor movement. A sordid, frightening, loathsome image of that labor movement has emerged from the hundreds of hearings, the thousands of editorials and cartoons, the countless speeches about corrupt labor officials.

When I hear or see the phrase "labor movement" there does not flash through my mind the image of racketeers. That would be as appropriate and as fair as equating America with slums and juvenile delinquency and lynchings. America has those problems, and more, but America also stands for freedom, for achievement, for individual dignity, for opportunity, for decency, for honor, for compassion and justice.

Union organizations have provided for millions of formerly inarticulate citizens the forum in which to hammer out policies affecting the world in which they live and which their children will inherit. And not only have they hammered out policies, but they have developed techniques and resources for implementing those policies. That is what I find so right about the labor movement.

Labor lobbyists are not coy in expressing labor's goals. Of course, they seek legislation that will permit them to organize and to function with a minimum of government interference. But labor relations legislation is only a small part of their legislative program—albeit very important.

- Labor asks that the federal minimum wage be increased and that its coverage be expanded. Very few union members need a federal minimum wage to protect them. Is this narrow self-interest legislation?
- Labor asks for improvements in unemployment insurance. Union members would benefit from this, but there are a greater number of non-union workers who need this additional protection.
- Labor asks for health benefits for retired people. It asks for higher appropriations for medical research and hospital and child welfare activities. Are not these desirable social goals?
- Labor lobbies for public housing and slum clearance and urban redevelopment. Is this not in the public interest?
- Labor seeks depressed areas legislation, help for community facilities, bigger public roads programs. Are these narrow, selfish interests?
- Labor supports federal aid to school construction, better salaries for teachers, liberal scholarship programs. Are not these proper goals for all America?
- Labor supports programs designed to aid America's farmers, such as REA, and it backs legislation to preserve the family-size farm. Is not this in the best interest of our country?
- Labor favors legislation designed to promote a vigorous and healthy climate for small business. Is not such promotion of our free enterprise system in the public interest?
- Labor is a strong backer of civil rights legislation, despite the difficulties such support causes in some parts of the country. Is not such support a good thing?

The free labor movement of the world has played, and will continue to play, a most important role in the effort to stop the onward rush of Communist aggression.

Much of what the unions of America have done for their members and for others can be measured statistically. But perhaps the major contribution of all has no dimensions; it cannot be measured in dollars, in time, in size. It is that intangible thing that makes everything else in life shrink to nothingness. It is what unions have done to enhance the dignity, the spirit, the personality of the individual.

Irving Brown Reports:

U.S. Labor Spurs Assistance For Viet Nam Unions, People

AMERICAN LABOR has launched a drive to help both unions and government in South Viet Nam meet immediate and long-range problems, an AFL-CIO international affairs expert reported.

The AFL-CIO has already dispatched $45,000 for food, clothing, blankets, pots and pans and other emergency relief for the 8,000 trade union families "hit during the Tet offensive," said Irving Brown, executive director of the African-American Labor Center.

Brown, who just returned from Saigon, where he helped develop and coordinate the program, was questioned by reporters on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program, Labor News Conference, broadcast at 7:35 p.m. EST Tuesdays on the Mutual Radio Network.

Brown said the efforts of the newly-chartered Asian-American Free Labor Institute will be "similar to what we are doing in Latin America and in Africa," and directed at helping cooperatives, union education and vocational training.

THE EVENTUAL EXTENT of AAFLI activity in Asia can't be predicted now, the union spokesman said, pointing out that the Institute is in the process of working out the overall agreement with AID. "But," he said, "we can hope for a start of roughly $250,000."

U.S. labor support for union-sponsored international worker-to-worker programs is good, Brown said. "The rank-and-file is tremendously interested" in them, he said, pointing out that "there is a natural identification of common interests among workers everywhere."

Reporters questioning Brown on Labor News Conference were Sam Sharkey, labor specialist for the Newhouse Newspapers, and Frank Swoboda, labor correspondent for United Press Intl.

LABOR'S ROLE in helping both unions and government in South Viet Nam meet immediate and long-range problems was discussed on Labor News Conference by Irving Brown, center, executive director of the African-American Labor Center. Questioning him were Sam Sharkey, left, of the Newhouse Newspapers and Frank Swoboda of United Press Intl. The program was aired nationwide over Mutual Radio.

TELEVISION CAMERAS focus on Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz as he announces to the Operating Engineers convention his endorsement of Vice Pres. Humphrey for the Democratic presidential nomination. Seated is IUOE Pres. Hunter P. Wharton, who earlier presented to the convention a resolution supporting Humphrey and urging him to run.

Operating Engineers to Expand Job Safety, Health Campaign

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Delegates to the Operating Engineers convention resolved to do even more in a field which has earned the union widespread praise—safeguarding the safety and health of workers on the job.

The union called on each of its construction locals to name a full-time safety director and to work with local employer associations "towards a cooperative program." And it asked that every local have an active safety and health committee.

It expressed concern at the hazards—known and unknown—thousands of its members face in industries using radioactive substances and potentially dangerous chemicals.

The convention called on the governments of both the United States and Canada to enact occupational health and safety legislation and provide funds for research into little-known health hazards.

In a message to the convention, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the union and its president, Hunter P. Wharton:

"Your efforts in the field of safety have provided a standard for others to copy. You have helped to make not only your members, but all Americans, safety conscious—on the job, on the highways, and in their homes as well."

Politics, political action and legislative programs were stressed in convention actions, speeches and messages.

Delegates applauded a telegram from Pres. Johnson which stressed that the effort to extend "prosperity to every citizen . . . is far from finished."

Johnson told the convention:

"We need legislation to provide $2.1 billion for expanding our manpower programs to reach and help the hard-core unemployed.

Legislation Urged

"We need $1 billion for the model cities program in fiscal 1969 to make our cities fit places to live.

"We need legislation to strengthen the Federal-State Unemployment Insurance System by increasing coverage and benefits and modifying eligibility.

"We need legislation to provide safe and healthy working conditions for all our working people.

"And there is still need to eliminate the unfair prohibition against situs picketing and to strengthen collective bargaining by repealing Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act."

Delegates said they hoped Pres. Johnson will reconsider his decision not to stand for re-election. But if he does not, they made clear that their choice is Vice Pres. Humphrey.

In addition to the formal resolution read to the convention by Wharton, the convention expressed its sentiments when Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz voiced his personal endorsement of Humphrey for the Democratic presidential nomination. At that point in his speech, the delegates rose to their feet in a spontaneous, cheering ovation.

COPE Dir. Al Barkan warned the convention that labor's program can go down the drain in the next election if union members "get sidetracked to phony issues" and racist candidates.

He urged the local union leaders to hammer away at the "real issues of the campaign" and "put political action on the top of the agenda of your local unions."

'Vitally Important'

Meany also emphasized in his convention message that this election is "vitally important" to labor. "All the progressive legislation of the past eight years is under attack," he warned.

The convention called for enactment of a massive housing program, pointing up the need in a resolution which sounded this alarm:

"The already decayed center cities of the United States are decaying further at the present time. They are "ghettos of despair where millions of Americans are trapped by poverty, racial discrimination or both. Outside these centers the urban environment is often characterized by suburban sprawl, haphazard, ill-planned, unsightly developments with inadequate public facilities, few recreational or cultural opportunities and no provisions for mass transit."

The need now, the convention resolution said, is for "the will to press forward with determination in the fields of housing and urban renewal in order to meet the crisis in our cities."

The convention said it is "too late in the day for mere words or more commission reports."

Labor Job Conference Tackles Rights Issues

Representatives of the AFL-CIO, its affiliated unions, the government and civil rights groups thrashed out mutual problems and evaluated positive programs during a two-day AFL-CIO equal employment conference.

"There is much to be done in the area of positive programs in the community," said AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler in opening the conference. "We have much to learn."

AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dept. Dir. Don Slaiman told the gathering that while problems exist, particularly between union locals and federal government representatives, the emphasis "is now on affirmative action."

Civil rights leaders from some 40 unions, representing a vast majority of AFL-CIO members, attended the conference.

They exchanged experiences—good and bad—in implementing equal employment programs.

Officials of four agencies of the Dept. of Labor, including the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, took part in the conference.

Civil Rights Dept. staffers William E. Pollard, Doris G. Hardesty and Robert McGlotten, along with AFL-CIO Associate General Counsel Thomas E. Harris chaired panels which detailed union programs and procedures, particularly those involving government agencies.

John W. Livingston, retired AFL-CIO organizing director who was recently appointed labor liaison man to the National Alliance of Businessmen, told the audience of the group's job development plans.

The program to place 100,000 hard-core unemployed in jobs in 50 major cities this year, he said, will affect the trade union movement directly.

He said there will be a strong demand to develop attitudes—from the personnel director to the foreman to the fellow worker—that will help the hard core unemployed adjust to the world of the employed.

As to the future of the program, Livingston asserted:

"The hard core unemployed are going to get jobs. There is no doubt about that."

Four Companies Involved:

Scattered Holdouts Continue in Copper

Members of four unions returned to work in the copper industry after ratifying new agreements but three independent firms and one of the Big Four companies continued to resist settlement in the final holdout segment of the industry.

The Anaconda Co. offered the industry contract "pattern" to end strikes of 6,400 workers at its U.S. and Canadian brass mills where the Steelworkers, Auto Workers and Machinists hold bargaining rights. Kennecott Copper Corp. also agreed to the pattern for 1,350 members of the Machinists at its Chase Brass plant in Euclid, O.

While negotiations dragged on in Washington, D.C., Anaconda refused, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, to make an acceptable offer to the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and the Teamsters for 2,600 strikers in its wire and cable mills at Marion, Ind., Sycamore, Ill., Muskegon, Mich. and Hastings-on-Hudson, N.Y.

Also holding out were the last three of seven independents in the nine-month copper strike. They are the Cerro Corp. with 650 brass mill workers at Cleveland, O., and Stamford, Conn.; Hecla Mining Co. with 135 silver and lead miners at Wallace, Ida., and New Haven Copper Co., employing 125 at a Seymour, Conn., brass mill.

Stalemate Ended

The strike, which at its height affected 60,000 workers who began walking out last July 15, was stalemated until Pres. Johnson called Big Four management and representatives of 26 unions to the White House for intensified talks.

Anaconda workers have started back to their jobs at brass plants in Buffalo, N.Y.; Toronto, Ont.; Los Angeles, Detroit, Kenosha, Wis., and Ansonia and Waterbury, Conn.

Their 40-month contract provides wage increases of 50 cents an hour, including elimination of rate ranges for production workers and increment increases between every rate classification. Also won were a basic pension benefit of $5 per month retroactive to the former contract expiration; other pension and insurance improvements, and better vacation and shift differential language.

At Chase Brass, IAM members won a 51-cent wage package in a 3.5-year pact; the $5 monthly pension benefit; ninth paid holiday; a fifth vacation week after 25 years of service; a new supplemental unemployment insurance program; full company payment of hospitalization insurance; and retention of the union's right to strike over unsettled grievances.

In other industry-wide negotiations, talks began in New York City on new contract terms for 50,000 employes of major aluminum firms. Proposals for substantial pay raises were submitted by the Steelworkers and the Aluminum Workers.

Union contracts with five companies expire May 31—the Aluminum Co. of America, Reynolds Metals Co., Kaiser Aluminum & Chemical Corp., Olin Mathieson Corp. and Ormet, Inc.

Meany Cited For Work on Racial Justice

The John LaFarge Memorial Award for Interacial Justice will be presented to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany by the Catholic Interracial Council of New York on April 25.

New York's Archbishop Terrence J. Cooke will make the presentation to Meany at a dinner in the New York Hilton Hotel.

The award is a hand illuminated scroll made by Carmelite nuns. It cites Meany "for his important contributions in the field of interracial justice; his untiring efforts to secure equality of opportunity for minority youths in apprenticeship programs; the elimination of racial barriers in employment and housing and for his international role as a labor statesman in support of the reestablishment and preservation of free trade union movements in many parts of the world."

The late Father LaFarge founded the council in 1934. A Jesuit priest, he devoted many years to combating racial bigotry and discrimination.

The council is composed of white and Negro Catholics. It works at the parish and governmental levels to improve understanding between various ethnic groups.

Union Helps Members Catch Up on Schooling

New York—Gray-haired building superintendents, maintenance men, elevator operators, doormen—all are going to school four nights a week here under a program sponsored by Building Service Employes Local 32B.

Their ages vary widely. Most of them attended high school years ago but never graduated. Some never completed grade school. All are eager for knowledge.

Those who complete the 15-week course at Robert Wagner Junior High School in Manhattan and pass a state examination are entitled to a high school equivalency diploma that has the same validity as one offered by a four-year high school.

Classes meet for two and a half hours each of the four nights. Courses cover English grammar, literature, social studies, natural sciences and mathematics. Instruction is given by teachers licensed by the New York board of education.

In addition to this instruction, the classes make use of films and textbooks made available by the Manpower Education Institute for "TV High School," a series recently televised over an education network in 55 cities.

MEA is a non-profit organization, supported by labor, management and foundations. Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City AFL-CIO and Hugh Sheridan, a trucking industry official, are its co-chairmen.

Thomas Shortman, president of 32B and a BSEIU vice president, said that if the first group of member-students finds the course rewarding, it will be repeated for other members of the local.

"We're trying to impress on our members the fact that they are never too old, and that it's never too late, to learn," he added.

AFL-CIO Attorney Charges:

Law-Breaking Employers Seek To Curb Labor Board's Power

The employers who are the most abusive in criticizing the National Labor Relations Board are the same ones who engage in "repeated and crass" violations of the law it administers, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

Criticisms from such employers "are not, in our judgment, entitled to serious consideration," Thomas E. Harris, AFL-CIO associate general counsel, testified before a Senate Judiciary subcommittee.

The subcommittee, headed by Sen. Sam Ervin (D-N.C.), is holding hearings into charges by conservative lawmakers and some employers that the board has exceeded its congressional authority.

There is no legislation before the subcommittee. And ordinarily the Senate Labor Committee has jurisdiction over matters relating to the NLRB.

However, the subcommittee's lead witness, Sen. Robert P. Griffin (R-Mich.), co-author of the Landrum-Griffin Act, took the occasion to call for replacing the NLRB with a "labor court."

His labor court proposal is being pushed by employer organizations which have indicated that they plan a major legislative attack on unions if the 1968 elections bring in a more conservative Congress.

Harris pointed to southeastern textile firms as "prime examples" of employers who are "most vituperative" in criticizing the board while at the same time violating the law by denying workers their rights.

Some of these companies, he said, have repeatedly been found guilty by the board and courts of violations that "most frequently take the form of discharging employes for union membership and activity."

In his testimony, Harris pointed out that such employers are not to be confused with other major employers who oppose unionization of their workers "but who implement their opposition within the framework" of the law.

"They oppose unions, but they obey the rules," Harris said.

In discussing labor attitudes, Harris said that most labor organizations oppose certain provisions of the law "as unfair to unions" while others would like to see the law repealed.

But, he expressed a belief that "the majority of unions feel that they still need the protections of the act and that the board does a pretty good job of administering the statutory protections."

Turning to Sen. Griffin, Harris charged that he had engaged in an "intemperate" attack on the board in claiming that it had emasculated the Landrum-Griffin Act by upholding unions' rights to levy fines in certain cases.

He quoted contradictory statements by Griffin—one in which he claimed the board violated the intent of Congress and another in which he said that if Congress had known what direction the board would take it would have prevented fines.

As for Griffin's overall contention that the NLRB "misinterprets" the law, Harris said that it is refuted by the high percentage of board decisions upheld in the courts: "It was sustained in more than 80 percent of the cases last year."

Continuity Urged

Harris criticized the board in one area. He proposed that it "attach a greater value to continuity of doctrine." Such continuity, he said, is best maintained if board members "are not totally" attached to either labor or management.

He recalled the Eisenhower Administration when there was "great bitterness" in labor's ranks over a board that unions said was stacked with management representatives.

Noting that during this period the board was reversed by the courts "with greater frequency than ever before or since," Harris termed it an "unfortunate episode" in NLRB history.

"By and large, however," Harris concluded, "we think that the board and the general counsel have over the years discharged their extremely difficult roles creditably and with fairness.

"We see no reason to think that any different sort of board, or commission, or court, would have done any better."

'Harm' Came from Boss, Not Union, NLRB Finds

An employer who predicted that "serious harm" would befall his employes if they joined a union was ordered by the National Labor Relations Board to stop helping to make that prediction come true.

The board ordered Southland Manufacturing Co., Inc., and Block-Southland Sportswear, Inc., which makes and ships men's shirts in a jointly owned operation at Wilmington, N.C., to reinstate 11 fired employes, to expunge warning notices from the files of eight workers who attended NLRB hearings, to stop threatening other employes with loss of benefits and to bargain with the Clothing Workers.

The union began an organizing campaign at the firm's two plants in October 1965 and soon sent the employer and his employes a letter listing the names of 30 members of the ACWA organizing committee. The company refused recognition but suggested an NLRB election and, when the union petitioned for a vote, management launched what the board labeled a "course of massive unlawful conduct in violation" of the rights of the rights of its employes.

During the campaign, the company president made a speech and sent letters to employes saying "we sincerely believe that if the union were to get in here, it would not work for your benefit but, in the long run, would itself operate to your serious harm."

A trial examiner reasoned that, although the company then engaged in numerous unfair labor practices, the "serious harm" statement was "ambiguous."

The board disagreed. It said that the "serious harm which respondent correctly predicted would befall union adherents was not merely an isolated opinion unrelated" to the firm's unlawful misconduct. In fact the owners through their supervisors threatened to close the plant and engaged in 30 other separate instances of "coercive antiunion activity."

Among the employes fired for union activity, the NLRB found, were four who refused to sign warning slips issued by the company for failing to notify a foreman that they would be absent for a second day of NLRB hearings, though they had given notice of the first day's absences.

The NLRB members set aside an election lost by the union because of management interference.

World Labor Joins In Mourning for King

Labor spokesmen from all over the free world joined with leaders of the American trade union movement in expressing their shock and indignation over the death of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. Here are excerpts from some of the messages and statements.

Sec.-Gen. Harm G. Buiter, Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions: "Entire free trade union movement shares your deep shock and grief at loss to America and world of Dr. King. . . . We pay tribute to his steadfast courage and his inestimable contribution to struggle against racial discrimination, a struggle to which the international free trade union movement is pledged."

Gen.-Sec. Arturo Jauregui, Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers: "We in ORIT realize the tremendous shock this has been for you and the AFL-CIO because of the leading role you have taken in the struggle for justice and equality for all, particularly in the field of civil rights and national integration regardless of race, creed or color. Perhaps the Rev. King's sacrifice will bring this goal closer to realization."

Dir.-Gen. David A. Morse, Intl. Labor Organization: "As an American and as the executive head of ILO, which is concerned with the problems relating to the world social conscience, I send you (Mrs. King) my deep feeling of shock at the assassination of your husband and my assurance that we shall do everything possible in our work to eventually achieve the noble objectives for which your husband gave his life."

Trades Union Congress, Ghana — "The Trades Union Congress and the whole working people of Ghana are shocked by the assassination of Dr. King. The Congress vehemently deplores and condemns such a cowardly act."

Pres. P. Mentsen, Norwegian Federation of Trade Unions—"The Norwegian Federation is seriously shocked by the death of Dr. King. Kindly express to his wife and family our deepest sympathy. It is our conviction that the cause for which he gave his life will be successful."

Pact Ratified, Strike Ends at Aniline Plants

Linden, N.J.—The Distillery Workers ended a two-months' walkout at the General Aniline & Film Co. complex here by voting three-to-one to accept a contract package said to total 48.5 cents an hour.

Pres. Mort Brandenburg said the settlement came after management shifted its stand away from a virtual status quo position. He credited the cooperation of other AFL-CIO unions and the mediatory efforts of Linden Mayor John T. Gregorio for helping achieve a settlement.

The new two-year agreement provides across-the-board wage adjustments of 8 cents an hour plus 15 cents for craft workers; an additional company contribution of 10 cents an hour for improved retirement benefits; and higher shift differentials.

Local 146 also achieved improved hospitalization and welfare benefits, strengthened job security language and a streamlined grievance procedure.

The local, which represents nearly 1,300 General Aniline employes, walked out Feb. 1 when the old agreement expired and management refused to improve an unsatisfactory offer, Brandenburg said.

Law Barring Age Bias in Hiring Seen Protecting Workers over 40

A law passed last December but given little public attention may make a big dent in the "too old at 40" age barrier to jobs.

The labor-backed legislation, which takes effect June 12, bars discrimination because of age—in hiring, conditions of employment and retention on the job—for workers between the ages of 40 and 65.

Many of the details of the law still have to be spelled out in Labor Dept. regulations, but a department pamphlet gives a broad outline of the provisions.

The new law applies to employers, employment agencies and unions in establishments which are covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act and which employ at least 25 persons. (Through a quirk in the legislation, only firms with 50 or more workers are covered between June 12 and June 30.)

After the effective date, it will be illegal for an employer:

- To fail to hire, or to discharge or otherwise discriminate against a worker or job applicant because of age.
- To classify his employes on the basis of age so as to deprive any worker of employment opportunities.
- To cut any person's pay in order to comply with the law prohibiting age discrimination.

It will be illegal for employment agencies or unions to use age as a criterion for referring persons to jobs or for help wanted advertisements to indicate any age preference or limitation.

There is a broad area of discretion in the administration of the law. An employer who can demonstrate that age is a valid occupational qualification for the job to be filled is exempt.

Likewise, the law will not interfere with the operations of any legitimate seniority system or pension plan. But the existence of a pension plan will not be considered justification for refusal to hire an older worker.

The Labor Dept. is given authority for enforcement of the new law, and lost wages or back pay will be considered the same as money due employes in cases where the wage-hour law has been violated.

The secretary of labor is empowered to bring civil suit to correct violations, but first must attempt to secure voluntary compliance.

Metal Polishers Re-Elect Officers

Cincinnati—Delegates to the 26th convention of the Metal Polishers here re-elected James Siebert as president and secretary-treasurer and E. F. Wilburn as the union's international vice president.

These executive board members also were chosen: Ervin Reinhart, Cleveland; John Grzenia, Chicago; Arthur Scheuermann, Newark; Eugene Allen, Louisville; Castroma Thompson, Los Angeles; Andrew Hay, Buffalo; Albert Smolarick, Seattle, and William Zarevich, San Francisco.

During four days of sessions, some 150 delegates also passed a number of constitutional changes which must be submitted to a union referendum in June.

Appeal to Congress:

Quick Action Urged On Urban Crisis Aid

The Urban Coalition has urged Congress, in memory of the slain Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., to stay in session "until those legislative proposals aimed at attacking the crises confronting our cities are enacted into law."

The coalition—made up of labor, business, religious, civil rights and city government leaders—mourned the loss of Dr. King "as a courageous national leader and as a member of our steering committee."

Through its 15-member executive committee, the coalition urged lawmakers to pass "crises" legislation to provide jobs, education, housing and community services.

It proposed a "reordering of national priorities" so that Congress would have the basis for increasing expenditures for these programs, not threatening to cut them as some lawmakers are doing.

"Such cuts, irrational by definition, could produce tragic results," the coalition warned.

To pay for added costs of passing cities legislation, the coalition supported Pres. Johnson's call for a tax increase, provided Congress sets the "reordering of priorities."

High on the coalition's list of "must" legislation was a program to create 1 million "meaningful" jobs in public service employment "for citizens able and willing to work but unable to find employment in the private sector."

Legislation to establish the program was introduced in the last session of Congress but not acted upon. The measure is again before Congress this year and is supported by the AFL-CIO.

The coalition urged public and private action "to bring about the rehabilitation or construction of housing units for low-income families" at the rate of 1 million units annually within three years.

The coalition called for approval of a $279 million supplemental appropriation for the Office of Economic Opportunity, "which should have been passed long before now."

The money, the coalition pointed out, is needed to raise current OEO appropriations to the level authorized for fiscal 1968, replace funds diverted from OEO and finance special summer jobs, education and recreation programs.

In another area, the coalition strongly endorsed the report of the President's Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders and pledged to seek action to implement it.

Labor Rallies Assistance to Riot Victims

The AFL-CIO called on all union members involved in community services activities to help rally assistance for the victims of the recent riots.

A letter to all local community services representatives and local union chairmen of community services committees pointed out that the trade union movement's job is to aid all victims of "man-made disasters on the basis of need regardless of the cause of the need."

Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis cited the statement adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council in February calling on all community agencies to provide aid to victims of riots and to plan programs that can go into operation in an emergency.

The need of the riot victims is for food, shelter, clothing, medical care, legal aid, family counseling and jobs, Perlis said.

He urged the CSA representatives to set up programs in cooperation with public and voluntary agencies, to recruit volunteers, use union and agency facilities wherever possible, initiate necessary campaigns and help locate jobs.

VICE PRES. HUMPHREY was greeted with a four-minute clapping, shouting, dancing demonstration by 2,500 persons when he addressed the Pennsylvania State AFL-CIO convention in Pittsburgh. Left to right: Pittsburgh Mayor Joseph Barr, Pres. Edward J. Leonard of the Plasterers, Humphrey, and Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers.

Drive Opens For Election Of Humphrey

A committee of prominent Americans, including AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, has been formed "with the mission of electing Hubert Humphrey President of the United States."

Governors, mayors, senators, congressmen, business and farm leaders joined in establishing the United Democrats for Humphrey. Former Pres. Harry S. Truman is the honorary chairman.

The new organization committed itself to three objectives:

- To persuade Humphrey to declare his availability for the nomination.
- To help bring about his nomination at the Democratic convention.
- To "work with people in all walks of life and with a united Democratic Party" to elect Humphrey.

The United Democrats said Humphrey has earned America's trust "through years of devotion to the cause of sound liberalism" and has been instrumental in translating his principles into reality.

Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.), who presided at a Washington news conference, said the group is confident that Humphrey will become a candidate, will win the nomination, and will go on to win the election.

Adding to the surge of trade union support for Humphrey was a strong endorsement from the Ladies' Garment Workers.

Pres. Louis Stulberg announced that the ILG board voted unanimously to urge Humphrey to run and back him for the presidential nomination.

nationwide ghetto disorders on the job picture, Henle replied that he did not think they would have much of an impact.

The overall jobless rate of 3.6 percent for March was down from 3.7 percent in February but is still above the 3.5 percent registered in January. The rate is adjusted to compensate for seasonal influences.

The unemployed workers totaled 2.9 million in March, about the same as a year earlier, the report said. Of these, 1.2 million are adult men, 1 million adult women and 70,000 teenagers.

Non-white unemployment totaled 615,000 or about one-fifth of the total unemployed in March.

One Plus Factor

However, there was a slight improvement in the jobless rate of Negroes over the year. The nonwhite jobless rate stood at 6.8 percent for the first quarter of 1968 compared to 7.1 percent for the same period in 1967 and 1966.

The jobless rate for married men, the important breadwinner group, remained low at 1.7 percent in March. The rate edged down to 2.2 percent for adult men and dropped to 3.7 from 4 percent for adult women. The usually volatile teenage jobless rate moved up to 13 from 12.6 percent the month before.

The Labor Dept. report noted that jobless rates continued comparatively high at 7.8 percent for non-farm laborers and 4.7 percent for operatives. Rates remained low at 1.9 percent for white-collar workers and 2.6 percent for craftsmen.

Total employment stood at a high of 75.8 million in March, seasonally adjusted. The report said a rise of 180,000 in non-farm jobs, mainly among women and teenage boys, was partially offset by a decline in farm jobs.

The longterm shift in employment from the goods-producing to the service-producing industries was continuing, the report observed.

Between March 1967 and March 1968, job gains totaled 620,000 in state and local government, 480,000 in services, 445,000 in trade and 150,000 in finance.

In contrast, the report said, employment in construction rose by 115,000 and in manufacturing by only 80,000.

Over the past decade, the Labor Dept. said, employment in the service-producing industries has risen three times as fast as employment in the goods-producing area.

In hours and earnings, the report said the workweek for rank and file workers in private industry remained unchanged over the month at 37.7 hours while weekly earnings rose by 38 cents to $104.43, up $4.87 over the year.

The average workweek of factory production workers was unchanged at 40.7 hours, seasonally adjusted. Average weekly earnings of factory production workers were $120.18, up $7.74 since March 1967.

The largest part of this over-the-year rise was due to higher hourly earnings, up from $2.79 to $2.96 or 6.1 percent, the report said.

Labor, Management Join To Promote Bargaining

New York—Labor and management joined in a new cooperative effort here to improve and promote the processes of collective bargaining and to apply them to automation by helping to solve the employment problems it creates.

Fourteen skilled practitioners of the art of bargaining were elected to the board of the new Institute of Collective Bargaining & Group Relations at the first institute meeting here.

The institute's officers are Pres. E. T. Klassen of the American Can Co., board chairman; Pres. P. L. Siemiller of the Machinists, vice chairman; Lane Kirkland, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, institute president; Victor Borella, formerly executive vice president of the Rockefeller Center Inc., vice president.

Directors are: from labor ranks, Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers, Pres. Max Greenberg of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union; Pres. John H. Lyons, Jr., of the Iron Workers; Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City AFL-CIO, and Pres. Bertram A. Powers of Typographical Local 6.

Directors from business: Vice Pres. Frank L. Gallucci of Essex Wire Corp.; Industrial Relations Dir. Walter K. Graham of the New York Daily News; Pres. Ralph Gross, Commerce and Industry Assn. of New York, Inc.; Pres. Efrem A. Kahn, E. A. Kahn & Co., Inc., and Joseph E. O'Grady, former chairman, New York City Transit Authority.

The institute was founded on the premise that there is "no workable alternative to collective bargaining in a democratic society." Its aim is to "improve and promote the process rather than to seek a substitute for it."

Institute directors were brought together by the American Foundation on Automation & Employment, Inc., an organization created by labor and management to study the problems created by automation. The Machinists and U.S. Industries, Inc., set up the foundation in 1962.

Foundation Pres. Theodore W. Kheel, veteran labor-management disputes arbiter, and Dean David G. Moore of the school announced the plan under which the labor relations school will provide the institute with educational resources, with Dr. Matthew A. Kelly of Cornell as coordinating director.

Watson Appointed Post Office Head

Pres. Johnson has nominated his appointments secretary, W. Marvin Watson, to be postmaster general succeeding Lawrence F. O'Brien who has held the office since August 1965.

O'Brien had previously served Presidents Kennedy and Johnson as chief of congressional relations. He said he supports Sen. Robert F. Kennedy (D-N. Y.) in his bid for the Democratic presidential nomination but will not take an active role in the campaign.

CWA Postpones Strike During Crisis in Nation

The Communications Workers, citing the need for sustained information "in these extraordinary days of unleashed emotion and abnormal events," agreed to postpone a strike deadline for 200,000 telephone workers from Apr. 12 to Apr. 18 at 3 p.m.

CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne said the union executive board, knowing that a strike on Apr. 12 could add to the misery of America and could adversely affect our total communications system, has "agreed to my suggestion to postpone strike action against the Bell" system.

"In the meantime we hope for national sanity and unity to be restored," Beirne said, "and further hope that management of the Bell System will recognize the privilege they enjoy of managing a public utility for profit, and reach agreement with the union" before the new deadline.

CWA contracts with 13 Bell companies owned by the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., the world's largest and most profitable communications firm, have expired and strike authorizations have been voted by heavy majorities of the telephone workers and equipment installers involved.

The union prefers not to strike but management has refused to improve the rejected offers and no additional meetings have been held since the first walkout deadline was set, according to CWA.

Beirne issued a statement saying that the "brutal, senseless assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., has produced . . . a national spectacle of violence, which he deplored."

Knowing that a strike of CWA workers at this time could "adversely affect our total communications system and add to the misery of America," the union will postpone strike action to encourage the possibility of a peaceful settlement, its president said.

Garbagemen Win Key Aims In 65-Day Memphis Strike

Bell Strike Under Way, Talks Fail

By Eugene A. Kelly

More than 200,000 members of the Communications Workers walked out Apr. 18 and set up picket lines at Bell Telephone exchanges in 48 states after Bell management turned down five different union proposals for a wage settlement.

Up to 200,000 additional union members were reported ready to respect picket lines of striking linemen, equipment installers, telephone operators and commercial employes in the first coast-to-coast telephone strike in 21 years. Most of these are Bell company employes whose contracts have not yet expired.

Start of Walkout

At its start, the walkout affected 23,000 employes of Western Electric, the manufacturing arm of the Bell system, and more than 150,000 others at the following Bell companies: Ohio Bell, Wisconsin Telephone Co., Northwestern Bell, serving Iowa, North and South Dakota, Minnesota and Nebraska; Illinois, New Jersey and Michigan Bell, Cincinnati & Suburban Bell, Pacific Northwest Bell, serving Washington and Idaho, and Chesapeake & Potomac Bell of Washington D.C.

CWA members in two other Bell companies also were preparing to strike as the AFL-CIO News went to press—Indiana Bell and Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co.

STANDING VOTE of unanimous approval for strike-ending settlement was given by garbage workers in Memphis, Tenn., members of State, County & Municipal Employes Local 1733. The local won a 14-month contract with union recognition, a wage increase, dues checkoff and a grievance procedure—nearly all of its major demands.

Civil Rights, Labor Unity Gains Pact

Memphis, Tenn. — Striking Memphis garbage workers scored a dramatic victory as they ratified a contract agreement with the city to achieve their demands for basic trade union rights and end their agonizing, 65-day dispute.

The strike by 1,300 members of State, County & Municipal Employes Local 1733 had won the solid support of the labor movement, civil rights leaders, clergymen of all faiths and people throughout the nation.

It was the cause that brought Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., to Memphis where he was struck down by an assassin's bullet as he prepared to lead a march in support of the strikers, nearly all of them Negroes.

Settlement of the dispute was reached on April 16 following lengthy bargaining sessions conducted with the aid of Under Sec. of Labor James J. Reynolds and Frank Miles, a local mediator. Reynolds was assigned by Pres. Johnson to mediate the dispute following Dr. King's assassination.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany sent the following telegram to Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes:

"Warmest congratulations to Memphis strikers on their solid victory. Their unity and steadfastness in face of tremendous odds were in the highest trade union tradition. You and fellow officers have every reason to be proud of these workers and the support they received from trade union movement and its friends."

Broad-Based Support:

Major Drive Opens For Safety Standards

A broad-based public interest coalition, including the AFL-CIO, has been set up to push for passage of the Administration's Occupational Safety & Health bill.

The legislation is "too important to remain part of the unfinished business of America," Msgr. George G. Higgins, social action director of the U.S. Catholic Conference, told the founding meeting.

He and other speakers warned that a massive employer campaign is under way to kill or sidetrack the legislation, spurred on by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

The joint committee, set up by about 100 representatives of labor, consumer, religious and health organizations, set as its goal the mobilization of a strong showing of public support for the bill.

Msgr. Higgins and Dr. Lorin E. Kerr, president of the Group Health Association of America, were named co-chairmen of the Joint Committee on Occupational Safety & Health. William R. Hutton, executive director of the National Council of Senior Citizens, will serve as executive secretary.

Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson and Assistant Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Philip Lee spoke of the need for the bill.

Can Save Lives

"It can save thousands of lives," Mrs. Peterson said, and "prevent hundreds of thousands of disabling injuries."

She urged that the participating organizations "walk the halls of Congress together in this effort."

Dr. Lee stressed that the bill would provide tools and research to combat the "increased hazards of the future," including new chemcals and new products, as well as "the hazards we know today."

Congressional aides reported to the group that only a handful of letters supporting the safety and health bill have reached Capitol

C of C Sounds Shrill Alarm On Safety Bill

Pity the poor employer.

If he depends on the U.S. Chamber of Commerce for information about the Administration's job safety and occupational health bill, his future is indeed dismal.

The April issue of the chamber's magazine, Nation's Business, gets turned on and paints an almost psychedelic picture of what might happen if the federal government rather than the states had authority to set safety and health standards.

"A young man barges in. You recognize him as a man you once refused to hire. He had no education and no potential talent you could use. His main experience consisted of cashing welfare checks."

But, Nation's Business specu-

'The Man No One Knew' Left His Money to COPE

St. Louis—His name was Herman Goltz. And there's not much more that anyone knows of him. He managed some rental property in downtown St. Louis and had no living relatives. If he had ever been a union member, there's no record of it.

When he died, he left a small estate of less than $4,000—and a will.

Half his money, Mr. Goltz wrote, was to go to labor's Committee on Political Education—COPE. The remainder was to be divided between the St. Louis Catholic Archdiocese and the Protestant Children's Home of St. Louis.

More than two years after his death, the estate was distributed by the court in accordance with his will. Accepting the $1,650 bequest on behalf of St. Louis COPE were Pres. Oscar A. Ehrhardt and Sec.-Treas. James W. Brown of the St. Louis AFL-CIO and Women's Activities Dir. Caroline Babbitt.

So the first bequest ever made to COPE was from the man no one knew, but who knew and believed in labor's political action program.

"The money will be put to good use," Ehrhardt pledged.

Congress Asked to Lift Dollar Bar to College

Labor urged Congress to move the nation closer to the day "when the dollar sign no longer guards the admission gates" to the nation's colleges.

Federal aid to colleges and college students should be expanded, not merely continued, the AFL-CIO said in a statement to the Senate's subcommittee on education.

The federation stressed that college costs are rising at the same time that "higher education is becoming more and more of a prerequisite for a good job."

It said the result has been that "many American families are trapped in a vicious cycle. The father who wants his child 'to do better than the old man' cannot afford to pay the high cost of higher education. The child denied the higher educations is—all too often—denied the higher paid job. And the cycle continues."

Until there are free public colleges on the same basis as free elementary and secondary schools, "work-study programs, opportunity

Dystrophy Unit Names First Meany Fellow

Dr. Paul F. Larson, a neurologist on the staff of the Louisiana State University Medical School, has been chosen to receive the first George Meany Post-Doctoral Research Fellowship of the Muscular Dystrophy Associations of America (MDA).

He will use the fellowship, valued at $8,000, to conduct research work with Dr. John N. Walton, one of the world's top authorities on diseases of the neuromuscular system. He will conduct his research at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, England.

Dr. Larson was selected by the Scientific Advisory Board of MDA.

Dr. Larson, 34, received his Doctor of Medicine degree from George Washington University School of Medicine in Washington, D.C. He interned at Baptist and Charity Hospitals in New Orleans, La.

Entertainer Jerry Lewis, MDA chairman, announced the establishment of the fellowship at the AFL-CIO convention in December.

The fellowship will be awarded annually to an outstanding young scientist working in the field of muscle research. It provides funds for full support, tuition and other fees.

U.S. Labor Helps Start Ethiopian Union Center

Addis Ababa, Ethiopia—An AFL-CIO delegation visiting this ancient land joined with Emperor Haile Selassie in cornerstone ceremonies for a building to house the five-year-old Confederation of Ethiopian Labor Unions.

The $300,000 headquarters is being financed by the African-American Labor Center on land donated by the emperor. British, German and American unions will help to furnish it.

American labor was represented by AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Max Greenberg and Paul L. Phillips, along with Dean Cowles, deputy director of the African-American Labor Center (AALC).

After their four-day stay in Ethiopia, they were scheduled to visit five other African nations, meeting with union leaders in Kenya, Nigeria, Ghana, Ivory Coast and Upper Volta.

The building ceremony came at the conclusion of the Ethiopian labor federation's fifth convention, attended by 120 delegates.

Greenberg, speaking for the U.S. delegation, said the new center will be "a symbol of solidarity and friendship" between American and Ethiopian workers. Earlier, he and the other U.S. union leaders had addressed the labor federation's convention. The talks included a moving eulogy of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

The emperor expressed his country's appreciation for the AALC's assistance and stressed his desire to see the nation's living standards raised in an atmosphere of industrial peace.

The president of the Ethiopian labor federation, Ato Beyene Solomon, spoke of his organization's goals and accomplishments. It now represents 108 unions.

Also present for the convention was Albert Tevoedjre, regional coordinator for the Intl. Labor Organization.

Safety Standards Evoke C of C's Wildest Surmise

lates, he pulls out a card that shows he's now a Labor Dept. inspector. "And he threatens to padlock your gates and have you fined $1,000 a day if you don't do as he says."

He then "tramps through your plant" and orders "costly steps to improve safety and health."

His power, exercised in the name of the secretary of labor, would even extend to the "women's rest rooms," the business publication warns.

After the poor businessman finds his shop padlocked and his firm "blackballed from government contracts," can he try to forget his troubles at a football game?

Don't count on it, Nation's Business warns its readers. It claims that the legislation "also opens the doors for the labor secretary to . . . cancel any professional football game should he decide, say, that tag football would be safer and healthier than tackle."

And he couldn't even flee by plane. The magazine tosses out the thought that the government might decide there should be "an exit by every seat in an airplane" and "the cost would be so high we wouldn't have air travel any more."

On top of all this, the Chamber of Commerce publication sees the proposed legislation as a tool to help unions in disputes with employers.

Straw Men

Here are some of the straw men it sets up:

"The labor secretary could help strikers by ruling that it is unsafe during a strike for supervisors and others to try to carry on production as a skeleton crew.

"Once the labor secretary starts ordering what the working conditions must be in firms, unions can mass their bargaining powers on the juicier aims of bigger wages and shorter hours."

In fact, Nation's Business suggests, whenever unions and management are deadlocked in contract negotiations, a union could force the boss to give in by threatening to get the secretary of labor to close down the plant.

Interestingly, the Chamber of Commerce indulged in no such wild speculations when it testified at congressional hearings on the legislation. It contended itself with saying that American business is doing a pretty good job voluntarily and that there perhaps should be a study by a national commission before legislation is enacted.

The Nation's Business article is stronger meat, however. Its headline warns that Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz "wants the power to shut you down in the name of health and safety." And it carries a price list for quantity reprints of the article, titled "Life or Death for Your Business."

Drive Opens In Support of Job-Safety Bill

Hill—in contrast to the organized employer campaign.

Msgr. Higgins told the participants that "since on-the-job health and safety touches all of us, or our families, I think it is time that a concerned citizenry let Congress know how we feel."

Until federal standards are established, he warned, states will tend to compete "at the expense of health and safety in the plant, the mine, and on construction sites."

Citing statistics on the mounting toll of occupational deaths, injuries and illnesses, Msgr. Higgins declared: "Such a sacrifice is not necessary. The goods and services our nation provides in greater abundance than any other country need not be stained with the blood of its workers."

Additional national organizations will be invited to take part in the effort, the committee officers announced.

Jennings Appointed To Apprentice Panel

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz announced the appointment of Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers as one of five labor representatives on the Federal Committee on Apprenticeship, which advises the secretary on apprentice training matters.

Previously serving were Sec.-Treas. David S. Turner of the Sheet Metal Workers, Pres. Michael Fox of the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes' Dept., Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and Vice Pres. George L. Watkins, Machinists.

Coast-to-Coast:

CWA Strikes Bell As Pay Talks Fail

Co., employes represented by both CWA and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers were on the picket line. IBEW Local 827, which bargains for 8,300 plant workers all over the state, began going out after its contract expired Apr. 15.

In Washington, D.C., CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne said his union made repeated efforts to get a settlement its members would accept without a strike, but that all had failed. Beirne told a press conference an hour before the strike deadline:

"The strike is now on. In Alabama, picket lines have been established because Southern Bell endeavored to intimidate its employes. In other states, our members will set up their own lines.

'Still Trying'

"We in the union want the public to know that we are still trying very hard to find a way to convince Bell management that our proposals are reasonable. The position of CWA is not frozen."

There is an area, Beirne said, in which agreement can be found and "we in CWA hope the area is broad enough that an agreement will come soon. We stand ready to pursue any possibilities that will return our members to their jobs at the earliest possible minute."

Beirne and other union negotiators joined CWA pickets as the strike deadline came without any improvement in a prior company offer that the union called "too small" by at least 3 percent.

CWA first set an Apr. 12 deadline for agreement but extended it for six days following the assassination of the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., and the civil disorder that ensued in many cities.

CWA locals, he said, rejected a "final" management offer late in March for these reasons: "insufficient money, retrogression for workers with longer service, inadequate consideration for pensioned workers and employes who must work at night, and a number of critical items" in local union contracts.

In 1968 negotiations, CWA designated Western Electric as the pace-setter for all its Bell System contracts. An acceptable offer to the 23,000 WE installers still could set a pattern for settlements with all other Bell companies, the union said.

Last month the CWA executive board authorized Beirne to call strikes if the companies did not improve wage offers that union members voted down as inadequate—in some cases by 15-1 margins. Beirne then set the April target dates.

CWA represents the installers of telephone equipment and also Bell operators, plant and commercial employes. The IBEW represents installers, repairmen, splicers, linemen and central office workers in New Jersey and other states.

The "final" offers of the companies rejected by the unions called for an 18-month increase totaling 7.25 percent for CWA members, and one averaging about 20 cents an hour maximum for IBEW plant employes.

Too Little

Beirne said the offer to his union fell short by about 3 percent of the 10.25 percent raise that CWA believed a fair minimum in view of worker productivity, corporation profits and wage comparability with other less profitable industries.

"This is a controlled industry, and a highly profitable one. It is well able to meet the needs of its workers," Beirne declared.

All Bell companies, Beirne said, are affiliates of the giant American Telephone & Telegraph Co., which reported profits of $2 billion last year and in the first three months of 1968 set a new and higher profit rate.

At the strike deadline, Beirne said all attempts by his union, government agencies and Dir. William E. Simkin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service to help settle the dispute had failed and the strike would go on.

"We have held marathon discussions for the last 10 days but we are still hung up over items that would have but small cost value to the company," Beirne said.

He recalled that his union had on Mar. 19 made a "sincere proposal to submit our proposal to voluntary arbitration." The attempt failed, he said.

Hearst Rebuffs Efforts Of L.A. Mediation Panel

Los Angeles—Local Hearst Corp. interests have scorned a City Hall attempt to end a four-month strike-lockout at the nation's largest evening newspaper, the Herald-Examiner, which has idled 2,000 members of 10 AFL-CIO unions.

The Hearst management snub of a special three-man panel named Mar. 18 by Mayor Sam Yorty will be held up to public scrutiny in a statement to be issued by panel members shortly.

Union officials have maintained that the company is embarked on a union-busting crusade.

Publisher George R. Hearst, Jr., grandson of the late William Randolph Hearst, founder of the newspaper and magazine empire, turned down a telegraphed request to meet privately with the panel Apr. 12. Earlier, union officials had met with the panel.

Hearst has been publishing the struck paper with the aid of imported professional strikebreakers and regular non-union employes. Organized labor has fought the use of strikebreakers by Hearst with boycotts against company publications and advertisers who use them.

Editor and Publisher, the newspaper industry publication, this month reported Media Records Inc. figures showing the Herald-Examiner lost more than 800,000 lines of advertising in February, compared with the same month last year. In January, the loss was nearly 1 million lines.

The two-month advertising losses are estimated to have cost the paper over $2.25 million.

Circulation has dived from a pre-strike 725,000 daily to 300,000.

The Yorty panel was chaired by Lloyd H. Bailer of Los Angeles, a veteran arbitrator.

The dispute erupted Dec. 15 when 1,100 Newspaper Guild members and 15 Machinists walked out in support of contract demands. Hearst promptly locked out about 700 printers, mailers, pressmen, stereotypers and paper handlers.

Unity in Memphis:

Garbagemen Score Dramatic New Gains

Local Pres. T. O. Jones explained the terms of the agreement embodying most of the local's main demands to a packed meeting of the members in the Clayborn A.M.E. Temple.

The 14-month pact provides for union recognition and a voluntary checkoff of union dues through the Public Works Dept.'s credit union.

The workers whose basic pay now averages $1.73 an hour, will be given a 10-cent an hour wage boost May 1 and another five-cent boost on Sept. 1.

The local won a four-step grievance procedure ending in arbitration along with an agreement that all strikers will be returned to their jobs without reprisals for strike activity or future union activity.

The contract, which expires June 30, 1969, also contains a non-discrimination clause calling for promotion on the basis of seniority and competence alone. Until now, only whites have been supervisors in the Public Works Dept.

Victory Demonstration

After the agreement was ratified by a unanimous standing vote, the local's members cheered, stamped their feet and hugged one another in a prolonged victory demonstration. Strikers and their leaders wept openly.

The contract was signed for the city by Mayor Henry Loeb and approved by the Memphis city council by a 12 to 1 vote.

Loeb was regarded as the chief obstacle to an earlier settlement of the strike. He had insisted that the workers accept an 8-cents-an-hour increase and refused to grant union recognition or the dues checkoff, even though the city deducts the dues of union transit employes. His answer to a call for a grievance procedure was that employes could voice complaints at his weekly "open house" at City Hall.

The union expressed gratitude to Reynolds and Miles for their efforts in helping to resolve the dispute and persuading Loeb to end his resistance.

Public attention was focused on the strike from its earliest stages through daily marches by the sanitationmen to City Hall, backed by local civil rights leaders and Negro clergymen.

The workers' protest also was extended to include a consumer boycott of downtown merchants, including a chain of laundries and restaurants owned by the mayor's brother William, and the city's two newspapers, which encouraged Loeb's stand against the union from the beginning of the dispute.

The struggle here gained national attention through the press and television, but the union contended that most of these accounts either ignored or misrepresented the issues.

Earlier Events

Dr. King came to Memphis in response to an appeal from local Negro leaders and led a march in support of the union that ended in violence when 30 young militants broke away and clashed with police.

On the evening of April 4, Dr. King was shot from ambush and killed after returning to the city to carry out a promise to lead a new, non-violent march on behalf of the workers.

The nation immediately plunged into a period of mourning on the one hand and looting and violence in city ghettos on the other. Federal and national guard troops were needed to restore order in a number of cities.

But, the march that Dr. King had planned in Memphis did go on, with his widow in the lead, followed by upwards of 40,000 people, black and white, including hundreds of trade unionists from all parts of the U.S.

The AFL-CIO created a fund to aid the striking sanitation men, with an initial contribution of $20,000. SCME leaders say the fund is growing and the union continues to welcome contributions to reimburse the strikers for losses.

Railroad Accident Rate Soars, Unions Ask Strong Safety Law

A letter from a government safety official to the Federal Railroad Administration citing the sharp rise in train accidents "proves anew the crying public need for a strong railroad safety law," a rail labor spokesman declared.

The letter was written by Joseph J. O'Connell, Jr., chairman of the National Transportation Safety Board. The comment came from Exec. Sec. Donald Beattie of the Railway Labor Executives' Association.

The board is charged with investigating accidents and making recommendations in all areas of transport safety, while FRA has jurisdiction over railroad safety. Both units are under the Dept. of Transportation.

O'Connell cited statistics over a six-year period to show that "the railroad accident picture is extremely serious" and is certain to continue its deterioration unless FRA acts "to reverse the accident trend."

Total train accidents, he noted, increased from 4,149 in 1961 to 6,793 in 1966—a rise of 63.7 percent—and, according to preliminary figures, increased to 7,089 in 1967, up 71 percent from 1961.

Deaths in train accidents went from 158 to 214 over the six-year period, up 35.4 percent. Track and equipment damage reported in train accidents rose from $50.4 million to $99 million, nearly 100 percent.

Derailments, the single most important cause of train accidents, increased from 2,671 in 1961 to 4,447 in 1966, up 66.5 percent.

Derailments attributed to employe negligence as a percent of total derailments remained stable from 1961 through 1966, O'Connell said, while the proportion of derailments caused by neglected or improper maintenance went up 44 percent.

The letter warned that "progressively deteriorating" track conditions, higher train speeds, longer trains and the growing carriage of hazardous materials is likely to increase accidents and their consequences.

"O'Connell's letter proves anew the crying public need for a strong railroad safety law," Beattie said. "At present there is no federal authority at all over the chief causes of train accidents."

Safety saves both lives and money, Beattie stressed. But, he said, "experience shows that many railroad managements won't act on this truth unless the government forces them to."

In another development, Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.), chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, wrote to Federal Railroad Administration A. Sheffer Lang asking for "an immediate report" on the O'Connell letter.

Magnuson told Lang that if he did not recommend new safety regulation legislation for railroads, Congress would act on its own. Bills to give the Dept. of Transportation new authority over rail safety have been introduced.

"Accidents seem to be occurring," Magnuson concluded, "because rail managements have failed to devote sufficient attention and resources to self-regulation."

Political Action, Education Stressed At Pennsylvania State Convention

Pittsburgh, Pa.—Labor's enemies are raising a record-breaking "war fund" to capture control of Congress and assure laws that will hog-tie unions and torpedo the general welfare, COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan warned the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO at its ninth convention here.

"Put your COPE educational campaigns on a seven-day week basis and get every member of every local aroused" to register, turn out the vote and collect at least $1 in voluntary donations from union workers, Barkan told the 2,000 delegates representing the state's 1.2 million union members.

Convention delegates contributed $2,277 for the COPE candidates' fund and state AFL-CIO officers added $941. They also stood in silent tribute to the memory of the murdered Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., elected a 40-member state executive board for a two-year term, and presented the state body's "good citizen of the year" award to the Rev. Jesse D. Reber, general secretary of the Pennsylvania Council of Churches, for his 21 years as "defender and supporter of the deprived and distressed."

State council officers were not on this year's convention ballot. Pres. Harry Boyer, Executive Vice Pres. Michael Johnson, Sec. Harry Block and Treas. Earl C. Bohr have another two years of their four-year terms to serve.

Earlier the convention had given a rousing reception to Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, punctuating his 50-minute address with applause at least 50 times. Humphrey said he was "very grateful" for a statement by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urging his candidacy for the U.S. presidency. Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel assured Humphrey of the "great desire" of Pennsylvania workers that he be the "next President of the United States"

The delegates voted support of four proposed amendments to the state constitution at the Apr. 23 primary election but called for defeat of another aimed at exempting public utility companies from payment of certain real estate taxes.

'Priority Commitment'

The convention called on all unions to make political action a "priority commitment" this year, to assign full-time staff members to political education work, to meet or exceed their COPE voluntary dollar quotas, and to cooperate fully with COPE to "repulse the conservative attack" on labor at the polls next Nov. 5.

On recommendation of the state executive council, the delegates approved a resolution calling on the state to provide basic educational services for all children of school age, in private or public schools, provided that it neither "advances nor inhibits religion," in line with a 1963 Supreme Court ruling.

Convention guests and speakers included Mrs. Muriel Humphrey, wife of the Vice President; Gov. Raymond P. Shafer (R); Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.); Mrs. Esther Peterson, assistant secretary of labor; Pres. Edward J. Leonard of the Plasterers; AFL-CIO Regional Dir. George Craig; Paul Ornburn of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., and Charles Douds, state mediation director.

Barkan warned the convention that "the complete package of bills to tie the hands of our unions is already prepared, including the replacement of the National Labor Relations Board with a labor court. What happened to us under the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin laws will look like a mild slap on the wrist compared to what they have in store for us."

5 New Leaflets Issued by COPE

The AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education has issued five sprightly new leaflets and mailers keyed to the register-and-vote theme.

All five are available in quantity for union get-out-the-vote campaigns at no charge. Samples of the leaflets should be requested from: COPE, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D. C. 20006.

Credit Interest Ceiling Sought In Washington

Seattle, Wash.—The Washington State AFL-CIO has launched a drive for an initiative measure to reduce the state's legal limit on true annual interest on retail credit sales from 18 to 12 percent.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Joseph Davis announced the filing of the initiative at Olympia, the state capital, at a press conference here. The notice was filed by State AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Marvin L. Williams.

The state federation must file petitions with 100,000 valid signatures before July 5 to put the initiative on the Nov. 5 general election ballot. "The time is short but the job can be done," Davis declared.

Davis said the move to get voters to reduce the interest ceiling was being taken because labor's appeals to the legislature and business to cut interest rates "have proven futile."

Also "triggering our action," he said, was "the callous announcement" of the National Bank of Commerce last month that it was raising the interest on its credit card system a "staggering" 50 percent May 1—from 12 to 18 percent.

"We shall need help," Davis said. "We ask for the support and aid of all citizens and organizations of goodwill in this crusade to cut credit costs."

The Resources Are There

THE TREMENDOUS WEALTH and productivity of the American economy has been reaffirmed in the first three months of 1968 with the total value of all goods and services hitting an annual rate of $827.3 billion.

This record-shattering dollar increase in the gross national product —$20 billion in a three-month period—testifies to the strength and durability of the economy.

Coupled with government reports disclosing a new record high in industrial production, booming retail sales and a dip in the unemployment rate, the picture is strikingly clear:

The country can afford to move in quickly and in strength to attack the crises confronting the cities.

Since the first three months of 1967 the real growth in the GNP—eliminating the factor of rising prices—has been 4.4 percent.

If the pace of the first three months of 1968 is maintained throughout the year the real growth will be about 6 percent.

TO ALLOW our cities to decay further or come ablaze with violence in face of this economic strength and substance is to reject the foundation principles of American democracy.

Yet there are those who in face of booming economic growth call for cuts in federal expenditures without regard to need or merit.

There are those who shrink from the booming prosperity that embraces the great majority of the American people and call for policies that would slow the growth, produce unemployment and ignore the urban crisis.

The nation has the wherewithal to solve its problems if it will but face up to the realities. These include increased government expenditures to provide jobs, decent housing, quality education for all, community services and a host of other unmet needs of the urban areas and the ghettos.

Our surging economy can provide the funds for these programs. The nation has the resources, and the ability. It requires at this point the understanding that unless we direct our strength to solving these critical problems, the nation itself is endangered.

THE NATION'S RESOURCES are great enough to tackle the job of setting aright the cities without weakening our efforts for freedom and liberty around the globe, especially in Viet Nam.

The AFL-CIO supports a fair and equitable tax increase to help pay for the cost of protecting freedom in Southeast Asia and tackling the job of wiping out the blight of poverty and of rebuilding America's cities.

A nation that can produce a gross national product of $827.3 billion can well afford to spend a portion of its wealth and resources to bring dignity and a decent standard of living to all its people.

America's economic strength is real and actual despite the banker-oriented fears of balance of payments and "confidence in the dollar." That strength must now be released to do the job that must be done if the nation is not to suffer further tragedies.

To Halt Racial Rift:

Rights Leadership Group Asks Action on Riot Panel's Report

The following is excerpted from a statement by the Executive Committee of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights on the report of the Kerner Commission—the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders.

WHEN THE KERNER COMMISSION declares "It is time now to end the destruction and violence, not only in the streets of the ghetto but in the lives of people," it presents a challenge to the entire nation. It is a challenge that we in the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights willingly accept.

The alternatives before the country, as the report presents them, have never been so stark.

Either we adopt and implement a national policy that fosters racial and economic integration at every level of American life, or we shall suffer the awful consequences foreshadowed in the report's basic conclusion that "our nation is moving toward two societies, one black, one white—separate and unequal."

Either we employ, educate and house our 33 million poor so that they may live decent, dignified lives or we face the prospect of years of domestic disorder and even the destruction of our democratic system.

We share with the commission the conviction that action must be taken now to "produce quick and visible progress." To this end, we call upon the President and members of Congress in both parties to join together and assure passage in this session of at least the following priority measures:

● Congress must approve the urgent supplemental appropriations for 1968 as soon as possible in order to bring funds up to authorized levels and make $75 million available for summer jobs programs and $25 million for Head Start.

● "Pervasive unemployment and underemployment," the Kerner Report observes, "are the most persistent and serious grievances in minority areas. They are inextricably linked to the problem of civil disorder." The commission calls for "immediate action to create two million new jobs over the next three years—one million in the public sector and one million in the private sector —to absorb the hard-core unemployed and materially reduce the level of underemployment for all workers, black and white." We urge Congress in this session to enact legislation implementing this recommendation.

The report also stresses the need to make good the promises of America for the rural as well as the urban poor and for all ethnic groups. One particular way of fulfilling these promises for the rural poor is to help agricultural workers organize by enacting the pending bill to bring them under the protection of the National Labor Relations Act.

● Congress must repeal the unconscionable provisions that limit federal participation in the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program and threaten to deny assistance to about 475,000 welfare recipients; force mothers of pre-school children to take part in work-training programs; deny unemployment compensation to fathers with no significant history of employment; and cut back medical care to welfare recipients.

● Governmental programs have thus far produced only 680,000 low-income housing units for the six million families that desperately need them. We, therefore, urge enactment of the Housing & Urban Development Act of 1968 to provide for necessary expansion in the construction of public housing and to make available adequate funds for the rent supplement and model cities programs. In construction of housing, preference must be given to projects that destroy ghetto patterns and make possible the creation of a single, integrated society.

We recognize that action on these programs is costly. But inaction will be far more costly in terms of wasted lives and in the threat to our democratic fabric. We agree with former Secretary of HEW John W. Gardner when he declared, "history is not going to deal kindly with a rich nation that refuses to tax itself to cure its miseries."

The Leadership Conference has long been committed to an integrated democratic, plural society, even as we are committed to the belief that this goal can and must be achieved through peaceful, democratic means and within the American political system. We reaffirm that commitment in the light of the Kerner Report, with a heightened sense of urgency.

Confusing Ends, Means:

Sacrificing Economic Growth Strange Way to Run a Country

The following column by Hobart Rowen, business and financial editor of the Washington Post, appeared in the Post on Apr. 7, 1968. It is reprinted here with the permission of the Washington Post Co.

WINSTON CHURCHILL once said that he did not become Britain's prime minister to preside over the liquidation of the Empire.

But the present chancellor of the exchequer, Roy Jenkins, facing the harsh realities which find his country living beyond its means may, by turning the economic screws, be presiding over the metamorphosis of Britain from a major world power to a small one.

Two weeks ago, Mr. Jenkins produced a new budget for Britain that raises taxes at the rate of $2.2 billion over a full year. For the British, this is a stunning amount. A comparable tax increase in our economy would be something on the order of $20 billions.

The whole program is designed to permit devaluation to work. The theory is that taxes on motoring, liquor, tobacco, and consumer luxuries will dampen demand at home, and force more of a rising British output into export channels.

Thus, the British public would "purchase" a balance of payments surplus by cutting their living standard at home. The cost of living for a British subject, counting the effects of the tax increase and last November's devaluation of the pound, apparently will rise about 6 percent.

Since wage increases are to be limited to 3.5 percent, it becomes clear why Jenkins himself said it would be a "hard slog" for the next two years.

In his discussions with key officials here this past week, the British chancellor no doubt discussed the striking areas of comparability between the American and British problems.

Luckily, our own excesses haven't matched those of the British, and the tax medicine that Congress may feed us may not be so bitter.

But it seems rather strange that the only way modern democracies have found to handle their intricate international financial payments problems is to put the home economy through a wringer. Are depression and unemployment the only ways of solving these problems?

One wonders whether any American Administration would ever be able to get away with the punishing kind of austerity that Jenkins devised He lowered the target for economic growth from 4 to 3 percent. His expectation is that personal consumption will be reduced by nearly 2 percent. instead of rising by 1 percent.

Response among businessmen and economists in Britain has been favorable: most feel that the deflationary package was necessary—a kind of "last chance" for Britain.

If there has been any "overkill," it may be apparent on the political front. The by-elections seem to suggest that the British public doesn't take too kindly to the idea that there can be no boost in the standard of living for the next couple of years.

This is a human and understandable reaction. Like M. I. T. Prof. Robert Solow, I am depressed that the automatic reaction here and in Britain to repeated monetary crises is to resort to deflation.

When everything is sacrificed to solving the balance of payments problem, as Solow says, we confuse the end with the means. This isn't to say that either Britain or the U.S. could continue to have perennially big deficits.

BUT IT SEEMS topsy-turvy reasoning to be applauding a British budget because it is so "harsh," or an American policy designed to halt growth that exceeds a 4 percent level.

Mr. Jenkins' counterpart, Treasury Sec. Henry H. Fowler, has just had a great success at Stockholm by assuring our friends that an appropriate slow-down in the American economy would be enforced.

Something would seem to be screwy somewhere.

But if there is a glimmer of hope out of all of the confusion that began with devaluation of the British pound, it is the partial step toward gold demonetization that is inherent in the two-price system.

One even hears suggestions in highplaces that in any new crisis, the powers that be would go all the way to a full demonetization, instead of yielding to the temptation of raising the price of gold.

For that we can thank the speculators and M. deGaulle. They may have forced us, unwittingly, onto the right track.

Older Workers Penalized:

Psychological Tests in Jobs Criticized As Invalid, Unfair

AN AFL-CIO EXPERT charged that the growing use of psychological and other tests in job-related situations has created a "numbers game" that can hurt long-term employes.

"More often than not, tests that are in general use have never been validated," said Bert Gottlieb, who is the industrial engineer in the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Research. He pointed out that "even a good test may have only a 70 percent validity."

Basing employment or promotion decisions on such tests is "little better than tossing a coin," he declared. Gottlieb was interviewed on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. EST on the Mutual Radio Network.

Gottlieb said long-term employes are often at a disadvantage in competing for promotions with younger, less-experienced workers on the basis of such tests. A worker with 20 or 25 years service in a plant may not have taken a test for years, Gottlieb said, but he may have to compete for advancement with more recent high school graduates "who are really expert in taking tests."

THE AFL-CIO doesn't object to tests administered by "skilled psychologists in counselling situations," where they can be useful and helpful, Gottlieb said. But, he declared, "we do object to their use when they discriminate against long-term employes who are denied opportunities for advancement on the basis of tests that have little or no validity."

"There are just too many tests that people have vested interests in that will never be validated," the union spokesman said. "Employers, as well as employes, would be better off if we declared a moratorium on testing today, and started all over — started from scratch," he asserted.

Reporters questioning Gottlieb on Labor News Conference were Neil Gilbride, labor correspondent for the Associated Press, and Alex Uhl, editor of Press Associates, Inc.

THERE HAVE BEEN few wars in history without profiteering —an activity which has been crudely but accurately described as turning the lifeblood of others into gold for the greedy.

In our Revolutionary War, the Civil War and in World Wars I and II profiteering was with us.

In 1944 a War Contracts Adjustment Board was established, under the direction of the secretary of defense, with an eye to eliminating excessive profits derived by contractors and subcontractors in connection with the national defense program.

This board met with some success but did not come near actually eliminating excessive profits.

In 1951, however, Congress passed the Renegotiation Act to provide necessary teeth to meet the problem of profiteering.

With its new structure and new powers the Renegotiation Board, staffed by more than 700, proved its worth to the taxpayers. Hundreds of millions were saved, not just through voluntary refunds and price reductions by contractors but by being an ever-present guardian against overpricing.

Since the Korean War, however, Congress has been steadily whittling away at the power and effectiveness of the Renegotiation Board. One example is that the board was initially given jurisdiction over companies doing more than $250,000 worth of renegotiatable business with the government each year. This has now been raised to $1 million and business interests are pressing hard for a $5 million exemption.

THIS IS NOT ALL the business interests want—they are seeking to kill the board outright. Unless Congress acts, the board will go out of business July 1. So contractors' lobbyists have massed on Capitol Hill to see that this deterrent to massive war profits is wiped out. It's all up to the House Ways & Means Committee.

This call comes at a time when the Viet Nam War has become a business of vast financial stakes with military procurement exceeding $125 million a day.

The contractors claim that the Renegotiation Board is not permitting a sufficient rate of profit. Right behind them is the National Association of Manufacturers which seriously maintains that the limitation on profits "will weaken progressively the industrial base which supports our military commitments."

There is considerable evidence, though, that too frequently profits that are not reasonable and are not justified are being made.

Sen. George McGovern (D-S.D.) says that, since the 1965 escalation in Viet Nam, corporate profits have skyrocketed from an annual average of $31.7 billion after taxes to $47.3 billion.

One contract involving M-15 rifles, Sen. Frank Church (D-Ida.) says, amounted to a profit of 1,400 percent.

A sampling of 16 companies disclosed sales-related profits on their negotiable business as high as 32 percent in one case, six over 20 percent and all over 13 percent.

This was in fiscal 1967. More recent profits are expected to be considerably higher.

The House Armed Services Committee has evidenced some alarm over what it called the lack of "common sense" among purchasers of government equipment.

There was the case of a major Ohio corporation which realized 42 percent profit on one defense contract producing military hardware with government-owned facilities that it used rent-free.

A radar manufacturer pocketed almost a half a million dollars when the Navy allowed itself to be billed for an item that it had already decided it didn't need.

Rep. Henry Gonzalez (D-Tex.) has made defense of the Renegotiation Board a major cause. He says, "there is abundant evidence of current profiteering on defense contracts."

In fact, the evidence seems to point to the urgent need of a more far-reaching and effective Renegotiation Board.

LONG-SERVICE WORKERS can be hurt in the "numbers game" created by the growing use of psychological and other tests in job-related situations, Bert Gottlieb (center), industrial engineer in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, charged on Labor News Conference. Reporters Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press (left) and Alex Uhl of Press Associates, Inc., questioned him on the AFL-CIO public affairs program aired nationwide over Mutual Radio.

Key Rollcall Vote on Civil Rights Bill

The House voted 229-195 on Apr. 10 to act on a labor-endorsed resolution approving the Senate's open housing-civil rights bill without change. This permitted the legislation to be cleared for the President's signature without going to a House-Senate conference committee where it was in danger of being seriously weakened.

Right votes (R) for the resolution were cast by 152 Democrats and 77 Republicans. Voting wrong (W) were 106 Republicans and 89 Democrats.

'Now Is the Time':

'First-Rate Social Security' Termed Major Labor Goal

Now is the time to mount a campaign to achieve a first-rate social security system, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman has urged.

"The campaign ahead should aim at truly adequate benefit levels, financed in part by funds from general revenues, more comprehensive medicare coverage and provision for flexible arrangements for earlier retirement," he said.

Seidman discussed "The Future Role of Social Security" in the April issues of The American Federationist, monthly magazine of the AFL-CIO.

The 1967 amendments represented "long overdue" improvements, mainly in the level of benefits, Seidman wrote.

"But," he added, "these should be recognized as only partial catch-ups in a program which had fallen far behind in providing a decent standard of living for beneficiaries."

Seidman declared that "attention now can be turned to the major problem of achieving a first-rate social security system."

The social security system has operated successfully and efficiently for more than 30 years and enjoys overwhelming public acceptance, Seidman noted.

When the law was first enacted, he said, the system provided benefits only for old-age retirement. Now it provides retirement benefits to over 15 million workers and their dependents, survivors' benefits to 5.6 million widows and orphans, disability benefits to more than 2 million disabled workers and their dependents and health benefits to over 19 million persons over 65.

About 12 percent of all Americans receive some support from the nation's largest social insurance program, he added. And its administrative efficiency is indicated by costs amounting to 2 percent of benefit outlay compared to the 5 percent estimated when the program began, Seidman wrote.

Seidman took note of allegations by some critics that the system is financially unsound and quoted Chairman Wilbur Mills of the House Ways and Means Committee as saying:

"The Committee on Ways & Means has recently completed a most exhaustive reexamination of the contributory, wage-related social security program. The program is actuarially and financially sound."

Turning to "the future role" of the social security system, Seidman stressed that "the most conspicuous shortcoming of the present social security program is the inadequacy of benefits."

Even with the 13 percent general increase which took effect Feb. 1, the estimated average monthly benefit is $106 for a single, retired male and about $159 for a retired couple, he wrote.

But, Seidman added, the 2.5 million people receiving the minimum benefit "are among the poorest of the poor." The recent increase raised them to $55 a month for a single person and $82.50 for a couple.

Such minimums force many recipients to seek aid from public assistance, exposing them to the very humiliation of a means test which social security was designed to avoid, he said.

Keep Pace

Seidman said it is essential to include with a substantial benefit increase of at least 50 percent a mechanism to ensure that benefits keep pace with higher wage levels.

On medicare, Seidman paid tribute to the way the burden of health care expenses has been lifted from the elderly. But, he added, many gaps remain. He said coinsurance, deductibles and exclusion of key health services leave unpaid nearly half the medical costs of the elderly.

The group most in need of medicare protection, Seidman said, is the disabled. The disabled make up a high-cost, high-risk group which exists on low benefits and so deserve the highest priority in the next extension of medicare, he said.

Seidman discussed alternative methods of financing social security improvements. He said the principle of ability to pay points toward the use of general tax revenues as "a feasible supplementary source of funds."

In conclusion, Seidman wrote:

"Last December, the AFL-CIO called for increasing social security benefits by 50 percent and other urgent improvements as soon as possible. Now is none too soon to begin the fight."

[1] The percentage figure for the couple assumes the wife is eligible for social security benefits. The percentages would also be less for those who retire prior to age 65. The example assumes the worker earned $6,600 for the year 1967.

Steelworkers Propose Changes in Pension Bill

Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel endorsed the intent of an Administration bill to provide stronger regulation of workers' pension-welfare funds but at the same time urged improvements in the legislation.

The Administration proposal would incorporate standards of "fiduciary responsibility" in the 1958 Welfare & Pension Plans Disclosure Act and also strengthen some of its reporting requirements.

In testimony before a House Labor subcommittee, Abel "associated" the USWA with an AFL-CIO view on the legislation previously presented by Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller.

The AFL-CIO urged expansion of the legislation to set minimum funding and vesting standards for single-employer pension plans and an "insurance system" to keep workers from losing benefits if an employer goes out of business or defaults on pension payments.

The federation also called for safeguards to prevent unions from being "harassed" under the law. This could be done, it said, by limiting Labor Dept. investigations "to cases where there is reasonable cause" to believe violations are occurring.

Abel noted that the Steelworkers have negotiated about 2,500 insurance plans, 1,500 pension plans, 500 supplemental unemployment benefit plans and 350 extended vacation plans over the past 20 years.

These plans have disbursed some $2.5 billion in benefits to USWA members, Abel reported, but they also have been plagued by "serious problems."

He cited examples of some companies "blithely disregarding" their commitments to beneficiaries, cases in which pensions have been endangered by companies changing ownership and undue risks taken by firms in investing pension funds.

The Administration bill would prevent some of the problems encountered by the union, but other abuses would not be touched, Abel observed.

He strongly supported the AFL-CIO proposal for an "insurance system" by citing situations in which the union's members had pension rights sharply curtailed when employers went out of business.

"All accrued pension rights, whether or not they have matured to the point of being vested rights, should be the concern of such a reinsurance arrangement," Abel declared.

Emphasizing that welfare and pension benefits are "earned" by workers just as wages are, he added, "There are few things so tragic in the lives of employes and their families as default on these benefits to which they are entitled."

AFT Dinner Aids 'Militancy' Fund

The Teachers announced that AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany will serve as honorary chairman of an AFT dinner to be held May 29 at the Americana Hotel, New York City.

Guests of honor will include Pres. Albert Shanker of the union's New York local, Pres. Richard Kiley of the Cincinnati local, and union staff representatives Joseph Cascella and Charles Richards of New Jersey, all jailed for leading teacher strikes.

The union has launched a drive for a $1 million "militancy" fund to finance its legislative campaign against restrictive laws and on behalf of the families of jailed members.

Zagoria Bids Radio, TV Cover 'World of Work'

Chicago—Radio and television stations should pay more attention to the world of work in their programming, Sam Zagoria of the National Labor Relations Board told the National Association of Broadcasters here.

Noting that 76 million Americans spend more than a third of their lives at work, Zagoria said much media time is "directed to leisure time themes and the beautiful people, the flower people, but not much to working people."

Speaking on labor news and labor relations, Zagoria suggested that there should be "more of a reflection of the world of work" on TV and radio, particularly in the ghettos where 95 percent of the homes have one or more sets.

If only a small percentage of this "tremendous" American audience views a program, "isn't this a marvelous opportunity," he asked, "to excite interest in how people make a living; how they cope with the problems of finding jobs, learning skills, progressing and prospering in a work place where labor-management relationships involve stress and strain, and wise men struggle to achieve almost miracles of understanding and agreement?"

Zagoria told of a labor reporter, hired by a network "some years ago," who tried to interest producers in stories about the rise of automation, portable pensions, white collar organizing and the like.

The reporter found that unless the story contained as much conflict as a western film or could be told in a matter of minutes, the interest in it was "polite but unresponsive," the NLRB member, himself a former reporter, said.

Zagoria advised radio and TV not to limit their labor news to stories about unions and labor leadership, but to report how an industrialist goes about training ghetto youth, community success stories, the problems of the working wife and the "moonlighting" father.

Zagoria also called on the industry to show "foresighted industrial statesmanship" by working in the field of human relations and by cooperation with unions on mutual problems. He cited the Kaiser Long Range Sharing Plan in the steel industry and the Armour Automation Committee in the packing industry as examples of what can be done.

Congress Asked to Lift Dollar Bar to College

grants based upon financial need, and low-cost student loans" will best "place the aid where it is most needed," the AFL-CIO said.

The federation, however, criticized the unwillingness of private lending institutions to make government-guaranteed student loans at the allowable rate of interest and urged that the program be replaced by direct government loans.

If the guaranteed loan program is continued, the AFL-CIO said, it should be amended to permit loans by federal credit unions and labor-management trust funds—many of which are now excluded because of technicalities in state laws, which commonly require both the lender and the borrower to be within the same state.

Under these restrictions, the statement noted, neither the AFL-CIO Federal Credit Union nor the pension fund of the Ladies' Garment Workers have been able to enter the student loan program.

The federation's statement welcomed the proposed expansion of student aid programs provided in the Administration's bill. But it expressed "dismay" at proposed budget cuts in funds for construction of college facilities.

"Opening the doors of higher education to all American young people requires a workable program of financial aid, but it also requires assurances that there will be a place for students to go when they are assisted financially," the AFL-CIO said.

Vocational Schools

In a companion statement, the federation reiterated the testimony it presented last month to a House subcommittee for improving and strengthening the 1963 Vocational Education Act.

There are still "not enough schools, not enough funds and not enough programs," the AFL-CIO declared.

In addition, too many school administrators continue to downgrade the value and status of vocational education. The federation noted that only one of 25 high school students attends vocational education courses even though "recent studies show that students completing vocational education courses are more successful in finding and holding jobs than persons with a general high school education."

The federation strongly urged continuation of the work-study program, which is due to expire this year. It said these programs "allow disadvantaged students, who need financial aid, to continue their vocational education."

It also urged extension of the residential vocational school program which, although authorized for the past three years, "was never given a chance to be tested."

Union Officer Heads Anti-Poverty Group

Wichita, Kan. — Clarence J. Brown, secretary of the Wichita AFL-CIO, has been elected chairman of the Wichita Area Community Action Program, a nonprofit corporation to press anti-poverty programs in this area. Brown also is chairman of Railway & Airline Clerks Lodge 1125 here.

'Say It Now, Hubert':

Humphrey Saluted By Louisiana Labor

Baton Rouge, La.—Vice Pres. Hubert Humphrey told cheering delegates to the 13th annual Louisiana AFL-CIO convention here that he plans to take the "accomplishments" of the Administration to the country in the coming months.

"I will do everything I can for the cause of peace in the world," Humphrey declared. "I will do everything I can to keep social progress moving forward in America."

He spoke at the final session of the four-day meeting of the federation, which also heard addresses from prominent national and state leaders and adopted resolutions on a wide range of legislative issues.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Victor Bussie was elected to his 13th consecutive term. Sec.-Treas. E. J. Bourg, Sr. and the federation's two general vice presidents, A. P. Stoddard and Leroy Landry also were re-elected.

Humphrey was repeatedly interrupted by applause and was given a standing, two-minute ovation when he finished addressing the overflow crowd. The Vice President is under increasingly strong urging from labor and other supporters to announce his candidacy for President.

At one point, when he asked "for the help of all Americans" in his endeavors, a voice in the rear of the audience shouted, "Say it Hubert, say it now!" The crowd roared with applause and Humphrey had to pause in his address.

He spoke at length about the accomplishments of the Administration in pressing for peace in Viet Nam and in bringing the nation new gains in medicine, housing, jobs, education and social security.

"I intend to stand up for the promises we have kept," Humphrey said. "I am going to every corner of this land and take our message to the country."

Referring to the Administration's efforts to achieve an honorable settlement of the war in Viet Nam, Humphrey said that Pres. Johnson—"in an act of selfless statesmanship"—seeks a peace that will bring security to all of Southeast Asia.

Humphrey said he knew firsthand about "the search for peace" through his long efforts in the Senate on behalf of the Peace Corps, disarmament and arms control, and the nuclear test-ban treaty.

He appealed for the people of the nation to abandon all hates and prejudices. When that is done, he declared, "we will be what Lincoln said—the last best hope on earth."

The delegates approved resolutions supporting the Administration's Viet Nam policy, stronger programs to protect consumers, expansion of the federal war on poverty, and legislation to provide arbitration of federal employes' disputes.

On the state level, the convention urged urban renewal legislation, a law to assure bargaining rights to public employes, an annual cost-of-living pay boost for teachers, and increases in workmen's compensation benefits.

Oil Industry Hit

One resolution lashed at the oil and gas industry for "undue profiteering" and called for repeal of the federal tax provision granting it a 27 percent depletion allowance as well as a special tax exemption given by the State of Louisiana.

Another resolution called upon each central labor body in the state to set up an organizing committee to carry out organizing drives and assist individual unions in their organizing.

Convention speakers included Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz; Betty Furness, the President's assistant for consumer affairs; Sen. Russell B. Long (D-La.), Federal Highway Administrator Lowell K. Bridwell, and Gov. John J. McKeithen (D).

AFL-CIO representatives participated in panel discussions on "Political Action and What It Means" and "The Functions of the AFL-CIO." Participants in the first were COPE Dir. Al Barkan and Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, and in the second, Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., Dir. Jacob Clayman of the Industrial Union Dept. and AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Paul Hall.

Seattle Regional Chief To Retire from NLRB

The National Labor Relations Board announced that Seattle Regional Dir. Thomas P. Graham, Jr., will retire Apr. 30 after 30 years of service. Graham has the longest span of service as director in the NLRB's largest geographic area, comprising Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Montana and Alaska. He is 68.

ISRAEL'S NEW AMBASSADOR to the United States, Yitzhak Rabin, called upon AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at the federation's headquarters in Washington shortly after presenting his credentials to Pres. Johnson. Rabin was chief of staff for the Israeli Army during the Middle East war last June.

Union Support Builds For HHH Candidacy

Support rapidly mounted among labor organizations for the presidential candidacy of Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey as the executive council of the Textile Workers Union of America urged him to enter the race for the Democratic nomination.

A resolution adopted by the council assured Humphrey of the union's support in the campaign, describing him as "the most eminently qualified man to unite the nation and insure the continuance of the progressive programs and policies that are needed to overcome our critical challenges at home and abroad."

Earlier, following Pres. Johnson's announcement that he would not accept renomination, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urged Humphrey to declare himself as a candidate to assure that "the people of this country . . . have a genuine choice and a real opportunity to support . . . the programs and objectives" of the Johnson-Humphrey Administration in the months ahead.

Support for the Vice President also was quickly and enthusiastically voiced at two conventions of union bodies—the Operating Engineers and the Pennsylvania State AFL-CIO. The day after Humphrey addressed the Pennsylvania unionists in Pittsburgh, his office reported receiving 42 telegrams from top trade union officials urging him to enter the presidential race.

ILG Backing

Last week, the executive council of the Ladies' Garment Workers unanimously adopted a resolution calling for Humphrey's candidacy. The council paid tribute to his "dedication to the principles of liberalism over several decades . . . in economic advance, civil rights, education, housing, health, consumer protection and civil liberties."

The Vice President, it said, is in "the best position to unite the forces within the Democratic party and in the broader progressive coalition in the entire nation: the North and South, black and white, labor and business."

TWUA Pres. William Pollock, announcing the action of the union's executive council, said it was prompted by Humphrey's instrumental role in the "great and historic advances" made by the nation under the Johnson Administration and by the Vice President's record as a "true and tested friend over two decades of warm and close association."

● Sen. Robert F. Kennedy (N.Y.) announced he would enter the South Dakota presidential primary, June 4, in search of the state's 26 votes at the Democratic national convention in August. Slates of delegates pledged to Kennedy and to Pres. Johnson already have been filed for the primary, despite the President's decision not to seek re-election. A slate pledged to Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy (Minn.) was expected to be filed before the Apr. 20 deadline.

● New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller said at a news conference that he might still formally enter the competition for the Republican presidential nomination, despite an earlier announcement that appeared to rule this out while leaving the door open for a draft.

● California Gov. Ronald Reagan, up to now a non-candidate, acknowledged that he was "interested" in what he said was an "increased grass roots movement across the country" to encourage him to seek the Republican nomination.

Wirtz Predicts Job Growth in Service Fields

The most promising employment fields for high school graduates looking for permanent jobs this year are in the service occupations, the Labor Dept. said after a study.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, urging 1968 graduates to pick a job with a future, cited the following occupations as having the best employment outlook for the years immediately ahead:

Airline reservation agent, airline stewardess, appliance serviceman, bookkeeping worker, cosmetologist, electrician, draftsman and salesman.

Wirtz also asked graduates to consider seriously the wide range of job opportunities in the health field before making a final choice.

"You are needed and wanted in hospitals, clinics and laboratories," he said in a message to seniors. "The door is wide open for new young workers to fill jobs as a licensed practical nurse, medical record technician, admitting clerk or laboratory assistant."

Other promising fields include secretaries, typists, and operators of billing, calculating and duplicating machines in offices.

Wirtz warned that, for many job openings, training after high school is required. He said skills can be picked up through Manpower Development & Training Act programs and other on-the-job, apprenticeship or skill training programs.

This year 2.6 million young people will receive high school diplomas during May and June.

Copper Firm Licks Lips At Hike in Prices, Profits

New York—The price hike posted by Phelps Dodge Corp. after the settlement of the nationwide copper strike was attributed to higher labor costs by the company. But it looked like plain old-fashioned greed to readers of a Wall Street Journal account of the company's annual meeting.

To start with, it turned out that the company managed to make a profit even during the first quarter of this year—when the bulk of its operations were closed by the strike.

The first-quarter profit of $1.2 million wasn't what the company is used to. But the corporation's officers assured the stockholders that the dollars should be rolling in "satisfactorily" the rest of the year because domestic copper inventories are at the "lowest level in years."

In answer to a stockholder's question, Board Chairman Robert G. Page said the four-cent a pound increase—to 42 cents—should cover higher payroll costs "very nicely." He did not comment on government charges that the hike, which Phelps Dodge initiated and other copper firms followed, was more than double the cost of the settlement.

In fact, Page went on, the company could make a profit even if copper sold for 30 cents a pound. But, he added, "of course not the same profit as at 42 cents a pound."

Steel Contract Talks Begin on Local Issues

Pittsburgh, Pa.—Negotiators for 450,000 Steelworkers and 11 big steel firms opened talks on local issues well in advance of bargaining on major contract issues over wages and fringe benefits.

Meeting on a plant-by-plant basis all over the United States, USWA committees and basic steel management have one month to come to terms on such local problems as contracting out of work, safety on the job, work schedules, work clothes, allocation of overtime, incentive plans and parking facilities.

A report on unresolved disputes will be made at the end of the local bargaining May 15 or when national negotiations start in New York City June 3, the union said.

Until now, unsettled local issues generally have been left for the next round of bargaining on national contracts. In 1965 the union and companies agreed to concentrate in the future on local issues with a view toward the achievement of more mutually acceptable settlements.

Delegates from more than 350 USWA locals in the steel and aluminum industries agreed at March conferences that a substantial pay increase is of major importance to all members this year in national bargaining. They adopted reports calling also for better pension programs, expanded medical coverage, improved job and income protection, more holidays, better severance pay, safety conditions and health facilities for USWA's 480,000 members in steel and aluminum.

Aluminum negotiations have been started at scattered locations not only by the Steelworkers but also by the Aluminum Workers. Union contracts with major firms employing more than 50,000 workers have a May 31 expiration date.

Battles Loom in Congress On Urgent National Needs

CWA, Bell Broaden Wage Talks

By Eugene A. Kelly

Prospects of settling the nationwide strike of 200,000 telephone workers "look good" but "there are many knotty problems to resolve" in negotiations between the Communications Workers and the Bell System, the union reported.

CWA Pres. Joseph A. Bierne said "I think we can work out solutions but until these knotty problems are fully worked out, we remain critically locked up in our discussions and the strike continues unabated."

CWA members in almost all states except Hawaii and Alaska walked out Apr. 18 seeking a better wage offer from Western Electric Co., which makes telephone equipment, and Bell Telehone operating companies where contracts had expired and strikes had been authorized.

Members of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers also are out in a statewide strike against the New Jersey Bell Telephone Co., where some 8,300 plant workers struck Apr. 15 for more money. IBEW units in Illinois and other states are waiting for contract expiration before joining the walkout.

For both CWA and IBEW, talks have progressed to the point where union and management negotiators have moved beyond discussion of a wage increase in reopeners at the halfway point of three-year agreements. They are now considering entirely new contracts covering wages, insurance, pensions, union security and other terms.

Beirne said in a statement as the AFL-CIO News went to press: "At this point, I can report definitely that things are looking up. Lengthy discussions at night, continuing into the day, are encouraging."

Talks have centered, he said, on a "brand new contract agreement to give the parties an opportunity to break out of the impasse we had reached" before the strike started.

Opinion on both sides, the CWA head reported, favors a three-year agreement replacing the present one that is now open on wage matters only. He continued: "This has given us many things to talk about that the CWA collective bargaining policy committee has long called for."

Beirne said he was hopeful, but "beyond this broad outline of a new area for possible agreement," both union and management negotiators agree that spelling out details "would not help, but harm, our continued discussions."

Beirne saluted Bell System employes who are on strike or are honoring picket lines of their own

EMERGENCY CALL from the Red Cross for blood donors brought these striking members of the Communications Workers from the picket line in Washington, D.C., to national Red Cross headquarters. The men donated 30 pints of blood, then returned to their picket stations. Nearly 200,000 members are involved in a nationwide strike against the Bell Telephone system for higher wages.

Funds Issue Produces Sharp Split

By David L. Perlman

A sharply-divided Congress struggled to reconcile demands for more funds and programs to meet the nation's needs with a conservative coalition's call for bone-deep budget slashes which would cripple programs already under way.

Congressmen and senators returned from an Easter recess to face battles over an expanded housing program, emergency jobs for the hard-core unemployed, consumer and safety legislation, taxes and appropriations.

Committees were beginning to roll out bills, but most of the legislative proposals that have flowed steadily from the White House since January were still locked deep in subcommittees. And time was running out on the 90th Congress.

Congressional leaders have set a firm end-of-July deadline for adjournment. The Republican convention opens in early August, the Democratic convention meets in late August. And with a national election campaign coming up, Congress is in no mood to return for a fall session.

This year's shortened timetable—contrasting with the late autumn or winter adjournments of recent years—adds to the ability of opponents of legislation to kill bills through delay as well as votes.

The root issue of financing or starving programs may be decided by the outcome of House-Senate negotiations over a tax rise, budget cut combination.

Most economists now agree that an emergency tax increase is needed to enable the nation to meet its military obligations in Viet Nam without abandoning domestic progress. But with the House economy bloc apparently holding the whip

Meany Tells Interracial Group:

Major Attack on Urban Crisis An 'Investment in America'

New York—The massive government effort needed to help resolve the nation's urban crisis should be considered, "an investment in America" rather than mere federal spending, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany emphasized here.

Meany made the point as he addressed a dinner of the Catholic Interracial Council after accepting its John LaFarge Memorial Award. (Excerpts, Page 5.)

He pointed out that the entire history of social progress shows that money spent for programs to enhance the general welfare is "self-liquidating, through the dollars returned in taxes to the public treasury."

The "general prosperity" of recent years, he said, is the result of "social investments" proposed by Presidents John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson, and enacted by Congress—"especially the 89th Congress."

Now, he continued, new "investments" are required to create jobs, educational opportunities and new housing for those who are crowded into big-city slums.

Meany agreed that the Viet Nam war is expensive—"protecting freedom is always expensive." But he attacked those in Congress who use the war as an excuse for not funding the critically-needed urban programs.

The war is costing "something like $25 billion a year," he observed, whereas the gross national product—the total of goods and services—is running at $800 billion a year.

"Take away $25 billion for Viet Nam and you still have $775 billion or so to use for other needs," he declared.

Meany hit out at the extremists on both sides of the civil rights picture who "weaken the vital center, now made up of the overwhelming majority who have faith in democracy, faith in America and faith in the future."

On the one side, he said, are the "so-called black militants" who base their case on riots, reject American society and preach hatred and violence.

Although they have little following among Negroes, Meany

Mail Handlers Vote Merger with Laborers

Boston—A special convention of the Post Office Mail Handlers approved a merger plan which will bring the 56-year-old union into the Laborers as a separate craft division.

It will also add the resources of the Laborers, with more than half a million members, to help the Mail Handlers complete the organization of their jurisdiction and expand services to members and locals.

The merger plan had the endorsement of Mail Handlers Pres. Harold J. McAvoy and Sec.-Treas. Lester Moody and won 385-218 approval at the convention. During a one-year transition period, the union will continue under its present officers, constitution and executive board.

Laborers Pres. Joseph V. Moreschi stressed, however, that its members "are now full-fledged members of our union, and as such are entitled to all the services and benefits we provide for all our members."

The Mail Handlers have nearly 20,000 members and bargain for more than twice that number under a nationwide contract with the Post Office. The merger announcement put the potential membership at 60,000.

It is the second small union to Higher Interest Termed 'Dangerously Wrong'

The AFL-CIO's chief economist termed the Federal Reserve Board's high-interest policy "dangerously wrong." It could plunge home-building and related industries into "a sharp recession," Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger warned.

He urged that Congress act "without delay" to pass a "fair and equitable" temporary wartime tax increase.

This, Goldfinger said, would reduce the size of the federal government's deficit that has to be financed in the money markets and ease the pressure on interest rates.

Goldfinger was sharply critical of the Federal Reserve Board's third boost in its discount rate in five months. The discount rate is the interest the nation's central banks charge to commercial banks. When it goes up, the interest banks charge to their private customers also rises.

Before the latest increase, Goldfinger noted, interest rates were already at close to the highest level

SETTLEMENT of a libel suit brought by officers of Operating Engineers Local 826 against the Odessa, Tex., American, which paid $10,000 out of court, is celebrated with a handshake. Left to right, union Attorneys Tom Upchurch and James Edwards, Business Manager Frank Parker, Atty. Quinn Brackett and Senior Business Rep. Kenneth Howell. The unionists charged they were libeled by a May 1966, anti-union editorial in the 36,000-circulation daily.

Libel Suit Settlement Caps Oil Field Drive

Big Spring, Tex.—Out-of-court settlement of a libel suit filed by two union business agents against the Odessa, Tex., American was announced at a meeting here of the executive board of Operating Engineers Local 826.

Business Manager Frank Parker and Senior Business Rep. Kenneth Howell of the local sued over an anti-union editorial published May 26, 1966, in the 36,000-circulation paper. Odessa's only daily, the paper is part of the extreme right-wing Freedom Newspapers chain owned by R. C. Hoiles.

Attorneys for the American admitted no libel guilt but agreed to settle the suit without a trial. After payment of attorneys' fees and expenses, the two unionists received $6,521, which they will present to the local union, they announced.

Since the editorial was published, at the start of a union campaign to organize employes of the oil drilling industry in Texas' Permian Basin, Local 826 has won 22 of 38 elections supervised by the National Labor Relations Board.

Contracts have been negotiated with five drilling firms and three others are in process. Petitions have been filed for second elections at 16 firms, and refusal to bargain charges are pending against 14 contractors.

The union said its campaign to organize 3,000 oilfield workers will continue. It expressed thanks for cooperation by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization, Texas AFL-CIO and the IUOE.

The offending editorial sought to discourage drillers and oilfield "roughnecks" from joining Local 826, the union leaders said.

It referred to "union agitators" and alleged that "union organizers are not primarily interested in the welfare of the workers. They are merely plying their trade . . . based on deceptive persuasion."

The editorial said the union "invariably goes about the devious procedure of forcing the employer to negotiate." Organizers "want excessive political and economic power," it contended.

Union attorneys included Thomas Upchurch of Amarillo, Tex., James Edwards and Quinn Brackett of Lubbock, Tex.

Fire Fighters Hail Arbiter's Ruling in N.Y.

New York—An arbitrator has ruled for this city's uniformed firemen in a series of disputes unsettled since negotiations opened in 1966.

Arbiter Eric J. Schmertz upheld most of the points made by Fire Fighters Local 94, representing 10,500 members of the New York City Fire Dept.

His findings are final and binding on both the municipal government and the union. With wage increases and other economic benefits agreed to a year ago, they become part of the first formal pact between the parties.

Schmertz was assigned to the dispute by the city Office of Collective Bargaining when the parties could not agree. He found that:

- A fireman who works temporarily at a rank above his regular rank is entitled to disability or death benefits if injured or killed while working at that rank, but not to higher pay.
- Firemen who do not take their vacation time or time off before the end of a year may "bank" the time until used. The same applies to a fireman's personal leave day.
- The city must negotiate a written job description of all the work a fireman is expected to do.
- Firemen involved in departmental investigations are entitled to representation by the union or legal counsel. The testimony of a fireman called as a witness cannot be used against him if he himself is later charged.

Office Union Wins Election At N.J. Bank

Jersey City, N.J.—Bank employes of the Trust Co. of New Jersey voted by a 40-1 margin for the Office & Professional Employes to represent them in bargaining.

OPEIU Pres. Howard Coughlin said the National Labor Relations Board reported that, of 280 eligible employes, 243 voted for the union and six for no union, with four ballots challenged.

The bank was the second organized by the same union in New Jersey. First was the Hudson Trust Co. in Union City late last year.

Coughlin said the "overwhelming" pro-union vote here reflects a profound change in the traditional attitude of bank employes toward unions. He said that unionization of the banking business is "inevitable not only because of low bank wages, but also because of the double-barreled threat to the job security of bank employes posed by mergers and automation."

A factor in the OPEIU victory here was the recent victory of the union in Canada, where 1,200 employes of the Montreal City & District Saving Bank joined the union and later won contract benefits that made them the "highest paid bank workers in Canada," Coughlin said.

The Montreal pact had a powerful impact on the New Jersey vote, the union head said.

Court Orders NMU to Hold New Election

New York—A federal judge has upheld a Labor Dept. complaint brought under the Landrum-Griffin Act and has ordered the National Maritime Union to hold a new election for national officers and make the office of port patrolman elective instead of appointive.

Judge Constance Baker Motley said the requirement that union members must have held a local office for a full term of four years was an illegal restriction and the method of nomination put an unequal burden on anti-administration candidates.

The NMU's 1963 convention had voted to have port patrolmen appointed rather than elected.

The NMU indicated it will appeal the district court ruling. It noted that a special panel named by the Honest Ballot Association had previously considered and rejected charges against the conduct of the 1966 election.

Bell Strike Talks Focus on Full Pact

and other unions. He said CWA local unions volunteered to provide emergency crew members "within minutes of the time a deadly tornado hit the Midwest," causing death, injury and widespread damage in Ohio, Kentucky and other states.

"These are the kind of people we have in our union," he said. "Their morale is high because they know their cause is just. They are as confident as I am that, when people compete against a computer, it is the people who must prevail."

After the strike began, efforts to get negotiations started again were stymied by injunctions issued in state courts at the request of the Southern Bell Telephone Co. One injunction, against Louisville area employes who honored a Western Electric picket line, was stayed by a federal court, and another, in Mobile, Ala., was not enforced.

On this subject Beirne said "crudely timed injunctions threw us off stride for days, but things have been moving fast behind the scenes in intensive discussions going on between the union and the companies" in Washington, New York City and elsewhere.

When wage talks first were stalemated, CWA set an Apr. 12 strike deadline but extended it six days following the assassination of the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr. The walkout came when Bell management declined to improve its previous offer of a 7.25 percent wage hike for 18 months.

The striking CWA locals rejected the "final" management offer, the union said, because of "insufficient money, retrogression for workers with longer service, inadequate consideration for pensioned workers and night workers, and a number of critical items" in local union contracts.

In talks that opened Feb. 10, CWA made a "substantial" wage increase for 420,000 Bell workers the major goal in a nine-month series of negotiations.

The union's 67-member wage policy committee directed Beirne and other negotiators to seek a wage raise tied to rising Bell profits and increasing worker productivity.

The committee also called for replacement of "merit" wage systems with an "acceptable" wage plan, tightening up of wage differentials within bargaining units, and establishment of new job titles with upgraded workers getting at least $10 a week above present top craft rates.

Other goals include a 10 percent night differential for work performed between 6 p.m. and 7 a.m., time-and-a-half pay for Saturday work, double time for Sundays and holidays in addition to holiday pay, all overtime at double time, weekly salaries for all hourly-rated workers, and no lowering of present contract standards in any area.

The CWA strike was the first nationwide walkout at Bell in 21 years. IBEW members in New Jersey struck over similar issues, and a third union joined the walkout Apr. 25—the unaffiliated Federation of Telephone Workers of Pennsylvania, representing 13,000 Pennsylvania Bell employes.

Biemiller Answers Slur On Federal Safety Bill

An attack on the labor-backed federal job safety bill by a Wisconsin state agency "is about as far as you can get from the truth," AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller charged.

Biemiller, a former Wisconsin legislator and congressman, replied to a "position statement" of the state's Dept. of Industry, Labor & Human Relations. The agency said it opposed the legislation because it would do away with all state safety laws and programs and eliminate "education" as a means of reducing work accidents.

In a letter to Pres. John Zancanaro of the Milwaukee Building & Construction Trades Council, Biemiller noted that the legislation specifically authorizes continued state supervision of occupational safety and health programs—when these programs and enforcement are at least equal to federal standards.

And far from curbing safety education, Biemiller noted, the federal bill would provide grants up to 90 percent of the state's total cost for a series of functions which "adds up to a sum total of one thing—education."

Biemiller wrote that "it is most important that we secure a federal Occupational Safety & Health Act to protect hundreds of thousands of our members in the many states which have neither an adequate law or effective enforcement."

He said the Wisconsin state agency "does all workers an injustice" when it opposes federal legislation "for spurious reasons."

U.S. Youth Council Aids Grape Strike

New York—Support for the farm workers' boycott of Giumarra grape products was voted at a meeting here by the officers and staff members of the United States Youth Council.

Delegates approved a contribution to the relief fund of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, AFL-CIO, and urged every member of the council to support the boycott of Giumarra products until the California firm settles the long-standing strike by 950 employes and negotiates with their union.

All Unions Asked to Help:

Summer Youth Jobs Urged by AFL-CIO

The urgency of opening up opportunities to disadvantaged youths makes it imperative that labor give active support to the government's "Summer Jobs for Youth" program, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany emphasized in a letter to presidents of affiliated national and international unions.

Meany urged the unions to hire young people directly and to encourage locals and "employers with whom you have contracts" to do likewise.

He called for full labor cooperation with local Mayors' Committees on Youth Opportunity that have been established in cities across the nation.

Meany noted that the AFL-CIO convention in December "heartily endorsed" Pres. Johnson's Council on Youth Opportunity which involves the "highly important" summer employment program headed by Vice Pres. Humphrey.

A convention resolution stressed the high rate of joblessness among youth, particularly in urban ghettos, and instructed all unions to "make useful contributions in meeting the recognized needs of youth."

2 Million Job-Hunters

Meany pointed out that some 2 million youngsters will be looking for income from jobs this summer and "the full cooperation of every one will be needed to fill their desire for work."

In an earlier letter, he urged AFL-CIO state and central bodies to develop summer programs for hiring "young people from poverty areas in the 16-to-21 age category" and to cooperate with the second aspect of the summer youth program—making recreational and cultural facilities available for disadvantaged youngsters.

In support of the summer drive the AFL-CIO also has issued a leaflet, Give Youth a Union Hand Up, which is available through the federation's Pamphlet Division. It offers suggestions for union-sponsored projects that will create opportunities for work, education and leisure-time activities for young people.

Humphrey, in a letter to Meany, thanked labor for its past support of the government's summer youth programs. He said that participation in this summer's campagin by individual unions and central labor bodies "can be the difference between success and a good try."

The federal government is doing much to provide new opportunities for youth, but success of its efforts depends upon help from the private sector of society, Humphrey emphasized.

"I urge the labor movement not only to continue to support these efforts, but also—in the light of the enormity of the need—to expand its activities," he added.

Meanwhile, on a closed-circuit television program to 50 cities, the Vice President estimated that nearly 800,000 summer jobs would be made available for slum youngsters this summer, an increase of 250,000 over last summer.

The federal government, he said, will spend about $490 million on this summer's Youth Opportunity program, compared to an expenditure of $448 million last summer.

Humphrey called on National Guard armories to open their facilities for youth recreation and urged suburban country clubs to make swimming pools available to poor center city children for regular periods each week.

He also described plans for summer programs by professional entertainers in slum areas.

The Vice President repeatedly emphasized the importance of communities and private firms getting their job and recreation programs "ready to go" before schools close in June.

Local Issues Strikes Ended At GM Plants

Detroit—The Auto Workers announced settlement of all strikes over local issues at General Motors plants in the United States and Canada. Only three of 168 GM plants lack a local agreement but negotiations continued without a strike at the three—in Southgate, Calif., Atlanta and Bloomfield, N.J.

Union and corporation reached a national settlement in December, but many locals were forced to strike to win acceptable terms on local conditions, the UAW said. The last three settlements were at the Atlanta Chevrolet plant after a seven-week strike, at the Chevrolet plant in Framingham, Mass., after six weeks of picketing, and at the Willow Springs, Ill., stamping plant after two days.

The UAW announced two other major strike settlements—at Ford Motor Co. of Canada and Bendix Corp.—and one new strike, involving 6,000 Massey-Ferguson tractor workers who struck Apr. 19 in Toronto and Brantford, Ont., for wage parity with the firm's U.S. employes.

The Ford settlement followed the Canadian auto pattern. UAW members stayed out seven days to win overall wage increases of 68 cents an hour for production workers, $1.36 for the skilled trades, plus wage parity in steps maturing Sept. 14, 1970. The three-year pact benefits 11,500 Ford workers.

The Bendix settlement, covering 15,000 employes in eight plants, achieved wage hikes of 21 cents to 51 cents an hour, plus "pattern" improvements or better and a two-cent cost of living provision.

Store-Ordered Poll Held Coercive, Invalid

An Indianapolis department store broke the labor law when it refused to bargain with a union on the ground that a poll by a research firm showed the union no longer represented a majority of employes, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled.

The poll was conducted in a coercive manner and its findings therefore were unreliable, the NLRB held. It ordered H. P. Wasson & Co. to bargain with the Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Union for employes at two Indianapolis warehouses.

The union won bargaining rights and negotiated a one-year agreement in 1965. When the union proposed contract changes for 1966, the company president got reports from supervisors that a few employes who had backed the union originally were now dissatisfied. He hired an outside firm to visit employes at home and ask them this question:

"Do you or don't you want the union at the warehouse?"

When the polling company reported that the replies were 7 yes, 27 no, 5 undecided, 1 refused and 11 not interviewed, the store refused to negotiate on the ground that the union no longer represented a majority. Also it filed a petition for a representation election.

The board said the interviews were conducted in such a way as to have a "coercive impact" on employes. Workers were visited in their homes without any advance warning or explanation from the employer, by "strangers representing themselves to be" his agents.

One member of each team was a court reporter, assigned to take a verbatim transcript of the questioning. Although the polling service said interviewers had told employes their answers would not be identified by name and that no reprisals would be taken, the overall impression "could not surely be dispelled by a few words of reassurance, even if given," three NLRB members concluded.

Since the employer had no other valid grounds for believing that the union lost its majority, they found his refusal to bargain on and after Sept. 13, 1966, unlawful but upheld "merit" raises he granted to employes since that time.

Youth Job Plan Draws Lockout Reply by Firm

St. Louis—Forty seven union meter readers have been suspended by Laclede Gas Co., a public utility here, because they turned downed a chance to earn $40 a week overtime and preferred instead to have the additional job of inspecting gas pipes done by students and unemployed ghetto dwellers.

Local 5-6 of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers declared the layoffs a lockout and voted to support the suspended meter readers "as long as necessary."

Business Manager Robert C. Tibbs, Jr., charged the Laclede layoffs were in retaliation for recent union testimony before a congressional committee on faulty underground gas pipes which the witnesses labeled a public danger.

He called the suspensions to the attention of Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, Defense Sec. Clark Clifford and OCAW Legislative Dir. Anthony Mazzocchi, who accompanied the witnesses to the hearings.

St. Louis Mayor Alfonso J. Cervantes launched a summer employment program for inner city youths last month. He and his aids are seeking 2,000 jobs in private industry for the underprivileged.

The utility asked city meter readers to inspect pipes leading to and from meters in homes and business places—an extra job for which they would be paid overtime at union contract rates. The workers were suspended after they told management they didn't want the extra work and would rather see it assigned to students or the hard core unemployed.

Tibbs reported to a union membership meeting that inspection of the pipes would require only a 40-minute training period and would mean jobs for 100 to 200 persons for about three or four months.

He emphasized that it was not safety inspection work and that no specialized equipment is used.

The company, explaining its refusal to hire jobless youths, said it believes inexperienced workers would have difficulty getting into homes and stores to make the inspection and to fill in the required reports.

The union position is that if the company wants to make a sincere effort at pipe inspection, it should use pipefitters instead of meter readers to do the work. Laclede's pipefitters also are members of OCAW Local 5-6.

The union spokesman emphasized that the suspension did not involve a strike or work stoppage, but was a lockout. Not affected by the company action and still at work are 43 other members of the meter reading unit assigned to St. Louis County outside the city.

Henry Gunesch Dies; Red Cross Labor Aide

Henry J. Gunesch, AFL-CIO Community Services representative with the American Red Cross for nine years, died in a Washington, D.C., hospital of cancer and was buried after services in Our Lady of Fatima Church, Farrell, Pa. He was 55.

Born in Sharon, Pa., Gunesch became business agent of his local union of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, then was appointed to the staff of the Shenango Valley United Fund, where he pioneered in introducing the Citizens Apprenticeship program of community services. As labor liaison with the Red Cross, Gunesch worked with AFL-CIO affiliates in 11 Middle Atlantic, Upper South and New England states.

Meany Hails Progress Of Turkey's Unions

Ankara, Turkey—The achievements of Turkey's labor movement and its dedication to freedom were saluted by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in a message to the Turk-Is convention here.

Meany's fraternal greetings to the labor federation's meeting were delivered by Henry Kirsch of the Dept. of Intl. Affairs, who also addressed the delegates.

"Your activities in building a trade union movement of over 800,000 workers and winning 3,000 collective bargaining agreements are evidence of solid trade union achievements," Meany told the delegates.

The accomplishments and activities, Meany added, further demonstrate "your complete dedication in the fight for free and democratic trade unionism."

"Your total involvement in this struggle," Meany continued, "assures Turk-Is workers of active participation, leadership and responsibility in a democratic society."

One of the most critical problems "of our times is the need of all nations to achieve and sustain economic growth and decent conditions of life and labor for the great mass of the people," Meany said.

This can only be done, he added, through labor's efforts to secure for workers an "equitable" distribution of the benefits of their increased productivity "so that higher purchasing power will be assured."

In his message, he emphasized that the American labor movement in all of its objectives "is dedicated to peace, freedom and social progress for Americans and for all peoples of the earth."

In this spirit, Meany pointed out, "the AFL-CIO has constantly urged our Congress to include economic assistance in foreign aid programs and to establish appropriate mechanisms for assuring its effectiveness in nation-building."

The Lesson of Memphis

THE GARBAGE WORKERS' strike victory in Memphis reaches well beyond the dramatic breakthrough of union recognition, higher wages, grievance procedure and the rest of the settlement terms.

Out of the bitter struggle—a struggle that took the life of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.—has come a new understanding and recognition that the coalition of labor, civil rights and religious groups can marshal the strength to overcome the racists, the union-busters, the reactionaries.

The lesson of Memphis must be carried to other cities, north and south, east and west, wherever workers are poor, exploited and discriminated against. The unity that was forged in that battle may be the greatest memorial that can be built to Dr. King.

A Gift for Speculators

THE WEIRD WORLD of international finance and banking momentarily exposed its face last week when the chairman of the Federal Reserve Board "lost his cool" and declared that the nation is in the midst of the "worst financial crisis since 1931."

In the words of one columnist, the somewhat hysterical outburst "was a great gift for the speculators." But beyond that William McChesney Martin simply bewildered millions of Americans, who in the words of another government expert—Arthur Okun, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers—have "never had it so good."

If Martin had his way he would solve the problems of the international money markets by slowing down economic growth so that Americans won't have it so good.

Slowing down the economy, with its possible resultant rise in unemployment, might take care of "confidence in the dollar" in the counting rooms of Europe, but what will it do to the overriding need for action on America's urban crisis, of the urgency to step up the drive on poverty?

No Time for Tinkering

THE CHILD LABOR regulation based on the Fair Labor Standards Act in 1938 was a milestone in the nation's history of social legislation. The cruel exploitation of youngsters that went too long unnoticed finally shocked the country into action.

Now, with child labor a relatively minor problem, the U.S. Dept. of Labor has come along with proposals to ease the regulations, allowing youngsters to work longer hours when school is in session, to be employed at hazardous occupations that require mature judgment and training.

The department first suggested changes in standards last year and the resulting outcry sent the drafters scurrying back to their desks. The latest draft published in the Federal Register still fails to measure up to adequate protection for young workers.

It's time the department quit tinkering with the child labor standard and put its energy and resources to better use.

City Dump

Breakthrough Pressed:

Tragic Toll of Job Accidents Cries Out for Federal Remedy

EACH YEAR the 50,000 or more dead marked up on our highways bring understandable sorrow to the American people. Yet what the U.S. Labor Dept. has called "On the Job Slaughter—A National Shame" has to date failed to stir urgently needed action on the part of Congress.

"In the next eight minutes," says the Labor Dept. in an almost gruesome pamphlet, "a man or woman in America will be killed needlessly . . . 148 others will be disabled, many of them maimed for life . . . not slaughtered on the highways . . . not victims of fire or flood . . . but cut down on the job, in the prosaic work-a-day business of earning their daily bread."

The annual figures are shocking: every 12 months 14,000 to 15,000 Americans are killed on the job . . . more than 2 million are disabled by occupational accidents . . . over 500,000 disabled by occupational disease . . . more than 7 million are hurt.

For years the American labor movement has urged the necessity for adequate occupational health and safety legislation—legislation that would correct inadequate state safety programs and reach the thousands of enterprises—generally 500 workers or less—that have little, if any, safety programs of their own.

This year has come a breakthrough. Pres. Johnson has urged Congress to enact the "nation's first comprehensive Occupational Safety & Health Program." Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.) and Rep. James O'Hara (D-Mich.) have introduced identical bills in line with the President's proposals.

The legislation would require every employer in interstate commerce to furnish his employes safe and healthful working conditions. It authorizes the secretary of labor to issue orders correcting any violations he may find with civil penalties of up to $1,000 for each violation. It gives him power to decline jurisdiction in matters governed by state law where he finds state law adequate, and it provides federal grants for states to strengthen their own inspection laws.

The House Select Subcommittee on Labor has held hearings on the bill and is now at work preparing a version that takes into consideration some of the criticism directed against it. It is spelling out, for example, more specific provisions under which the secretary of labor may delegate health and safety inspection to the states.

The Senate Labor Subcommittee, to which the legislation has been referred, has held one hearing at which Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz denounced the "national shame" of inadequate health and safety laws that imperil American workers.

Until the house Subcommittee comes up with its version of the bill, further action in the Senate is likely to be stalled. Time is of the essence if anything is to be accomplished this year. Meanwhile, the tragic figures keep mounting.

WHAT POSSIBLE reason can there be to put off legislation designed to curb, as far as possible, the tragic loss of life and limb suffered each day by American workers? To put off bringing to an end, as far as possible, the immense financial loss suffered by individuals, by industry itself and by state and local governments—all of which must bear the burden of paying for such loss?

Most of the opposition to the legislation has come from such groups as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers, the Association of General Contractors. In the face of the damning statistics, they contend that the legislation is not necessary; that the states are doing the job; that the federal government should not interfere—the same arguments that were used against the meat inspection law and are now being used against the fish and poultry law.

A letter campaign is in full swing against the proposed health and safety legislation—20 letters opposed, to 1 for—yet behind nine-tenths of the arguments is the one cynical one . . . "it will cost too much."

The lives of thousands of Americans are at stake in the current controversy . . . lives far more precious to the nation than the cost of saving them. (PAI)

'Investment in America':

'Bold, Positive Action' Urged As Answer to Race Extremists

The following is excerpted from an address by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to the Catholic Interracial Council in New York.

THE nay-sayers, the unbelievers, are with us again. They come in several varieties. All of them, in some way, base their case on the riots.

There are the so-called black militants, who insist that no progress has been made and that no progress is possible. They reject American society as a "white society," inherently hostile to Negroes. At times they call for exile to a black state of their own, very carefully excluding uncomfortable alternatives on other continents. They preach hatred and foment violence.

Although they have little following among Negroes, they fuel the passions of their white equivalents and weaken the good-will of the timid. And they are all too well served by the communications media which are fascinated by the screams of a Carmichael, by sensationalism which it falsely calls news.

On the other side, but nearly identical, are the white vigilantes, some of them, to the nation's shame, holding respected positions in government and in community life. They blame the disorders on the progress they tried to prevent. And their prescription for disorders is the gun.

Incredible as it seems, they have been politically strong enough to block gun control legislation—even a bill to control the mail order sale of rifles like the one that killed John F. Kennedy.

It is easy to say that both these extremist groups are wrong; that each in its own way is a threat to what most Americans consider to be the American way of life.

It is not so easy to assess the impact of these extremists, and of the disorders for which both have been responsible, upon the moderate but deeply concerned citizens of both races. The counsel of despair on the one hand and of fear on the other are all too likely to weaken the vital center, now made up of the overwhelming majority who have faith in democracy, faith in America and faith in the future.

It has long been clear to us in the AFL-CIO that the only answer to both the extremists and the well-meaning falterers is action—bold, positive action to convert paper rights into tangible progress.

The urban riots have been in large measure explosions of disappointed hopes. I do not condone the riots—no one can—but we must understand them. We should understand that a law which at last ratifies the Declaration of Independence—that "all men are created equal"—is of little comfort to whom the fruits of equality are a long time coming.

That's why we say there has been too much talk and too little action on housing, where the minimum need is for a half a million low-rent units a year; on job creation, because America needs a million new, useful jobs right now; on education, not just to continue but to expand the present structure, including Head Start and Catch-Up, with enough money in every case to make all of these, not tokens or experiments, but meaningful on-going undertakings.

I mentioned money. This is a word we hear in Congress all the time. Congressman Mills, and he's the man who controls the purse-strings, says everything must be cut back, not just now but for the foreseeable future. And he has plenty of allies.

On what grounds? Because of the Viet Nam war, some say.

Yes, the Viet Nam war is expensive. Protecting freedom is always expensive. But it's worth it.

The Viet Nam war is costing something like $25 billion a year. That's just about as much as the annual increase in the Gross National Product, the whole amount of goods and services turned out by the United States each year.

Gross National Product is now running at about $800 billion a year. Take away $25 billion for Viet Nam and you still have $775 billion or so to use for other needs.

Actually, when we in the AFL-CIO call for greater outlays to meet these needs, we are not asking for expenditures. We are calling for investment—investment in America.

The record bears us out. When government funds—federal, state or local— are used to improve the way of life of the people in any enduring way, there are huge returns not only in terms of social progress but in dollars and cents. The proposition that may have been debatable once, 30 years ago, is now beyond challenge—public measures that enhance the general welfare are self-liquidating, through the dollars returned in taxes to the public treasury.

The government doesn't keep its books that way, but the facts are beyond dispute. The sustained general prosperity of recent years—what is called the "affluent society"—is the direct progress of social investments proposed by Presidents John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson, and enacted by Congress—especially the 89th Congress.

SO THIS COUNTRY can afford to do what is right—what, in fact, is urgently necessary—and get even richer in the process. The reward for good works can be reaped, at least in a material sense, right here on earth.

Three weeks ago tonight this cause, and this country, lost a great leader.

Martin Luther King, Jr., sought the brotherhood of man; and he sought it in the spirit of love for his neighbor, of love among all neighbors, here and throughout the world.

Because he rejected violence—the same mindless violence that struck him down—he was scorned by those misguided Negroes who think of themselves as "radicals." Yet in truth, what Dr. King preached, and what he exemplified, is the most radical doctrine the world has ever known—the doctrine of universal brotherhood.

It has been a radical doctrine for nearly 2,000 years, for it challenges, not only the familiar sins and shortcomings of man, but other characteristics that society tolerates. It challenges self-interest as well as selfishness, acquisitiveness as well as greed, unkindness as well as cruelty.

Few of us fully embrace that doctrine in our daily lives, no matter how sincerely we pledge our faith in it. It remains a goal, infinitely brighter and farther from reach than any other. Yet it lights the path to the future.

Community Service Role Stressed:

Basic Human Problems Seen Underlying Crisis of the Cities

ATTACKING HUMAN problems that have persisted too long should be the core of the nation's drive to meet the crisis of the cities, the AFL-CIO's community services director declared on nationwide radio.

Leo Perlis, appearing on Labor News Conference, stressed that the basic problems stem from "old needs that have come to the fore again." The trade union movement's community service role has always been to "work with the poor . . . needy people—whether they are on strike, have been hit by disaster, are unemployed, or whatever," he said. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs broadcast is aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Radio Network.

Perlis listed medical care, hospitalization, schools, parks, and family counseling related to alcoholism and mental illness, among the areas of "personal and family needs" in which union activity will grow. The labor movement, he asserted, will "work with other sections of society . . . to meet the needs of the whole community."

He said the 13th annual National Conference on Community Services, just held in Washington, was set up as "an inward look" at the relationship of community services to union organization, public relations and social action at all levels in the AFL-CIO. More than 450 union and agency delegates from around the country attended the four-day session.

Reporters questioning Perlis were Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc., and William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News.

By Press Associates, Inc.

NOT SINCE last August when Pres. Johnson proposed a 10 percent surtax on incomes to fight inflation has there been as much tax talk around Washington as in recent weeks.

Legislatively, the story is strangely complicated. The Senate, in an amendment to the excise tax bill, has voted for the 10 percent surtax and, at the same time, has called for a $6 billion cut in expenditures. The bill, as amended, is now in conference, but the House conferees are anything but enthusiastic about it.

The Johnson Administration still wants a tax boost, but it believes that the compulsory slashing of $6 billion from the budget is certain to wreck many domestic programs. Many of these are deeply imbedded in the war on poverty, the crippling of which might well produce new troubles in the city ghettos of the nation this summer.

What has come out of the debate of the past weeks, notably in the Senate, however, is the growing recognition that some kind of a tax increase is inevitable if major "war on poverty" programs are to be saved.

Only recently the Urban Coalition, which has strong labor support, called attention to the grave danger of across-the-board slashes of federal expenditures without regard to need or merit.

"Such cuts, irrational by definition, could produce tragic results, and we oppose them", the Urban Coalition said. "If Congress rises to its responsibilities, it will increase, not cut, expenditures for essential programs such as jobs, housing, education, and community services."

IN THE LIGHT of the Johnson Administration's insistence that more revenue is urgently needed; in the light of the equally strong insistence of the Federal Reserve System that the current government deficit be held down; in the light of even business acknowledgment that the government needs more revenue; tax increase would appear very much in the cards for some time this year.

Should that happen, the kind of tax increase will become of the utmost importance. And it is here that vital decisions, which will affect every American worker, will be made.

Already there have been numerous proposals as to the way the additional revenue can be attained.

Some congressmen and economists have talked in terms of reimposition of an excess profits tax on war contracts.

Still others are calling for elimination of the tax loopholes that have scandalized the nation by their gross unfairness to the small wage earner and their liberality to millionaires.

There is little chance that in this election year there will be time, or even desire, on the part of Congress to go thoroughly into the twisting labyrinth of tax loopholes. There is, instead, a limited approach that offers a practical way to insure that whatever tax increase is voted is on a just and fair basis.

That is the approach taken by the AFL-CIO in calling for the sound principle of "ability to pay". In testimony on the 10 percent surtax proposal last August, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany laid down three basic changes in the Administration's proposal of a straight, across-the-board boost. He called for:

- A surtax rate on corporations at least twice as great as on individuals. Meany pointed out that profits and dividends have soared during the past ten years by up to 74 percent, while the buying power of workers' wages has gone up only 11 percent during the same period.
- A lump sum deduction for individual and family taxpayers in calculating their surtax, so that lower-income taxpayers would not have to pay at the same rate as higher income taxpayers— "aimed at strengthening the principle of ability to pay."
- A plan for applying the surtax rate to a part of income not now subject to regular income tax because of loopholes. These loopholes would include the present exclusion for tax purposes of half of capital gains, tax-exempt income from state and local bonds, and oil, gas and mineral depletion allowances.

THE CORE ATTACK on the urban crisis should be directed against human problems that have persisted too long, AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis (center), declared on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Harry Conn (left) of Press Associates, Inc., and William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is aired weekly over Mutual Radio.

Interest Rate Boost Scored As Dangerous

reached in this century. The real rate for FHA home mortgages—taking into account "points" charged by lenders to evade FHA ceilings—was already close to 7 percent, he said.

The federal reserve discount rate in the nation's biggest money market areas was raised from 5 to 5.5 percent, and the rate that banks charge their best, risk-free borrowers is usually 1 percent above the discount rate. Most business borrowers pay higher rates and individuals the highest rates of all.

Goldfinger told the AFL-CIO News that "tight money and record high interest rates" could have an immediate effect on home-building, "stalling the drive for more and better housing and affecting such related industries as commercial construction, lumber and building materials."

He warned that "the American people, as a whole, will eventually pay the price. Since interest rates are part of the cost of everything, high and rising interest rates will mean price boosts to home-buyers, consumers, small business, farmers, state and local governments, and the federal government, itself."

Thus, he indicated, an action the reserve board bills as an "anti-inflation" measure would actually push prices up.

Goldfinger said the nation needs "with increasing urgency," not tighter money and the highest interest rates in this century, "but a fair and equitable tax increase."

He cited AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's testimony last August before the House Ways & Means Committee in favor of such an increase.

It was needed then and "is much more urgently required now," Goldfinger stressed.

"Congressional action is needed, without delay, to ease pressures in the money markets and to make it possible to reduce interest rates from their soaring highs," he declared.

Food Program Urged to Fight Basic Hunger

At least 10 million persons, mostly in the South and Southwest, suffer from chronic hunger and malnutrition, and the government should provide free food in 256 counties where a real emergency exists.

This recommendation came from a citizens group financed by a number of churches and foundations to investigate reports last year to a Senate subcommittee of cases of starvation in Mississippi.

The Citizens' Board of Inquiry into Hunger and Malnutrition in the United States urged the President to initiate emergency food programs immediately in the 256 counties. It urged also emergency food programs at migrant farm camps and on some Indian reservations.

Its longer-range recommendations called for a free food stamp program and a food distribution program to be handled by either the Office of Economic Opportunity or the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

The 100-page report said that current federal efforts to help the needy with food have failed to reach a significant number of the poor and those reached were not aided to any substantial degree.

Meany Cited for Aid On Immigration Law

New York—America must be "the land of opportunity" for all of its citizens and all who come to it looking for a better life, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared at a dinner in his honor given by the American Committee for Italian Migration.

Meany emphasized that labor's struggle for social progress, an adequate minimum wage, unemployment insurance, social security and civil rights improves the lot of all citizens and all future citizens.

"It is not boasting," he continued, "to say that the trade union movement, representing the largest organization of private citizens in America, is the number one advocate in bringing improvements for all of our citizens."

All the remedial and protective legislation on the statute books at both the federal and state level "bears the mark of the trade union effort," he said.

Cooperation Required

As for today's probems, they are "of such magnitude" that their solution will require the cooperation of all private organizations and government, he observed.

Meany congratulated the ACIM for its "long-time fight" to secure amendments to the Immigration Nationality Act—known as the McCarran-Walter Act—to modify its provisions placing quotas on immigrants according to national origin.

The abolishment of the quota system in 1965 and the establishment of "preference categories" based on immigrants' prospects for a future in the U.S. "represent a substantial improvement," Meany said.

With the new standard, which becomes effective July 1, Meany pointed out that as many as 20,000 Italian immigrants may be admitted annually compared to about 6,000 under the old system.

The ACIM honored the role played by Meany and the AFL-CIO in helping to bring about the new amendments to the immigration law.

Juvenal Marchisio, committee chairman, presented Meany with a bronze plaque in recognition of his "humanitarian spirit" and continuing efforts on behalf of immigrants. Marchisio described labor as the "decisive factor" in reforming the law.

A message of greetings to Meany from Pres. Giuseppe Saragat of Italy was read by Vieri Traxler, the Italian consul in New York.

The affair drew some 600 prominent Americans of Italian descent, labor and government officials.

The proceedings were filmed by Vanni Montana, editor of the Ladies' Garment Workers' Italian-language newspaper, "Giustizia" (Justice), for later presentation on television in Italy.

Fire Fighters' Leader Becomes N. Y. Mediator

New York—Gerald J. Ryan resigned as president of the Uniformed Firemen's Association and as a city fireman to accept appointment as a State Mediation Board staff member. Vice Pres. Frank A. Palumbo will serve as acting president until a successor to Ryan is elected.

Ryan, a member of Rescue Squad 3 in the Bronx, joined the department in 1939. He served nine years as president of Fire Fighters Local 94 and 18 years as an executive board member.

At L. A. Conference:

Mexican-American, Labor Ties Stressed

Los Angeles—Leaders of labor and the nation's largest Mexican-American community set a new course toward their "natural alliance" in a candid one-day conference here to explore the pressure points in big city living today.

Mostly, in 11 workshops and at two plenary sessions attended by 300 delegates, labor heard what the Mexican-American minority in the U.S. is seeking.

And AFL-CIO leadership here responded with a pledge of joint action and a call to "channel the rage" in American cities so that constructive social change can be realized.

More than 500,000 persons of Mexican ancestry live in Los Angeles.

Vicente T. Ximenes, member of the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, stressed that labor was "uniquely fitted to understand and to cope with the conditions in which minority group members find themselves."

More and better jobs, he indicated, was the key to solving minority problems.

Ximenes, chairman of the President's Inter-Agency Committee on Mexican-American Affairs, which includes five Cabinet members, said it was "time for the giants of commerce, which have thrived in an open business market, to open the labor market."

Problem Cited

He sounded the depths of the Mexican-American problem, including an average of five years of schooling—lowest of any major ethnic group; as much as 13 percent unemployment in Mexican-American slums in 1966 when the national rate was 4 percent; low-level jobs for three of every four Mexican-American blue collar workers.

He said correction could be achieved through "meaningful" job tests, methods of recruitment that "reach the people," promotion procedures that "observe the spirit as well as the letter of equal employment opportunity laws" and training opportunities that do not "exclude those most in need of skills."

"It is now time for labor unions to exert every ounce of influence and power they have in behalf of the man who—in our great abundance—cannot even earn a living," Ximenes added.

He said the vehicle must be "understanding and communication."

The conference was sponsored by the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO through its Mexican-American labor action committee.

It sought to examine social, economic and political issues of common concern, assure permanent channels of communication and promote programs for joint action.

Federation Executive Sec. Sigmund Arywitz said the conference symbolized a renewal of the "natural alliance that exists between labor and minority groups."

'Too Much Forgotten'

"Too much of the labor movement has forgotten what it is to be poor. The great depression of the 1930s has been forgotten. The economic advances of the labor movement are now taken for granted. We seek to restore that old closeness," Arywitz said.

Donald Slaiman, AFL-CIO civil rights director, said while "unions should follow an aggressive policy" of employment opportunity for minorities, the latter ought not "get hooked on the red herring that unions are solely to blame" for the lack of such opportunity.

Slaiman said "95 percent of employment in the U.S. is done by employers, usually unilaterally."

Dr. Julian Nava, Los Angeles Board of Education member, told the conference luncheon that the "melting pot hasn't worked" in America.

He urged setting aside "our insistence on 'cultural homogeneity' in favor of 'cultural diversity.'" Diversity, he added, "has always been one of the great sources of strength in this society."

Nava asked organized labor to "roll up its sleeves and get to work even harder" so that it could aid Mexican-Americans in generating "self-help."

said, they often weaken the goodwill of the timid and "are all too well served by the communications media which are fascinated by the screams of a Carmichael, by sensationalism which it falsely calls news."

"On the other side, but nearly identical," he continued, "are the white vigilantes, some of them, to the nation's shame, holding respected positions in government and community life."

They blame disorders "on the progress they tried to prevent" and their "prescription for disorders is the gun," Meany stated, adding:

"Incredible as it seems, they have been politically strong enough to block gun control legislation—even a bill to control the mail order sale of rifles like the one that killed John F. Kennedy."

The AFL-CIO has long understood, Meany declared, "that the only answer to both the extremists and the well-meaning falterers is action—bold, positive action to convert paper rights into tangible progress."

No one can condone riots, he observed, "but we must understand them. We should understand that a law which at last ratifies the Declaration of Independence—that 'all men are created equal'—is of little comfort to whom the fruits of equality are a long time coming."

There has been "too much talk and too little action" on a number of subjects, Meany said:

On housing, "where the minimum need is for a half a million low-rent units a year."

On job creation, "because America needs a million new, useful jobs right now."

On education, "not just to continue but to expand the present structure, including Head Start and Catch-Ups . . . not tokens or experiments, but meaningful, on-going undertakings."

He told the dinner audience that the cause of interracial justice "lost a great leader" in the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

Dr. King, he said, sought the brotherhood of a man "in a spirit of love for his neighbor, of love among all neighbors, here and throughout the world."

This doctrine of "universal brotherhood," Meany said, is a goal brighter than any other and "it lights a path to the future" that the nation and all of its citizens must follow.

The award presented to Meany, a scroll made by Carmelite nuns, honors the late Father LaFarge, who founded the council in 1934 and fought most of his life against racial bigotry and discrimination.

It cited Meany's "important contributions in the field of interracial justice," including efforts to bring minority youths into apprentice programs and remove racial barriers in housing and jobs.

In accepting the award, Meany stressed he did so in the belief that it recognized the achievements of the entire American labor movement—its unions, leaders and rank-and-file members.

"They are doing the job; and they have earned the credit," he said.

Before Supreme Court:

Labor Asks Rights On Election Rules

A union has the right to establish reasonable qualifications for its officers, even if the secretary of labor or a federal judge happens to disagree, the AFL-CIO told the Supreme Court.

The federation intervened with a brief in a Supreme Court case which it viewed as a test of the Labor Dept.'s "papa knows best" approach to union election procedures.

At issue, basically, is whether the Landrum-Griffin Act gives the government supervision over every detail of union procedures or whether it merely provides machinery to rectify clear-cut violations of democratic procedures and rights guaranteed by law.

The case which reached the Supreme Court—through an appeal by the Labor Dept. of two lower court decisions favoring the union—illustrates the type of government intervention challenged in the AFL-CIO brief.

Local 6 of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes in New York has about 26,000 members throughout the city. In annual shop elections, they choose some 500 delegates to an assembly, the union's rank-and-file legislative body. Any union member may run for election to the assembly, but only members who have served at least one term in the assembly may be candidates for citywide election to the top offices in the local.

Since most union members have not served in the delegate body, the Labor Dept. upheld a complaint by a small group of Local 6 members that their rights were violated because they were unable to qualify as candidates for union office. Under the procedures of the Landrum-Griffin Act, the secretary of labor asked a federal district court to order a new election with any union member eligible to run.

Union Upheld

The court said the law was not violated and rejected the complaint. It noted that the complaining members had run for election to the assembly and were defeated.

The government appealed the decision and was slapped down by the U.S. 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals.

The appellate court decision—praised in the AFL-CIO brief—said the Landrum-Griffin Act was not intended to "take away from labor unions the governance of their own itnernal affairs and hand that governance over either to the courts or to the secretary of labor."

The court said it was not "unreasonable" for Local 6 to require a year of experience in a delegate assembly as a condition for election to higher office. And it noted that the union has democratic procedures by which its election rules can be changed, but no effort has been made to change the rules.

When the secretary of labor took a further appeal to the Supreme Court, the AFL-CIO entered the case with its brief in support of Local 6.

Its purpose, the federation said, was to affirm the right of unions to adopt the democratic procedures their members consider most appropriate—so long as the procedures and rules are "a rational means of achieving a legitimate end."

A union's membership may be right or wrong in believing that the union will get better officers by requiring prior service but, the AFL-CIO brief contends, Congress didn't intend to authorize the courts to second-guess the membership.

In an analogy, there can be disagreement over the desirability of the requirement in the U.S. Constitution that the President be a natural-born citizen over 35. But since a rational argument can be made for such a requirement and there are provisions for amending it, the qualification is not unreasonable, the brief suggested.

Presumption of Guilt

The AFL-CIO sharply criticized the Labor Dept.'s presumption that any qualification standard which permitted only a minority of members to run for top union office violates the law.

Two unions might require that candidates have attended at least three meetings during the past year, the federation noted. In one local, 65 percent of the members might qualify under this rule; in another only 10 percent might meet the standard.

The election rules members of Local 6 might find best to meet the problems of their union might be unsuitable for a small craft union or a large industrial union whose members work at a single plant, the federation noted.

"We do not argue that every eligibility rule must be allowed to pass muster," the federation told the Supreme Court.

"We argue simply that the courts should overturn only those rules which are arbitrary or lack a logical connection to a legitimate end. Thus, our position is that the courts and the secretary should normally defer to the decision of the membership."

Freeman, Cohen Back Humphrey Candidacy

Vice Pres. Humphrey won the endorsement of two more members of Pres. Johnson's Cabinet as Agriculture Sec. Orville L. Freeman and Acting Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Wilbur J. Cohen urged him to seek the Democratic nomination for president.

Freeman and Cohen joined Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz in backing the Vice President to succeed Johnson. Wirtz was the first member of the White House team to publicly voice his support for Humphrey. He did so while addressing the Operating Engineers' convention, Apr. 4.

Freeman, who has been a friend of Humphrey's since they attended the University of Minnesota together, said that while he liked and admired Sen. Robert F. Kennedy of New York and Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy, also a fellow Minnesotan, "I have made my choice and it was not a difficult decision."

He said he intended "to do all I can" to persuade Humphrey to run and to help elect him. He called the Vice President a candidate "who heals and unifies, not hurts and divides."

Cohen also described Humphrey as "a healer," calling him "a great man . . . dedicated to every important social and economic advance in this country during the 19 years I have known him."

Meanwhile, the Vice President announced that he would discuss "the state of the nation and the fate of Hubert Humphrey" at a Washington luncheon, Apr. 27, leaving little doubt that he would declare his candidacy.

The luncheon is being sponsored by United Democrats for Humphrey, a recently formed broad-based citizens group that includes AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. The organization was established with the specific goal of persuading the Vice President to seek the Democratic presidential nomination.

Joining a long list of labor supporters for the Humphrey candidacy is the Maryland State and D.C. AFL-CIO which this week sent a telegram to the Vice President urging him to enter the race.

Elsewhere on the political scene, the Pennsylvania presidential primary ran according to form with McCarthy, the only candidate on the Democratic ballot, piling up a big vote, and Sen. Joseph S. Clark winning renomination against the opposition of Rep. John H. Dent.

Returns from 8,046 of 9,460 precincts gave McCarthy 373,907 votes to write-in tallies of 43,843 for Kennedy, 34,744 for Humphrey, 11,970 for Johnson and 5,517 for former Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama.

In the Democratic senatorial race, returns from 9,270 precincts gave Clark 428,345 to 373,234 for Dent, who simultaneously and successfully ran for renomination to the House.

The Republican ballot included only write-in candidates, with former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon running 3-to-1 ahead of his nearest contender, New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller.

The primary results are not binding on the Pennsylvania delegations to the Republican and Democratic national conventions next August.

Congress Urged to Pass Federal Fish Inspection

A federal fish inspection program is needed now to protect America's families against disease and food poisoning, the AFL-CIO told a Senate committee.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller termed fish inspection "just as important as meat inspection" to consumers. He said contaminated fish can make people just as sick as contaminated meat and poultry and cited outbreaks in recent years which have hospitalized hundreds of people.

Biemiller reiterated labor's support for a fish inspection program—expressed at the federation's 1967 convention—in a letter to Chairman Warren Magnuson (D-Wash.) of the Senate Commerce Committee.

He urged quick action on the Administration's fish inspection bill, with strengthening amendments along lines urged by the Meat Cutters in that union's testimony.

Earlier, Meat Cutters Legislative Rep. Arnold Mayer had told the committee's consumer subcommittee that federal action is needed to protect both consumers and fish processing workers "against the dangers of handling and consuming unwholesome, adulterated and otherwise unfit fish."

The Administration bill, Mayer said, "is aimed at preventing filth and abominable conditions on vessels, in ports or in plants."

He said the legislation should be improved by stronger provisions for continuous inspection of fish processing and a quicker procedure for federal inspection of plants in states which do not set up their own inspection system.

He also urged approval of a companion bill which would provide federal technical and financial assistance to help the fish industry upgrade its facilities to meet federal standards.

Mayer praised the bill's requirement that imported fish—which makes up more than half of all fish consumed in the United States—be required to meet the same inspection standards.

"The misery of illness does not distinguish whether the fish was caught and processed by U.S. or by foreign firms," he said.

Biemiller expressed the belief that effective fish inspection would help the industry by boosting the market for its products.

He cited consumer tests which found "a high proportion of substandard, bad-tasting fish products in retail markets from such causes as defective packaging, inadequate refrigeration, and plain old age."

O'Malley Honored At Cleveland Dinner

Cleveland, O.—Political, religious and business leaders joined with labor in testimonial tribute to Pres. Patrick J. O'Malley of the Cleveland AFL-CIO, who retires this year as regional director of the Auto Workers after 19 years in the post.

Mail Union Votes to Join Laborers

join the Laborers this year. In February, the Journeymen Stone Cutters merged after 115 years as a separate craft.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler told delegates to the Mail Handlers convention that the added resources of the Laborers will mean that the union's influence "will be enhanced, not diminished. Your members will get more attention, more protection."

Earlier, in a letter to McAvoy, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany wished the union success in its merger arrangement and predicted that it would lead to "great benefits to the workers you represent."

The Laborers have put on an intensive organizing campaign in the public employe field in recent years and the union reports that it now represents more than 30,000 federal blue collar workers outside the postal service.

The Mail Handlers were originally chartered as the Postal Laborers and used that name until 1944, when the government job title was changed.

The union's members load and unload mail trucks and perform other manual jobs in the larger post offices. Moreschi noted that their work is similar to that performed by many members of the Laborers in private industry.

Court Upheld In Rejection of Card Check

The Supreme Court refused to review, and thus let stand, a lower court ruling in a union authorization card case.

The 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Richmond, Va., refused by a 2-1 vote last November to order Crawford Mfg. Co., Inc., Emporia, Kan., to bargain with the Clothing Workers on the basis of authorization cards signed by a majority of eligible employes.

Appeals Judges Albert V. Bryan and Harrison L. Winter ruled that the National Labor Relations Board failed to show clear proof that the workers signed cards "free of any misapprehension of their purpose."

Judge Simon E. Sobeloff said in dissent that the cards were straightforward applications for membership and the court's majority conclusion was "directly contrary to the trial examiner's explanatory statements and . . . findings of fact."

Conference Reviews Programs:

Unions Stepping Up Community Activity

Community service activities are an integral and growing force in all areas of AFL-CIO activities, an estimated 500 delegates to the 13th annual AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services found.

Participants included 175 full-time AFL-CIO community service staffers from 125 urban centers across the nation.

Local, state and national union leaders lauded the audience for their past accomplishments and spurred them to do still more.

AFL-CIO Community Services Committee Chairman Joseph A. Beirne put strong emphasis on the need to act on—and to understand—the problems of those trapped in America's boiling ghettoes.

"The plight and the agony of those in need are not being heard," Beirne said. "If this Congress represents what we are thinking, then we should be ashamed of ourselves.

"People who are in need, people who are destitute—these people are expressing their dissatisfaction in the only way they know, the only way they were taught," he asserted. "Now we find our cities in flames, our nation being torn up inside."

He challenged the delegates to "see to it your international presidents—including Joe Beirne—are gigged, are pushed, are reminded, are harrassed" into answering the cries from the slums.

Changes Needed

"The whole area of mass appeal is changing," said Beirne, who is president of the striking Communications Workers and an AFL-CIO vice president. "Today we have to say loud and clear where we stand. We have not been doing that effectively enough.

"Those who are trapped in the ghetto want to tell us what they need, but they aren't being heard," he added. "All they hear is others telling them 'this is good for you.' "

He called upon the delegates to go to the slums, to find the causes of disenchantment and to work toward a solution with those involved.

"Our unions of tomorrow are going to be strong or non-existent based upon what we do in our communities," he added.

AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis told the audience that the "coalition between organized labor and organized social welfare, forged on the firing lines of human need, has made notable contributions to a humane American democratic society."

Among its accomplishments, he said, has been to free those with basic needs for employment, relief, food, shelter and medical care from the domination as in the past of "political warlords."

New Services

"Now," he said, "these and many more new services—such as consumer counselling, family counselling, strike relief, disaster services and even riot relief—are being made available as a matter of right to all in need by organized social welfare and organized labor through its community services activities."

He said trade unions are developing from purely economically-oriented organizations into broad community service organizations "based, of course, on their collective bargaining relationships, but concerned more and more with the health and welfare of members and their families as whole human beings and complete citizens beyond the plant gates."

He predicted that this development will accelerate over the next 20 years as a result of automation, the shorter workweek and the longer weekend, early retirement and increased longevity.

"The creative use of free time," he suggested, "can be used effectively in organizing the unorganized, in urban development, in the elimination of discrimination and poverty and in the development of adequate community facilities and public services for all."

Musicians Pres. Herman D. Kenin, an AFL-CIO vice president and head of the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employees, reviewed the federation's developing Demonstration Arts Project being launched in four cities, saying:

"We in the labor movement are opening new doors, new opportunities for the worker and his family. Through the power of organization we are going to knock down the walls of snobbery, of high costs, of indifferent administration that have over the centuries served to wall off the arts and other cultural activities from the worker.

"And we are going to help the worker and his wife and his children participate in the audiences, on the boards of directors, in the schools of our country's cultural establishment. We are going to democratize the arts as we democratized many political organizations, civic associations, and the social welfare agencies.

"We are going to return the arts in this country to all the people, and we are going to make them richer, more exciting, more fulfilling in the process."

Strike Aid

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan, secretary of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, noted how the AFL-CIO community services activities had resulted in massive strike assistance.

"This assistance in many instances has been the outstanding factor enabling our union members to continue their struggle," he said, citing its recent application in the copper strike, the Ford Motor Co. strike, and the Glass Bottle Blowers strike.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Paul Hall, president of the Seafarers, called community service activities "the most active and effective" in the federation.

Among other participants in the conference were AFL-CIO Public Relations Dir. Albert J. Zack; Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher; Education Dir. Walter G. Davis; State & Central Bodies Coordinator Stanton Smith; Gordon Cole, editor of The Machinist; State AFL-CIO Presidents Harry Boyer of Pennsylvania, Charles A. Della of Maryland, David K. Roe of Minnesota and Dallas W. Sells of Indiana; Harry E. Mayfield, president, Franklin County (Ohio) AFL-CIO; Sigmund Arywitz, executive secretary, Los Angeles County AFL-CIO; Rex Clifford, president, Retail Store Employees Local 400.

A panel on community services in the international union was conducted by Don Fancey of the IBEW, Peter Voeller of the Retail Clerks and William Walsh of CWA.

AFL-CIO-CSA Assistant Dir. Robert A. Rosekrans, and staffers Ray Andrus, Edward J. Carlin and Lynn MacGowan coordinated several other sessions involving service to veterans, youth opportunities and first aid.

"UNIONS OF TOMORROW are going to be strong or non-existent based upon what we do in our communities," AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne told an estimated 500 delegates to the 13th annual AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services in Washington, D. C. Beirne is chairman of the federation's Community Services Committee.

Grogan Named Delegate to UN Rights Parley

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. John J. Grogan was named by Pres. Johnson as a member of the six-man United States delegation to the United Nations Conference on Human Rights, which opened in Teheran, Iran, on April 22.

The U.S. delegation is headed by Roy Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Other members are David H. Popper, deputy assistant secretary of state for international affairs; Morris B. Abrams, U.S. representative on the UN Commission on Human Rights; and Bruno B. Bitker, a member of the President's Commission for the Observance of Human Rights.

Grogan, who is president of the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers, was accompanied to the conference by Henry Kirsch, a representative of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs. He will serve as Grogan's adviser.

At its meeting in February, the AFL-CIO Executive Council adopted a resolution supporting the conference and urging that a labor representative be included in the U.S. delegation.

The council noted that the conference marks the 20th anniversary of the proclamation of the Declaration of Human Rights by the UN General Assembly and recalled that labor had spurred the initial drive for the declaration.

The council also renewed its appeal to the U.S. Senate for "long overdue" ratification of UN human rights treaties dealing with forced labor, freedom of association, the political rights of women and the crime of genocide.

Urban Needs Face Struggle in Congress

hand, the question has become what price the Administration is willing to pay to get a tax rise.

The Senate tossed a big bone to the House budget-slashers by linking a deep $6 billion spending cut to a 10 percent tax surcharge.

A cut that deep is unrealistic, Pres. Johnson is reported to have told congressional leaders at a White House meeting.

But apparently it isn't deep enough for House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.).

He wants stricter spending controls and, after a two-and-a-half hour meeting of the House-Senate conference committee, one participant summed it up for waiting newsmen with the comment, "There was no meeting of minds."

Nor has there been a meeting of minds on a deadlocked supplemental appropriations bill—an example of the sharp conflict over domestic progress.

Funds Added

The Senate added to the House-passed bill $75 million for a summer job program, $25 million for Head Start, and additional school assistance funds.

The bill went to conference and House conferees refused to accept the Senate additions. The Senate conferees then gave in.

But when the conference report reached the Senate floor, the Senate majority rebelled. It rejected the measure by a more than 2-1 majority, named new conferees and sent them back to negotiate a better bill.

The House kept its same conferees, however, and at last report they were "adamant" against any added funds.

On issues other than appropriations, there have been signs of progress.

The dramatic accomplishments have been the passage of the open housing civil rights bill and an effective meat inspection bill.

A labor-supported poultry inspection bill has now been cleared by the House Agriculture Committee and its chances of passage this year appear good. A bill to strengthen the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission has won Senate committee approval.

Both the House and Senate have passed truth-in-lending bills, and this time it is the House version which has the strongest consumer protection. The legislation is currently in conference, with supporters of a strong bill reluctant to trim back the House version to reach the customary compromise.

A harder fight is in store on the occupational safety and health bill, a major legislative goal of labor and a major target of attack by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

The Administration is actively pushing the measure and a broad coalition of consumer, religious and civic organizations has been formed to press for passage.

Some cuts in the Administration's budget appear inevitable. The battles which may be decided by a scant handful of votes either way revolve around where the cuts will be made, and how deep they are to be. Bills such as the appropriations for model cities grants will be the test of whether the 90th Congress faces up to the nation's needs—or turns its back.

Profits Soar 10 Percent In First Quarter of '68

Corporation profits soared to new records in the first quarter of 1968, Business Week magazine reported.

All of the earnings reports aren't in yet, but the magazine forecast a 10 percent rise in corporate earnings over the first quarter of 1967. Projected on an annual rate, U.S. companies stand to collect $87 to $88 billion before taxes—about $52 billion after taxes.

Booming sales are responsible for part of the gain. But the article notes that profit margins are going up as well, with "more and more industries" raising prices beyond the level needed to meet any rise in costs.

A tabulation of 52 major corporations showed 47 with bigger total profits than in the first quarter of 1967. It also showed that 33 firms had a bigger profit margin than last year, compared with 14 lower margins and five with no change.

CWA's Bell System Strike Gains Full 3-Year Contract

WARM WELCOME to COPE regional conference in Washington, D.C., is extended to Vice Pres. Humphrey on the eve of his entrance into the presidential race. He is greeted by Bayard Rustin, director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, who earlier addressed the conference. With the Vice President are Evelyn Dubrow, legislative representative of the Ladies' Garment Workers; Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel; Sec.-Treas. George E. Fairchild of the Service Employes, and Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Settlement Hailed As Major Victory

By Eugene A. Kelly

The Communications Workers and the Bell telephone system reached tentative agreement on new three-year contracts to end a two-week strike involving more than 200,000 members employed by 20 Bell companies.

CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne emerged from a 24-hour marathon bargaining session to announce agreement on a "full range of wage and fringe benefits" subject to membership ratification. The terms also would apply to an additional 220,000 CWA members whose contracts expire between now and mid-November.

Beirne put the overall value of the Bell offer at 19.58 percent. It includes wage boosts of $24 a week over the contract term for top-rated plant craftsmen; $16 a week for telephone operators and clerical workers at the top of their schedule; and other benefits that Beirne estimated will cost Bell companies more than $2 billion cumulatively when applied to all nonsupervisory workers.

Beirne said in announcing the proposed settlement that all 20 tentative agreements incorporate the terms achieved first in CWA's Western Electric bargaining unit, covering 23,000 equipment installers. Also they cover disputed local issues that threatened to prolong the strike indefinitely, he said.

The final "package" incorporates improvements in a wide range of fringe items, the union's spokesman said—vacations, pensions, progression schedules, holiday and overtime pay, hospitalization, sur-

Senate Unit Strengthens EEOC Role

By David L. Perlman

A Senate committee approved a union-backed bill to strengthen the enforcement powers of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission—the agency set up to combat job discrimination.

But on the other side of the Capitol, labor's hopes of holding the line against a budget-slashing conservative coalition met with a setback. The House Appropriations Committee agreed on substantial budget cuts as the price of freeing a tax increase bill from a House-Senate conference deadlock.

Rival Democratic and Republican plans were advanced as to the amount of the cut, but both formulas would bite deeply into the funding of domestic programs.

A bipartisan 12-2 vote in the Senate Labor Committee raised chances

Write-Ins, Polls, Endorsements:

Humphrey Support Mounts As He Declares Candidacy

By John M. Barry

Support for Vice Pres. Hubert Humphrey's candidacy for president began to build rapidly following his entry into the race for the Democratic nomination.

Humphrey, after weeks of consideration and under the strong urging of friends and political followers, announced at a Washington luncheon, Apr. 27, that "I shall seek the nomination of the Democratic party."

The timing of his entry, growing out of Pres. Johnson's surprise withdrawal on Mar. 31, precluded participation in any of the major state presidential primaries.

Yet within three days of his announcement, Massachusetts Democrats gave Humphrey nearly 42,000 write-in votes in that state's primary. Thus, with no campaign effort, the Vice President drew more than a third of the vote given Sen. Eugene McCarthy of Minnesota, the only candidate on the ballot, and about two-thirds of the write-ins for New York Sen. Robert F. Kennedy of New York, a Massachusetts native. (Story, Page 5.)

There were these other developments that Humphrey supporters viewed as indications that a bandwagon was beginning to roll.

- An informal poll of congressmen reported by United Press Intl. found that "at least" 75 House members are backing Humphrey as against 15 for Kennedy and seven for McCarthy.
- Sen. Stephen M. Young of Ohio, who is expected to lead the state's delegation to the Democratic national convention as a favorite son candidate, withdrew his Apr. 1 endorsement of Kennedy.
- A Washington Post survey showed Humphrey as the strongest Democratic candidate in terms of support from business leaders and the only one of the three who would

Jobs for Minority Youth Top Manpower Problem

By Duane Emme

The job picture for the nation's minorities, its youth and its ghetto residents remains gloomy despite a booming economy, Pres. Johnson told Congress in submitting his manpower report for 1968.

The President appealed to lawmakers to enact his $2.1 billion manpower program which he first proposed in January to train 500,000 hard-core unemployed workers in new skills.

The report also bolstered Johnson's proposal for a comprehensive Occupational Health & Safety Act to protect the worker while he is on the job.

In his latest message, the President warned that there are still too many Americans who "wake up each morning and have no place to go—men who want work."

These are citizens, he added, who "cannot break the confining welfare chain or overcome the barriers of life-long discrimination or make up for the lack of schooling and training."

The President's size-up of the sit-

Cohen Credits Unions For Social Progress

Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Wilbur J. Cohen, who worked with Philip Murray and William Green in pioneering social security, received the AFL-CIO award named for the two labor leaders in ceremonies highlighting the 13th Annual AFL-CIO Community Services Conference.

"Social security, medicare, the Elementary & Secondary Education Act were and would still be just ideas without the support of labor," Cohen told an audience of 700 at the awards banquet climaxing the conference.

In accepting the Murray-Green Award, Cohen recalled his work with the two men. He also gave special credit to Nelson Cruikshank, retired AFL-CIO social security director, and Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, "without whose help these achievements would have been impossible to achieve."

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, in presenting the award, said Cohen has, "for a third of a century, pursued a trade union goal in the areas of social security and health benefits."

Beirne, who is chairman of the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee, said Cohen "has been ahead of his times—a legislative and administrative adventurer who has explored new fields of human betterment and brought them to people."

Federation Pres. George Meany, in a message read to the assemblage, said that Cohen

Winn-Dixie Told to Pay Fired Workers

The National Labor Relations Board ordered Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc., the South's leading grocery chain, to pay $36,000 to six employes it fired five years ago for joining the Meat Cutters.

The board approved a trial examiner's findings that the 700-store chain owes backpay ranging from $3,100 to $10,150 to six women employes who were fired when Winn-Dixie closed a cheese-processing line at its Jacksonville, Fla., warehouse.

In 1964 the NLRB ruled that Winn-Dixie illegally fired the employes and refused to bargain with the union about discontinuing one department. Company appeals and court hearings have characterized the case since the 1963 firings and further delays are open to the employer.

Last year the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, New Orleans, fined Winn-Dixie $10,000 for criminal contempt of a court order to stop violating the National Labor Relations Act. Three judges ruled that Winn-Dixie and its warehouse supervisor "knowingly, wilfully and intentionally" committed criminal contempt in refusing to obey court orders issued in 1963 and 1965.

Company Pres. A. D. Davis was announced as co-chairman of the Citizens Committee to Preserve the Taft-Hartley Act when the group was formed in 1965 to lobby against repeal of Section 14(b) of the act, which permits states to outlaw union shop agreements.

Booming Profits Logged By Giant Corporations

America's biggest corporations reported booming first quarter profits—hundreds of millions of dollars above the same three months of 1967.

A survey of more than 500 companies which have already issued first quarter reports showed a bigger-than-predicted 13 percent profit gain over last year.

The survey includes 508 companies tallied by the Wall Street Journal plus the Ford Motor Co., which announced its first quarter figures after the story appeared.

Ford nearly doubled its 1967 first quarter profits—a rise from $120.6 million to $222.4 million.

This boosted the combined profits of the 509 companies to more than $5.1 billion—$591 million more than the same firms made in the first quarter of 1967.

The auto and auto equipment industry, with a 39.7 percent profit rise, and steel, with a 38.4 percent gain, were the pacesetters. A sharp decline in farm equipment profits and drops in airline and copper industry profits held down the average. Copper firms made less of a profit but still made money even though nearly all mines and smelters were shut down during the period by the strike.

In the automobile field, Chrysler's profits soared 280 percent above the first quarter of 1967. Drug manufacturers posted an average 16.5 percent profit gain, textile profits advanced 20.9 percent, and building materials moved up 31 percent. Nine office equipment manufacturers made $238.8 million in first quarter profits, up 29.5 percent from the previous year.

The higher profits reflect both increased sales and price increase posted in a number of industries—usually accompanied by announcements that they were necessary to meet higher costs.

Price Increase in March Cuts Purchasing Power

The purchasing power of the nation's workers declined slightly in March despite a gain in take-home pay.

The dip in real spendable earnings came as the Consumer Price Index rose four-tenths of one percent to 119.5—the fourteenth month in succession that the index moved upwards.

The index figure means that it cost $11.95 in March 1968 to buy goods and services that cost $10 a decade ago.

Workers with three dependents on non-farm payrolls had an average take-home pay of $92.93 in March, up 31 cents over the month and $3.88 over a year ago.

The purchasing power of that take-home pay, however, was 6 cents less than the previous month and only 34 cents higher than a year ago.

The four-tenths of one percent increase in the CPI was the highest in eight months and followed five consecutive monthly increases of three-tenths of one percent.

Pacing the increase was the cost of services which accounted for almost one-half of the CPI's advance from February. Included were higher price tags for medical services, college tuition, higher property taxes and insurance rates.

Food and beverages showed a four-tenths of one percent increase with higher pork, poultry and fresh fruit prices leading the rise.

Women's and girl's wear led the seven-tenths increase in apparel costs. Furniture and floor covering prices rose also.

The Wholesale Price Index rose two-tenths of one percent in March, but the rate of increase slackened over previous months.

The Consumer Price Index in March stood at 3.9 percent higher than a year ago.

The CPI rise gave 80,000 workers cost of living increases, with about 65,000 in aerospace and public transportation receiving boosts of 3 cents an hour.

Building Crafts Help Rebuild Florida School

Fort Lauderdale, Fla.—Union building trades were friends in need when fire badly damaged the Card School for Girls in nearby Dania.

The Broward County Building & Construction Trades Council heard that the non-profit special school, licensed by the state, had no funds for repairs. So officers of affiliated unions asked for volunteers to donate their services.

For several weekends, work crews showed up with overalls and equipment, with supplies furnished by members and employers, on a job that would have cost several thousand dollars otherwise.

"I don't know what we would have done without them," said Mrs. Lois Card and her daughter, Mrs. Penny Tilley, who run the 20-girl school.

"It isn't the first time our boys have pitched in around the area," said Business Rep. Charles Rowland of Painters Local 160. "They live here and are interested in helping people in trouble."

Murray-Green Prize:

Secretary Cohen Honored by Labor

"has fought just as hard, with all his energy, his knowledge and his skill, whether he was in the spotlight or behind the scenes.

"His interest has been the cause, not the credit," Meany asserted.

He noted that Cohen is best remembered by labor for the secretary's "indispensable" efforts for medicare.

"If Aime Forand was the father, Wilbur Cohen was surely the godfather of medicare," Meany said. "Only one influence was greater than his—the votes that elected the 89th Congress."

Vice President Hubert H. Humphrey sent a telegram to the gathering expressing "great admiration" for the secretary as "a man who has contributed so much to health and welfare legislation in this country."

Cohen cited the "ceaseless educational work of the labor movement" for the legislative victories of the 1960s. In ticking off the top ones, he said:

- "We have experienced 88 months of sustained prosperity.
- "About 13 million fewer Americans are living in poverty than eight years ago.
- "Social security benefits, when medicare is included, average 35 percent higher than four years ago.
- "Nearly 20 million older Americans have been relieved of a large part of the crushing financial burden of ill health.
- "Nine million educationally and economically deprived children are now getting a better education.
- "Nearly 1,250,000 students are getting federal assistance to continue their education in colleges and universities.
- "Many children whose parents cannot afford to pay for medical care are now getting the attention they need.

"These milestones," Cohen said, "are a tribute to labor people who suffered many disappointing defeats before victory."

But the nation has gone neither far enough nor fast enough to alleviate suffering, he added.

"We cannot consider the task begun 33 years ago complete when in a country as prosperous as the United States, many social security beneficiaries—the retired, the disabled, widowed and orphaned—are denied the opportunity to live in dignity and self-sufficiency," he said.

"We need to continue to press for peaceful social change," Cohen said. "We need to end discrimination, bigotry and injustice—all the forces that divide our society."

He called for further improvements in social security and medicare, for harnessing the spiraling price of medical care and drugs, for an expansion of educational programs.

Beirne said to Cohen that labor is "confident that your contribution has just begun.

"We know that the people in your chosen field, the people of America—and particularly the poor, the helpless—will receive new hope from your programs yet unborn."

Musicians Set Local Mergers In Two Cities

New York—Mergers of white and Negro locals of the Musicians in two Alabama cities were hailed by AFM Pres. Herman D. Kenin as a major step in the union's continuing campaign of integrating its locals.

Kenin announced that the integration of Locals 407 and 613 in Mobile, and a similar merger of Locals 479 and 718 in Montgomery were completed after the unifications were approved by the memberships of all locals involved.

In Mobile, the merged locals will be known as Musicians' Protective Union 407-613. The president, elected by the combined membership, is Emanuel Andrews, formerly president of Local 407.

In Montgomery, the new unified local will be Musicians' Protective Union 479-718, with Ernie Smith the newly-elected president.

Kenin pointed out that with these two mergers there are now only 15 cities among AMF's 643 local jurisdictions in which there are separate white and Negro locals. It is expected, he added, that this number will be further reduced within the next few months.

CWA Walkout Gains Full 3-Year Contract

gical and life insurance programs and other union objectives.

Membership votes in most CWA units will be completed within 72 hours of the time that union and management negotiators reached agreement, Beirne said. He called the terms a "substantial victory" for every union member.

The strike began Apr. 18 when the Western Electric installers walked out simultaneously with white collar employes in nearly all states. They were followed by CWA members at other operating companies where contracts expired and strikes were authorized.

Beirne said the "struggle to turn the Bell System around has been carried on with an intensity and single-mindedness at all levels of the union that has been inspiring."

He added: "Every officer and every member deserves credit for the substantial victory we have achieved."

In describing the size of the package achieved by the strike, Beirne said "we didn't like to play the numbers game but the experts tell me it's the only way to simply tell a complete story." He continued:

"To describe the size of the total package, the number is 19.58 percent—a percentage settlement that compares very favorably with recent major agreements in auto, rubber and can.

"This means general wage hikes now of $12 per week for all top and second-level plant craftsmen at the top of their wage scale; another $6 a week 12 months from now, and still another $6 increase at the end of the second year."

Traffic operators and clerical workers at the top of their wage schedule will get $8 a week at the start of the first contract year, $4 more at the end of 12 months, another $4 at the end of the second year for a total of $16, Beirne said.

Union officers had not decided, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, whether strikers who ratify the new pacts should be advised to return to work at once or to wait until all ratification votes are over.

Union members generally have been respecting the picket lines at telephone locations all over the country—their own and those of other unions.

Members of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers have been out since Apr. 15 in a statewide strike against the New Jersey Bell Telephone Co. The IBEW also set a May 8 deadline for a walkout at Illinois Bell.

The CWA strike came at the midpoint of a three-year contract after union and company negotiators failed to agree on the size of a wage increase. When talks resumed with the aid of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, negotiators turned their attention to an entirely new contract for the full term instead of the remaining 18 months of the old pact.

In talks that opened Feb. 10, CWA had made a "substantial" wage increase for its 420,000 members at Bell its major objective. Its negotiators rejected a company offer as short of the 10.2 percent mark that the union called for over an 18-month term, and set an Apr. 12 deadline.

The deadline was extended six days following the assassination of the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr. The walkout started when Bell management declined to improve its "best" offer of a 7.25 percent wage increase.

Beirne said when the strike started that it was caused by company proposals notable for "insufficient money, retrogression for workers with longer service, inadequate consideration for pensioners and night workers, and a number of critical items" in local union contracts.

Clinton Fair Back On AFL-CIO Staff

Clinton M. Fair, who served on the AFL-CIO social security and legislative staffs from 1958 to 1965, has returned to the federation as a legislative representative after three years with the California AFL-CIO.

Fair has held posts with the Michigan AFL, Allied Industrial Workers and Teachers and served as legislative secretary to former Michigan Gov. G. Mennen Williams.

He will concentrate on state legislative problems outside the social insurance area.

Examiner Urges New Sanctions As Firm Ignores NLRB Orders

A Kansas employer has been so contemptuous of the rights of his employes to organize and bargain that the National Labor Relations Board should take extraordinary steps to compel his compliance, an NLRB trial examiner recommended.

Examiner Stanley N. Ohlbaum found King Radio Corp. guilty of "refractory hostility" to the law in the third such finding against the company in a year. He recommended that the labor board do more than order King to post the usual bulletin board notices and NLRB orders to bargain with the Communications Workers nearly two years after the union won an NLRB election.

The examiner declined to recommend backpay for 250 King Radio strikers from the date their strike started, as the union requested, but noted that the NLRB general counsel's office would have no objection to such a remedy.

Union attorneys have long sought such an order from the board. The AFL-CIO convention last December urged Congress to rewrite the labor act to "make a reality of the right of workers to organize and bargain collectively without discrimination by employers."

Shortly afterward the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia said the NLRB's orders in unfair labor practice cases "have not proved adequate in coping with the recalcitrant employer determined to defeat the effective unionization of his plant by illegally opposing organizational and bargaining efforts every step of the way."

The NLRB has twice ruled that King Radio, which makes airplane radios at Olathe, has been guilty of such conduct. It will be asked to uphold the findings in the latest case.

Ohlbaum said after noting that the firm ignored the two previous NLRB orders:

"Three Kings are enough. To do no more than echo" previous cease-and-desist orders would be "to confess remedial impotence by not increasing sanctions" to prevent the continuance of the company's "repeated illegal conduct."

The examiner, noting that the NLRB general counsel after successfully prosecuting three cases against King Radio now "properly pleads for an end" to the company's lawbreaking, added "an end there should be."

The major charge against King Radio was that it violated employe rights so flagrantly and persistently that it forced them to go on strike 13 months ago, and has prolonged the strike by continuing its harassment of the 250 strikers and their union, the CWA.

When Ohlbaum concluded his hearings into the latest charges of unfair labor practices by King, the union offered to prove that the company deliberately provoked the strike to rid itself of union adherents and asked that it be compelled to pay them for all time lost since their "constructive discharge."

Ohlbaum said he had no right to make such a recommendation because of present board policy, but noted that the board's general counsel is "not opposed to such or other appropriate relief" and "sounds a fervent plea for design of an appropriate new remedy . . . to prevent serious miscarriage of justice through unredressed persistent flouting" of the law and the board's orders.

The examiner found that despite the fact that King employes "by overwhelming vote elected the union as their bargaining representative almost two years ago, their legal right to bargain collectively has nevertheless been thwarted, jobs have been lost, and they have continued to be the objects of coercion, restraint and harassment."

He ruled that the company had illegally refused to bargain with the union, unilaterally installed a new wage payment system, forbade union members, but not non-union employes, to talk on the job even about work processes; fired employes for union activity and even for answering an NLRB subpoena to testify.

Besides the usual remedies ordered by the board in two previous findings against King Radio, Ohlbaum recommended that the union's certification year date from company posting of an NLRB order; that the company reinstate strikers, establish a preferential rehiring list if necessary, discharge strikebreakers and give backpay to any striker not reinstated.

Los Angeles Mediation Panel Says Hearst 'Flatly Refused' Cooperation

Los Angeles—A special three-man panel quit its peacemaking task here with a charge that Hearst management had "flatly refused" to cooperate in efforts to settle a 4.5-month strike-lockout at the nation's largest evening newspaper, the Herald-Examiner.

The panel was appointed Mar. 18 by Mayor Sam Yorty. A letter of resignation sent Yorty said: "The cause of our failure is clear. One of the parties to the dispute, the Herald-Examiner management, has flatly refused to cooperate with the panel. This, despite the unremitting efforts of the panel from the time of its appointment and those of the chairman of your labor-management citizens committee, Quentin Ogren, in addition to your own personal efforts, to seek management's cooperation."

The panel said the 10 Herald-Examiner unions had met with it and cooperated fully.

In a press conference after the resignation, Herman Leavitt, Los Angeles Joint Culinary Board president and a member of the Yorty panel, said Hearst's recalcitrance was motivated by a desire to "destroy these unions."

Hearst has been publishing the struck paper with the aid of imported professional strikebreakers. Some 2,000 regular union employes have been idled by the dispute.

Hearst had insisted that federal and state mediators—whose efforts to date have been futile—had precedence in the dispute. But regional officials of both mediating agencies gave the mayor's panel their blessings and urged the parties to cooperate with it.

A new effort to revive bargaining was made Tuesday by federal and state mediators. They met with management and Newspaper Guild negotiators one hour.

The session recessed with the parties agreeing to submit revised proposals by May 1. However, prospects of cracking the stalemate remained dim.

Members of ANG and the Machinists struck the Herald-Examiner last Dec. 15 over contract improvements. Hearst promptly locked out about 700 printers, mailers, pressmen, stereotypers and paperhandlers.

ANG's chief negotiator, Robert J. Rupert, told newsmen that Publisher George R. Hearst, Jr.'s refusal to meet the mayor's panel was "his final demonstration of complete contempt for the public."

Besides Leavitt, the panel included Chairman Lloyd H. Bailer, prominent arbitrator, and Ralph H. Woolpert, industrial relations director for a large retail drug chain.

The panel advised Yorty that the newspaper dispute, now the longest in California newspaper history, "may become worse."

"Our continuance as a panel in this dispute would be deceptive in that it would provide hope where none should exist that the panel might, at some future time, be effective," it said.

Goldberg Sets Resignation as Envoy to UN

Arthur J. Goldberg will return to private life in June after a spectacular public career during which he filled three of the nation's highest appointive offices in less than eight years.

Goldberg, an eminent labor lawyer, was an architect of the AFL-CIO merger while serving as general counsel for the former CIO. After merger, he was a special counsel for the federation and attorney for the Steelworkers and several other affiliates.

Pres. Kennedy named him Secretary of Labor when he took office and appointed him to the Supreme Court in 1962. At Pres. Johnson's request, Goldberg resigned from the court in 1965 to become the U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations after the death of Adlai E. Stevenson.

Pres. Johnson, accepting Goldberg's resignation from the UN post "with regret," said he will name former Under Sec. of State George W. Ball as his successor.

THESE HIGH SCHOOL seniors from Columbus, O., are getting a lesson in practical politics and earning money after school and on Saturdays by helping the Ohio State AFL-CIO prepare for the primary and general election campaigns. Working from COPE's computer printouts of union members, they are checking voter registration status, phone numbers, ward and precinct designations, with the help of criss-cross directories of Ohio cities. The 34 girls, from Bishop Ready High School, rate high marks for both efficiency and enthusiasm, Ohio COPE officials report. As bottom photo shows, an on-the-job lunch break is one of the fringe benefits.

Ervin Panel Hit:

Hearings Assailed as 'Arena' For Attacks on Labor Board

The National Labor Relations Board continued to get passing grades for its work from educators and labor lawyers while business spokesmen chastised it for "curtailing" employer rights and abusing its powers.

Bernard Kleiman, general counsel for the Steelworkers, testifying as the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Separation of Powers continued its hearings on the labor board, challenged the subcommittee's right to debate labor legislation. This area, he said, is the province of the Senate Labor Committee, a fact which might justify the charge that the subcommittee is "exceeding its authority" or violating the spirit of the "separation of powers" doctrine.

Kleiman said "no congressional committee should, under the guise of legislative or congressional purism, be converted by disgruntled parties to an arena in which they can vindicate their issues by throwing rotten tomatoes at the umpire."

He charged also that many of the rulings previously cited as examples of NLRB excesses are in fact products of the courts. He said the courts, in conformity with the separation of powers doctrine, are fully competent to police the board's adherence to congressional policy and have not hesitated to reverse board rulings.

NLRB Too 'Cautious'

Kleiman said the board, far from exceeding its powers, has been "exceedingly cautious" in the exercise of those powers and "has never fully implemented much of the authority" which Congress has given it for more than 30 years.

Kleiman cited the statements of previous witnesses as evidence that they regard the hearings "not as a separation of powers investigation but as an opportunity to denounce and rebuke the board publicly" for ruling against antilabor employers.

Asked by Sen. Sam Ervin (D-N.C.), subcommittee chairman, "how you can tell whether the board has violated the separation of powers" without discussing NLRB decisions, Kleiman replied "You can't." But, he added, other witnesses, such as Sen. Robert P. Griffin (R-Mich.), co-author of the Landrum-Griffin Act, didn't discuss the separation of powers. Griffin's statement cited four decisions, not of the board but of the courts, Kleiman observed.

The witness faulted the board for its "timidity" but said "on balance, it has done a splendid job under very trying circumstances during its entire administration."

Louis Sherman, who has represented building trades unions and others for 20 years, told the subcommittee that unions have suffered severe economic loss from the mistaken decisions of labor boards in the Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson administrations—decisions later reversed by the federal courts and Congress itself.

This would indicate, Sherman said, that NLRB rulings signify differences of opinion among board members "over intricate questions of law and fact" rather than improper intent or usurpation of authority. Even here, he pointed out, the law gives private individuals "adequate opportunity" to appeal. Sherman had one bit of advice for the board—it should, he said, make more use of its rule-making powers to guide litigants.

Another labor attorney—Stephen I. Schlossberg for the Auto Workers—recommended that Congress strengthen the NLRB by helping it provide speedy relief for complainants and arming it with a "more effective arsenal of remedies" against lawbreaking employers.

"The effects of illegal actions are impossible to overcome fully, years after the event," Schlossberg said. The remedy, he advised, lies not in the separation of powers demanded by board critics but in enabling the NLRB to cope with its problems, such as its "almost crushing load" of election and unfair labor practice cases.

Also critical of the NLRB's "excessive timidity" was Prof. Howard Lesnick of the University of Pennsylvania. He listed its faults: it doesn't explain itself, it follows the case-by-case method of decision-making, it fears being reversed and it's afraid of conflict with Congress.

The real danger, Lesnick said, is that continual buffeting of the board will increase its timidity. On a question whether board members should be picked as representing labor or management viewpoints, he said that would be a "tragic mistake."

Prof. Robert F. Koretz of the Syracuse University College of Law lauded the board for its "faithful adherence to court decisions," for working out such problems as union jurisdiction, and for its record in the courts.

Even the courts themselves are not better qualified than the NLRB, or even as well qualified, to interpret the will of Congress, he told the committee.

Other witnesses included Guy Farmer, NLRB chairman from 1953-55; Gerard D. Reilly, NLRB member from 1941-46; Stanley R. Strauss, former counsel to the late Philip Ray Rodgers when he was a board member, and spokesmen for the National Association of Manufacturers, the American Retail Federation, the Southern States Industrial Council, the General Electric Co. and the American Newspaper Publishers Association. All were critical of NLRB policy decisions.

Farmer said the board departed from congressional intentions in several areas but so too, he said, did the Supreme Court in decisions mandating labor policy which he charged were in contravention of congressional intent.

Reilly said the NLRB is "essentially a court" and was not entrusted by Congress with policy-making authority.

Jobless Rate for Minority Youth 'Unacceptably High,' Says Report

uation was sustained by the report itself.

It found that while the jobless rate for both white and non-white workers improved between 1960 and 1967, the rate for non-whites remained twice that of whites—7.4 percent compared with 3.4 percent in 1967.

The report deplored an "unacceptably high" unemployment rate among youths and the fact that "no inroads have been made into the extremely serious problem of non-white teenage joblessness."

One out of every four non-white teenagers was unemployed in 1967, almost 2.5 times the proportion for white teenagers, the report noted. It pointed out that this was a worsening of a less than 2 to 1 ratio that existed in 1960.

In a section on "the reality of opportunity," the report pointed out that "full employment is not just every man at work—it is the use of all his talents . . . and it is the opportunity to develop his talents."

In this connection it emphasized that "minority groups in America—Negroes, Mexican Americans, Puerto Ricans and American Indians suffer from limited education and language barriers, high unemployment and low incomes."

And, it added, "discrimination is a factor inhibiting their advancement."

In an analysis of sub-employment—workers unemployed 15 or more weeks a year or making less than $3,000 annually full-time—the report cited a sub-employment rate of 22 percent among non-white men, compared with 8 percent for whites.

It estimated that the jobless rate was at least 7.5 percent in the poor areas of the nation's large cities in 1967 and that there were at least 1.5 million workers in the sub-employment category in those areas.

The report described the amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act, passed by Congress in 1966, as "far-reaching improvements" that have substantially bolstered income among some of the lowest paid Americans.

"Nevertheless," it said, "about 10 million workers in this country—or one out of every five non-supervisory workers in private employment—received less than the $1.60 an hour minimum when it became effective under the law in February 1968."

In other areas, the report described problems among the seasonally unemployed, the jobless, handicapped and older workers. It said that government action also is needed to help resolve their plight.

On the positive side, the report and the President noted that the National Alliance of Businessmen, formed to provide jobs for hard-core unemployed, has received pledges of 111,000 jobs by mid-April of this year.

"Labor unions, the Urban Coalition, Chambers of Commerce, churches, schools and many civic groups have joined in a crusade to give the words 'full employment' a new meaning," Johnson said.

"These are hopeful beginnings, but certainly they are no grounds for complacency" and no grounds for inaction by Congress, he added.

In an introduction to the report, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz seconded the President's appeal. "Inefficiencies in the use of human resources mean not only personal deprivation and tragedy, but staggering financial losses and costs," Wirtz said.

Write-In Victory:

Massachusetts Vote Boost to Rockefeller

The surprise results of the Massachusetts primary election and the re-entry of New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller into the Republican presidential lists underscored the uncertainties of Campaign '68.

The Bay State primary had been viewed, before the votes were counted, as a mere formality. The script called for Gov. John A. Volpe, the only Republican on the ballot, to win overwhelming endorsement of his party as a favorite son leading the state's 34-vote delegation to the GOP convention and possibly earning the second spot on the Republican national ticket.

The Democratic ballot was scarcely more interesting. Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy of Minnesota was the only candidate listed, and his supporters talked of piling up 80 percent of the party vote.

The outcome shook both sides.

With all but 12 of the state's 1,734 precincts reporting, Rockefeller had 30,773 write-in votes, defeating Volpe by a margin of about 1,300.

McCarthy did capture the 72 Democratic delegate votes, but took only a bare majority—about 51 percent—of the popular vote as party members registered heavy write-in support for both Sen. Robert F. Kennedy of New York and Vice Pres. Hubert Humphrey.

Kennedy, a native of the state and identified with it until he moved to New York to run for the Senate, drew 64,662 write-ins, more than half the record total of 116,416 given McCarthy.

Votes for Humphrey

Humphrey, without benefit of either a campaign or an organization, received 41,934 votes, about a third of the total for McCarthy and two-thirds of the vote for Kennedy.

On the Republican side, Rockefeller not only upset Volpe but ran well ahead—nearly 5,000 votes—of the write-ins for former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon.

Under state law, the leading candidate for each party must receive all of the state's votes on the first convention ballot. Volpe, regarded as a Nixon supporter, lost control not only of these, but also of as many as two-thirds of the second-ballot votes. State GOP leaders said Sen. Edward Brooke, who is backing Rockefeller, could keep at least 22 votes in line for the New York governor beyond the first ballot.

Enters Race

The Massachusetts primary results came within hours after Rockefeller formally announced that he had changed his mind and would, indeed, seek the Republican nomination "right up to the last vote."

On Mar. 21, the governor stunned his supporters by apparently pulling himself out of the presidential sweepstakes and leaving room only for a draft. This, however, was 10 days before Pres. Johnson announced that he would not accept the Democratic nomination for re-election.

On the Democratic side, the focus now shifts to Indiana and that state's May 7 primary, the first to pit McCarthy and Kennedy in direct competition. Complicating the Indiana voting will be the favorite-son candidacy of Gov. Roger D. Branigin, who hopes to lead an uncommitted delegation to the Democratic convention in Chicago, which opens Aug. 26.

Humphrey, who announced his candidacy too late to enter any of the major primaries, will not be on the ballot in Indiana. While Branigin was first listed as a stand-in for Pres. Johnson, he has made no such commitment to the Vice President.

VICE PRES. HUMPHREY plunged into the competition for the Democratic presidential nomination with announcement of his candidacy at a Washington luncheon sponsored by United Democrats for Humphrey. Here he is shown with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and St. Louis Mayor A. J. Cervantes, two of the founding members of the UDH.

Support for Humphrey Mounting As He Enters Presidential Race

cut significantly into business's expected backing for former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon, the leading contender for the Republican nomination.

● The Meat Cutters joined the long list of unions that have already voiced support for Humphrey and urged its local unions and 400,000 members "to fully assist his candidacy."

The Vice President chose to announce his candidacy at a luncheon meeting of United Democrats for Humphrey, a broadly representative citizens' group that includes AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

The strength of Humphrey's support among trade unionists was evident at the luncheon, which packed 1,700 enthusiastic followers into the Regency Ballroom of Washington's Shoreham Hotel and left 1,000 others pounding at the doors. The audience included scores of union members from all points of the United States who had just wound up the annual Community Services Conference, plus others who were in Washington for an area COPE meeting.

The assemblage had all the earmarks and atmosphere of a convention rally, and Humphrey did not disappoint it.

He approached his announcement in a serious mood, but before he could complete the key sentence the audience erupted into a cheering, shouting demonstration with chants of "We want Humphrey." The Vice President broke into a broad grin and observed, "Like it or not, you have him."

His address touched briefly on the issues and problems confronting the nation, but for the most part dealt more broadly with Humphrey's positive liberal philosophy, the need for unity in the Democratic party and the country, and faith in America's fundamental strength.

"The time has come," he said, "to speak out on behalf of America—not a nation that has lost its way, but a restless people, a great nation striving to find a better way."

As for his "mission," he expressed the belief that "this nation can finally break across the threshold of what no previous society has ever dared dream or achieve, the building of a social order of both freedom and compassion, of both enterprise and peace.

"I believe we can finally create a nation where human equality and human opportunity not only exist side by side but nourish and reinforce each other, a nation where every citizen may participate on equal terms in every aspect of being and doing that which relates to self-respect."

As to the "business of getting elected," Humphrey said he would, as Johnson has pledged to do, "observe the absolute priority of peace over politics" and fulfill his duties and responsibilities as vice president for the remainder of his term.

"This year," he said, "is not the year for frenzied rhetoric, nor is it the year for searching out and seeking and finding scapegoats for our problems."

It is, he continued, "the year for common sense . . . a time requiring in every person in every post in every area of leadership, maturity, restraint and responsibility."

He pledged "to fight hard and clean" for the nomination, but said he would do nothing to "divide either my party or my country."

Flanking Humphrey as he made his announcement were the co-chairmen of United Democrats for Humphrey, Senators Walter F. Mondale of Minnesota and Fred R. Harris of Oklahoma. Among others on the platform, besides Meany, were Clarence Mitchell, of the NAACP; former Gov. Terry Sanford of North Carolina; Mayor A. J. Cervantes of St. Louis; Frank O'Connor, president of the New York City Council; and former Sen. William Benton of Connecticut, publisher of the Encyclopedia Brittanica.

First Institute on Labor Held at Virginia Campus

Charlottesville, Va.—Labor education in the South moved another step ahead at the traditionally conservative University of Virginia with the holding of a three-day institute here.

The institute on "The Trade Union Movement and the New South," attended by civil rights leaders, anti-poverty workers, clergymen and university students, was the first of its kind to be held on the campus. It was sponsored by the League for Industrial Democracy.

Speakers included Sec.-Treas. Brewster Snow of the Virginia AFL-CIO; Gus Tyler, assistant president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, and Robert McGlotten of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights.

Snow, in the opening address, called for a coalition of labor, Negroes and religious leaders dedicated to developing the South's economy and bringing social justice to all of its people.

Labor's political and economic goals were discussed by Tyler, who pointed out that they are "in the interest of a majority of Americans, particularly in their emphasis on employment and social progress."

McGlotten, citing the recent strike by Memphis, Tenn. garbage workers, stressed that the fight for "rights" in the South and elsewhere includes "the right of workers to organize into unions."

Two other speakers, AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Oliver Singleton and James Pierce, southern director of the Industrial Union Dept. analyzed "right to work" laws and other anti-union statutes in southern states.

An appeal for cooperation between anti-poverty workers and union leaders in advancing the drive against poverty was issued by James Williams, research director for the West Virginia AFL-CIO.

The LID was assisted in planning the institute by Dr. William H. Kaven, assistant professor of commerce, who recently developed and now teaches the University of Virginia's first course on labor's role in industrial relations.

Commenting on the institute, a league spokesman said it was organized "under some difficulty" in that it came under attack from the Virginia Chamber of Commerce. One C of C official even threatened to launch a letter-writing campaign against Kaven, it was noted.

Despite this oposition, the meeting turned out to be a major success in the LID's drive to expand labor education in the South, the league declared. It reported that a number of students and faculty members attending the institute from other southern universities asked that similar projects be held on their campuses.

Histadrut Hailed on Israel's 20th Year

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany praised the role of Histadrut—Israel's million-member labor federation—in a message of congratulations on the 20th anniversary of the nation's founding.

"The economic and social progress which Histadrut has brought to Israel should be an inspiration to all forward looking peoples throughout the world," Meany wired Histradrut Sec.-Gen. Aharon Becker.

He said the Israeli labor federation has thrived "under the most difficult of circumstances involving national jeopardy and the strains of large influxes of people requiring every assistance."

Prompt Election Sought by NMU

New York—National Maritime Union Pres. Joseph Curran asked the Labor Dept. to set up a new election promptly for NMU officers even though the union is appealing a federal court decision ordering such an election.

The court had ruled that the 1966 election was invalid under the Landrum-Griffin Act since the NMU's constitution required candidates for national office to have served in lower-level union posts.

Curran termed the decision "unsound" but said the NMU wants a re-election held quickly because "we cannot allow any doubt or confusion to hamper our effectiveness."

IBEW Sweeps 1st Election at Zenith Corp.

Springfield, Mo.—The Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO, ousted an "independent" union here in the first of six elections petitioned for by the IBEW in plants of the Zenith Corp.

The National Labor Relations Board listed this tally: IBEW 821, no union 554, Independent Radionic Workers of America 20, challenged 14, void 5. Of 1,475 eligible employes, all but 61 cast ballots.

Workers in the Springfield plant, opened about a year ago, were represented by the independent.

The IBEW organizing committee said the results augur well for elections at the other Zenith plants—all in the Chicago area—where the IRWA holds bargaining rights.

The drive here began last fall with an in-plant organizing committee. Six IBEW staff representatives were assisted by AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Delmond Garst and his staff, the union said.

The Springfield plant was built on the assurance that area voters would be asked to approve a public bond issue. They did, two weeks before the NLRB election. The plant, which makes TV sets, will eventually be staffed by up to 5,000 employes.

No dates have been set yet for the Chicago area elections.

Electoral Monkey-Wrench

THE REAL THREAT in George Wallace's candidacy is not that he will win, but that he will capture enough electoral votes to prevent either major party candidate from winning. Once that happens, he could throw a mean monkey-wrench into the presidential election machinery.

The Constitution says a candidate must win a majority of electoral votes—270 out of 538—to become President.

The 1968 presidential election is expected to be a squeaker. With Wallace in the race, the possibility is strong that neither major party candidate will receive an electoral vote majority. Wallace is a good bet to win at least the 47 electoral votes from five Deep South states—Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, Louisiana and South Carolina.

Should this pan out, what happens next? Two things could happen:

1. The election could be thrown into the U.S. House of Representatives.

2. Wallace could wheel and deal with major party candidates before it ever got to the House, offering a trade: His electoral votes for certain concessions and promises.

Here's what happens once the problem goes to the House:

Each of the 50 state congressional delegations gets just one vote. This makes it more important to control a majority of state delegations than to have actual numerical control of the House. (As an example, after the 1948 election, Democrats had substantial control of the House, 263-171. But they had a majority on only 25 of the 48 state congressional delegations. Had Truman not won an electoral vote majority, and had the vote gone to the House, HST might have had a hard time hanging on.)

At present, Democrats control 29 state delegations, the GOP 18, and three are evenly split. But it is not this Congress that would make the decision. It would be the new Congress elected in 1968. It is conceivable that a Democrat could win a popular majority for President, fail to win an electoral majority, and be denied the presidency by a House with the GOP in control of 26 state delegations.

Here is where Wallace could loom large. He could hold enough states—the five he's most sure of—to his candidacy to deny a majority for either major party candidate. What ensues then—a shift of the whole mess to the Senate—would be a mare's nest. The Senate would choose the President in the person of its choice of Vice President.

Equally, perhaps more, menacing are Wallace's options under the second route, trading off his electoral votes for concessions by a major party candidate.

Though he talks about being in the race to win, there is evidence that Wallace knows better and already has given much thought to wheeling and dealing. Several times over the past year, it has been indicated his price would be the right to name, or participate in naming, two Supreme Court justices. The appointment of two conservative justices over the next four years could tip the scales on such issues as civil rights, reapportionment and labor matters.

He could go further. Indeed, there seems little limit on the mischief he could do, and thus a vote for Wallace becomes a vote for potential chaos.

Knock Him Out of the Box

Rustin Cites Antipoverty Success:

Labor's Programs Articulate Economic Demands of Negroes

The following article by Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, appeared in the New York Times, Apr. 26, 1968.

By Bayard Rustin

HARRY VAN ARSDALE, president of the New York City Central Labor Council, has said that the trade union movement is the most successful antipoverty organization in our nation's history. He is right. The labor movement has not abolished poverty, and could not by itself have been expected to, but it has lifted more American people out of poverty than any other institution or agency organized to that end.

I do not mean to say the labor movement could not have done more for Negroes. I certainly cannot dispute the charge that for many years some unions discriminated against Negroes. But it is worth noting that discrimination now persists only in a minority segment of the labor movement. In any event, that past history tended to obscure an equally important truth—that, despite discriminatory practices, the labor movement was, and remains, the most integrated institution in our society.

Hundreds of thousands of Negroes, devastated and set adrift by the Great Depression, first found refuge and economic mobility when the unions organized them in many industrial areas of the North. Since the depression, Negro membership in organized labor has climbed steadily, and today some 15 percent of the fourteen million workers in the AFL-CIO are Negroes.

The consequent rise in their economic base and standard of living stimulated in hundreds of thousands of Negroes an awakening of those social and political aspirations that found dramatic and constructive expression in the great mass protest movement of the late 1950s and the early 1960s.

Today, as the focus of the Negro struggle has shifted from constitutional issues to economic and and political equality, the labor movement remains the only major institution in our society that articulates the economic demands that are now at the heart of the Negro struggle. It is certainly the only major institution that wholly subscribes to, and substantially embodies in its own program, the proposals and priorities outlined in the Freedom Budget for All Americans.

The Executive Council of the AFL-CIO passed a resolution on the urban crisis in which it specifically called for the following: the creation of one million public service jobs for the unemployed; the building of 2.5 million new housing units; expanded mass transit and accelerated construction of public facilities.

HOWEVER, labor's support of programs that are of immediate economic interest to millions of deprived Negroes cannot obscure the fact that vestiges of discrimination remain in certain segments of that movement. For example, for many young Negroes and Puerto Ricans, the building trades have become a symbol of their lack of progress in the trade union movement. The building trades have the greatest appeal for young Negroes and Puerto Ricans to whom an opportunity to be trained in the skilled crafts at high rates of pay stands as one of the most effective antidotes to their frustration and despair.

But even the building trades are now adjusting to the winds of change. In New York City, specifically, the building trades unions are cooperating with the Joint Apprenticeship Program of the Workers Defense League and the A. Philip Randolph Educational Fund, which has succeeded during the past three years in placing more than 300 Negro and Puerto Rican youngsters in the building trades unions of New York City and Westchester County.

The program recruits young men who are interested in the building trades and advises, counsels and tutors potential applicants. Over the past three months the program has opened additional offices in Cleveland, O.; Buffalo, N.Y., and Newark, N.J., and in each of these cities minority group youngsters are now being admitted to unions that were previously closed to them.

The program has been successful for many reasons. It has a dedicated staff and is headed by an extraordinarily creative and determined young man, Ernest Green; it has had the support of George Meany and the Civil Rights Dept. of the AFL-CIO from the outset. Peter Brennan, president of the New York Building Trades Council has actively urged all unions to cooperate with the program.

I am confident that this model will play the leading role in helping to remove the last vestiges of discrimination in the labor movement.

Beyond Segregation:

Close Look at George Wallace Reveals Typical Right Winger

The following article on George Wallace is excerpted from the Apr. 29, 1968, issue of Memo from Cope, published by the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

GEORGE WALLACE is running for President.

The former Alabama governor will not win. He will get votes. He could throw a devastating monkey-wrench into the process of selecting the next President.

Polls show Wallace's candidacy, while not setting prairie fires, could burn a hole in the presidential ambitions of major party candidates. He's credited with from 10-15 percent of the total vote, depending on who the nominees of the Democrats and Republicans turn out to be. He will be on the ballot in at least 48 of the states.

Since he is the candidate of the party he formed recently—the American Independent Party—and since he will get votes from citizens outside the South as well as from the South (remember the 1964 presidential primaries he entered?) it's timely to examine what citizens will be voting for when they vote for George Wallace.

First and foremost, they will be voting for a dedicated segregationist. He denies that he is a racist, which he defines as someone who hates someone else on grounds of color and race. Maybe so. But an outright segregationist he is, and the fall-out from his frequent verbal explosions is race hate. In his 1963 inaugural address as Alabama's new governor, he vowed: "Segregation now, segregation tomorrow, segregation forever." And ever since he flashed onto the national scene with his subsequent promise to "stand in the schoolhouse door" to prevent a Negro from attending the University of Alabama, he has built his national reputation and following on unyielding opposition to progress in civil rights.

But what else does he stand for? Does he have other issues? Is he, as some press coverage suggests, progressive on other issues despite his diehard segregationism? A look at Wallace's Alabama indicates he isn't.

- Sales tax rates in his state have soared to among the highest in the nation—after he promised not to increase them.
- Jobless pay increased under Wallace as it did under all his recent predecessors, but it was boosted at the expense of working women. His administration denied unemployment benefits to all working women who take maternity leave without assurance of a job when they are ready to return to work.
- For the first time in many years in Alabama, state agencies—notably the highway patrol—interfered in union organizing efforts under Wallace.
- Though Wallace boasts about attracting new industry to the state, in recent years manufacturing jobs increased faster in every other southeastern state with the exception of Mississippi.
- The illiteracy rate in Wallace's Alabama is one of the nation's highest. More than 40 percent of Alabama males called up for military service are disqualified due to literacy and health reasons.
- In average jobless benefits payments, only seven states rank lower than Wallace's Alabama, and only seven are lower in the maximum weekly benefit paid.
- Of eight key standards set for state child labor laws, Wallace's Alabama meets only one.
- Only nine states pay lower maximum weekly benefits for disability under workmen's compensation.
- Wallace's Alabama is one of the 16 states without an effective minimum wage law.
- Wallace's Alabama ranks 49th among states in welfare payments for dependent children.
- Alabama has one of the highest percentages among states in housing listed as dilapidated.
- Alabama is one of 21 states without an equal-pay-for-women law.
- Nine hundred dollars below the national per capita income figure, Wallace's Alabama ranks 48th among states in that category.
- Only two states—Mississippi and South Carolina—spend less per pupil in the public schools than Alabama, whose $390 annual expenditure is $179 less than the national average.

OBVIOUSLY, most of Alabama's problems predate the arrival of George Wallace as governor in 1963. But the conditions have survived his four years in office as official governor and his nearly one and a-half years as unofficial governor, and the relative standing of his state in the major categories listed is basically unchanged. There is little evidence that he mounted a major attack on any of them.

Wallace is no friend of workers or their unions. He does not attack them openly. Yet, recently, his hand-picked legislative lieutenant, the majority leader of the state senate, attacked strike talk among teachers warning he'd do everything in his power to have them fired if they struck.

More illuminating, perhaps, is the general tone of Wallace's pronouncements on non-racial issues. He always skirts the specific. But the generalities are all too familiar and can be located in any right-winger's handbook of instant wisdom: A hymn to free enterprise, an attack on the federal government as if it were a foreign power and an enemy at that, a scorn for welfare legislation, a demand for states' rights, contempt for the Supreme Court.

So this is candidate Wallace, and as much of his record as can be pinned down.

He is not likely to win the presidency. But he will get votes, and he will get them from all sections of the country, and stripped of all the excuses to ease conscience they will be racist votes—or, as Wallace would prefer, segregationist votes.

In All Group Relations:

New Institute Seeks to Expand Use of Collective Bargaining

FINDING WAYS to use collective bargaining to resolve differences between private groups will be a central aim of a new labor-management organization, an AFL-CIO vice president reported in a network radio interview.

Pres. Roy Siemiller of the Machinists, vice chairman of the board of the newly-formed Institute of Collective Bargaining & Group Relations, said the institute could act as a "mediator . . . get the controversy bared, right out on the table," and find solutions to which the parties can agree.

That is what unions and employers "do in collective bargaining for a labor agreement," Siemiller noted, and the same principles and techniques might be effectively applied in reaching settlement of differences in race and other group relations. He made the statements on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO produced public affairs program aired Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Radio Network.

Siemiller said that the primary goal of the institute is to improve collective bargaining processes and give the public-at-large a better understanding of how they operate, because "in a free society, such as we have in America, there is no substitute for collective bargaining."

Actually, he said, the system "is working well." He pointed out that of the 16,000 separate agreements the Machinists have with employers, "less than two-tenths of 1 percent get involved in a strike situation." He said that the public can get a wrong impression of how collective bargaining works when news reports indicate that "one individual is the bad guy standing in the way of settlement of a controversy."

"That is just not true," he declared. "There is a lot of activity among all of the people in the bargaining unit. They meet together. They decide what to ask for," and vote whether or not to accept settlements the negotiators recommend.

Reporters questioning Siemiller were Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Alan Adams of Business Week magazine.

PROBABLY NEVER BEFORE in our history have Americans been more aware of the high price they are paying for inadequate housing, slums and ghetto-living.

Yet this problem has always been with us and, since the New Deal days, the federal government has sought to alleviate it.

The failure has been simply too little and too late. While progress has been recorded and many dedicated people have devoted their lives to housing, it has not been sufficient.

There has been an effort to combat slums in cities since the 1930s, but the slums have persisted. In recent years, there has been a net decrease in the percentage of slum housing compared with all housing, but that is hardly an answer.

This year Pres. Johnson has proposed the most far-reaching program in history.

The federal government acted in the housing field for the first time in 1892. The 52nd Congress appropriated $20,000 to make a study of slums in cities of 200,000 or more population.

Although there were several programs during World War I, serious legislation did not get under way until the 1930s. There were initial steps to meet such emergencies as foreclosures.

In 1934, the National Housing Act established the Federal Housing Administration to increase the supply of mortgage funds by providing banks and other lending institutions with government insurance on long-term, first mortgage loans.

In 1937, Congress took initial steps in setting up a long-range program of public housing for low-income families. Public housing, though, never reached the proportions envisioned by its supporters. This is seen by the statistics which disclose that between 1945 and 1964, 28 million nonfarm housing units were started and 682,000 of these were public housing.

FHA has played a more significant role since its insurance program was set up in 1934. Between 1945 and 1964 more than 5 million homes out of the 28 million units started were insured by FHA.

The Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, which set up Veterans Administration guarantees under the GI Bill, made possible 2.8 million homes between 1945 and 1964.

In addition to public housing, urban renewal has been utilized for a massive attack on the slums. First set up in 1954, under the Housing & Home Finance Administration, it was given added emphasis in the Housing Act of 1949.

A MAJOR PUSH forward on the housing front took place in 1965 when the scattered housing agencies were brought together in a cabinet-level Dept. of Housing & Urban Affairs under Sec. Robert C. Weaver.

Existing programs which the Administration is seeking to step up include public housing, rent supplements to enable lower income groups to obtain better housing, model cities, rehabilitation loans and grants and urban renewal.

The proposals by the Administration go a long way toward making the critically-needed inroads into the housing problem, but obtaining adequate financing from Congress is the big rub. There are, in addition, new programs, new approaches being urged.

When Weaver testified before the House subcommittee on the Administration's program he pointed out:

"The specific housing and community development program we are presenting has many unique features. But most significant, I believe, is the fact that this total new effort is aimed primarily at achieving a single, specific, unified national goal—the building and rebuilding in 10 years of enough good housing to permit the replacement of substantially all substandard housing."

Currently, it is estimated that there are 5.8 million occupied dwelling units which are classified as substandard.

This is a reasonable goal. Anything less would invite even more disaster. The burden of responsibility is now on the Congress.

WIDER USE of collective bargaining to settle disputes between private groups is one aim of the newly-formed Institute of Collective Bargaining & Group Relations, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Roy Siemiller (center), vice chairman of the institute's board, said on Labor News Conference. The Machinists' president was questioned by Stanley Levey (left) of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Alan Adams of Business Week magazine.

How to Buy:

Commission on Product Safety To Probe Household Hazards

By Sidney Margolius

TELEVISION SETS which leak enough current to deal a lethal shock. Kitchen ranges, broilers, clothes dryers, portable heaters and dehumidifiers with exposed terminals. Lawn mowers which hurl rocks. Power tools without safety guards. Garden sprayers which can explode. Travel irons without thermostats to prevent overheating.

These are just a few of the sometimes carelessly-designed or constructed household products which can shock, burn, maim and explode, warns U. S. Sen. Warren G. Magnuson, chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee. You may have some in your own home.

As the result of his investigations, Sen. Magnuson got Congress to establish a National Commission on Product Safety. The new commission has as its main target the protection of the public. An estimated half-million injuries each year result from the use of the kind of ordinary household products which the commission will investigate, points out Arnold Elkind, a noted trial attorney and labor lawyer appointed by Pres. Johnson as chairman.

While people naturally worry a lot about unsafe cars, actually you may be not much safer in your own home. Nothing seemed safer than staying home and watching TV. But then it was discovered that some color TV sets leaked radiation which could be harmful under certain circumstances. Even certain TV antennas made for plugging into the house electrical socket may pose a danger.

You might crawl into bed with the idea that at least here you are safe. But if you're under an electric blanket not carefully made to reduce hazards to the least possible minimum, you may be hiding in a fool's paradise. You may buy a carbon tetrachloride fire extinguisher, and pride yourself on how careful you are. But the carbon tet may be even more dangerous.

BESIDES THE MAIN GOAL of protecting American families, the new Safety Commission also will try to define your legal rights if you suffer an injury from using a defective product in a foreseeable way. Elkind points out that the present laws affecting consumer rights and manufacturers' obligations are a hodgepodge of conflicts, with sharp variations from state to state.

A child injured by a defective product may be able to recover damages in one state. But a child in another state injured under the same circumstances may not, Elkind reports.

A federal law defining rights of consumers and duties of manufacturers thus would be a big step toward reducing haphazard manufacturing procedures.

Until the National Commission on Product Safety completes its prospective two years of work, and Congress acts on its findings, be careful in your own buying. Safety Council Reports:

112,000 Lose Lives In Year's Accidents

ACCIDENTS of all kinds killed approximately 112,000 persons in the United States last year, a decrease of 1 percent from the 113,000 who died accidentally in 1966.

These figures are reported in the 1968 preliminary edition of "Accident Facts," published by the National Safety Council. The fact sheet supplies a condensed compilation of the number, costs, and analyses of the major categories of 1967 accidents.

According to the council the drop in the death total lowered the 1967 accident fatality rate to 56.5 per 100,000 persons, a decrease of 2 percent from the 1966 rate of 57.7. In spite of this decrease, accidents in 1967 remained the fourth most important cause of death for all persons and the leading cause of death for all persons and the leading cause of death among those aged one to 37.

The 1 percent decrease in accident fatalities overall was the result of a 3 percent drop in home accident deaths, which totaled 28,500, and a 2 percent decrease in workplace accident deaths, which totaled 14,200. Motor-vehicle and public accident deaths remained substantially the same.

Motor-vehicle deaths made up 47 percent of the 1967 accidental death toll; falls accounted for 18 percent; fires, burns and deaths associated with fires, 7 percent, and drownings, 6 percent. Other mishaps accounted for 22 percent of the total.

THE COUNCIL ESTIMATED that accident costs in 1967 totaled $21.3 billion. This included wage loss of $6 billion, medical expense of $2.2 billion, administrative and claim settlement costs of insurance of $4.9 billion, property damage in motor-vehicle accidents of $3.5 billion, property loss in fires of about $1.7 billion, and the so-called "indirect" costs of work accidents of about $3 billion.

Four catastrophes in 1967 caused more than 50 deaths each: Airplane crashes near Hendersonville, N.C., and near Cincinnati, Ohio; tornadoes in Illinois, and a bridge collapse near Pt. Pleasant, W. Va. There were six other catastrophes in which 25 or more persons died.

Soup to Nonsense:

How Can a Girl Lose a Dress? It's Easy for the Pre-Teen Set

By Jane Goodsell

A 12-YEAR-OLD GIRL will give a friend the shirt off her back—providing she's tired of it, and the friend will give her a turtleneck pullover in trade. In the pre-teen set, clothes are not personal possessions to be worn—or at least kept in one's closet—until they wear out or go out of style. They are a medium of exchange to be passed from person to person.

"Where did you get this pink skirt?" I ask Molly. "I never saw it before."

"Oh," she says nonchalantly, "Martha gave it to me."

"Gave it to you? Why would Martha give you her skirt?"

"Because I gave her my green sweater."

"But your green sweater goes with your plaid skirt. We shopped all over town to find just the right shade of green, remember?"

"It's all right, Mommy. I don't have the green skirt anymore. I traded it with Kathy for her gray jumper. It looks just neat with my striped turtleneck."

"What striped turtleneck?"

"The one Laddie traded me for my green suede purse."

These transactions innocently disregard the relative monetary values involved. One day you are shocked to discover that your child has swapped a threadbare tee-shirt which she inherited from her older sister, for a handsome down-filled ski parka. Horrified, you telephone the other child's mother to apologize for your child's robber baron instincts, and to arrange a trade-back. You are equally dismayed three days later when you find out that your little robber baron has generously traded her good winter coat for a pair of knee-high socks. With holes in both heels.

Probably, the wisest policy is to keep calm and trust that a divine justice evens these things up over the long stretch. Certainly, it is folly to launch into a discussion of price tags with your child.

"But Mommy," she says reasonably, "I love the socks and I hate the coat." And there you are, grappling with the philosophic concept of intrinsic values—and even Aristotle got hung up on that one.

ARGUMENTS ABOUT FIT are just as futile. From a child's eye view, it fits if she can get into it without bursting the seams. Minor flaws (like shoulders that dangle around her biceps, and waistlines that hit her where her bosom would be if she had any) she dismisses with a shrug. "Oh, Mommy, nobody notices things like that."

From a mother's point of view, it is disheartening to watch your child's carefully chosen and painstakingly hemmed wardrobe disintegrate into a miscellany of too-big and too-small hand-me-downs. Of course, a vigilant mother can sometimes succeed in re-instating the original outfits, although it's a project rather like tracking down a two-door Ford you traded in back in '54.

Still, a purposeful mother with plenty of time on her hands can do it. One such mother called at our house the other day to ask, "Have you by any chance seen Dotty's brown loafers and her green wool dress?"

When my husband overheard me relaying the query to Molly, he looked puzzled. "How," he asked wonderingly, "can a girl lose her dress and her shoes?"

For a moment, I considered trying to explain it to him, but it was just too complicated. I merely shrugged, and told him soothingly that dinner would be ready in a couple of minutes.

'Baxter, What Do You Have on Me?'

To AFL-CIO Auxiliaries:

Mrs. Humphrey Bids Women Step Up Role

Women in union families—"the organized female conscience of the nation"—must accelerate their role in helping America to solve its problems, Mrs. Hubert H. Humphrey told a meeting of the AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries in Washington.

The Vice President's wife addressed some 150 wives, mothers, sisters and daughters of union members, representing women in 2,000 auxiliaries in all parts of the country.

The two-day national conference, the first of its kind for the auxiliaries, emphasized plans to spur women's political action in this election year. Auxiliary members have been urged to give a day a week to this effort between now and November.

Mrs. Humphrey hailed the auxiliaries' "impressive and enviable" record on behalf of education, anti-poverty, medical care, civil rights, mental retardation, consumer education and other "vital" programs.

Much of this work, she said, "you have done through the political effort to elect local, state and national candidates who are ready to tackle problems in the city councils, state legislatures and on the floor of Congress."

But, she added, the nation still has a long way to go in "the march toward unequaled social progress."

"As long as there is one child who does not have proper health care, who lives in inadequate housing, who does not have an equal opportunity for education—there is work to do," Mrs. Humphrey said.

She described the "excitement" of being at her husband's side when he announced his candidacy for the Democratic presidential nomination only a few days before she addressed the auxiliaries.

"It was a decision that, as he said, took a long time in coming and didn't come easily," she noted.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a message to the conference, pointed out that without women in the trade union movement "wage-earners would have found it even more difficult to persevere in the fight to form unions."

"You have made progress," Meany said, "and yet you know as well as any of us that your potential is far greater than your present," just as is the labor movement's.

He urged the auxiliaries to "redouble your efforts this year" so that the nation "can resume the march toward a better life for all; toward truly full and equal opportunity, and unlimited horizons.

Main speakers at the conference incuded AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, President-emeritus A. J. Hayes of the Machinists, COPE Dir. Al Barkan and assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson.

Schnitzler spoke on the "profiteering, price-fixing and finagling" that has gone on in the drug industry, resulting not only in high prices to consumers but a "danger to the health" of all Americans.

He pointed to legislation in Congress backed by the AFL-CIO to curb drug "scandals" and proposed that the auxiliaries demand that candidates for Congress "stand in favor of positive measures to end incredible abuses of drug monopolists."

Hayes called upon the auxiliaries to press for programs of slum clearance, housing, more and better schools, hospitals, recreation and job opportunities. He presided over the opening day sessions.

Barkan stressed that "nothing is more important than the outcome of this year's election" and — that the auxiliaries — through registration - and - get - out - the-vote drives—can help decide it in favor of liberal candidates.

Mrs. Peterson praised the auxiliaries for being on the side of the consumer and for safety programs long before they became the interest of other segments of American society.

The theme of the conference was set by Mrs. Marcella Beatty, executive director of the auxiliaries in a welcoming address when she said:

"This is a unique chance to find out, first-hand, how the special talents of women in union families can—and should be channeled into building a stronger, more vital trade union movement."

Other speakers, and workshop sessions on consumer problems, legislative issues, labor education and political action were directed specifically toward that objective.

Veteran Examiners Retire from NLRB

The retirement of veteran Trial Examiners John H. Eadie and Arthur E. Reyman was announced by the National Labor Relations Board —Eadie after 26 years of conducting hearings and recommending decisions, Reyman after 15 years.

Reyman was associate general counsel for the former AFL from 1929 to 1936 and in the 1940s became the Labor Dept.'s first regional attorney—in Cleveland, O. He joined the NLRB staff in 1953.

MRS. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY became an honorary life member of the AFL-CIO Auxiliaries after addressing the national conference in Washington, D.C.—her first speech since her husband announced as a candidate for President. The card and pin were presented by Executive Dir. Marcella S. Beatty. Sec.-Treas. Novella Porter is at right. Applauding, at left, is A. J. Hayes, past president of the Machinists, who presided at the session.

Union Apartment Co-op Under Way in Chicago

Chicago, Ill.—The Clothing Workers' Chicago Joint Board has broken ground here for a $14.8 million development to house 606 families, including those of average and moderate income. Two 24-story high-rise cooperative buildings and 52 cooperative garden apartments will be built in the Hyde Park-Kenwood section.

The new, not-for-profit cooperative housing community to be built on 7.2 acres of land will be known as Kenwood Park. It is being sponsored by the United Dwellings Foundation, which was created by the ACWA Joint Board.

"It is our hope that we will be making a contribution not only to the building of a community here in Kenwood, but we will also be showing the way toward making Chicago the most dynamic city in the country," ACWA Vice Pres. Murray H. Finley, Chicago Joint Board manager, told the groundbreaking audience, which was composed of residents of the area, ACWA officials and members, and civic and labor leaders.

"We hope we'll show the way for other labor unions and other not-for-profit organizations to follow our lead in providing moderate income housing," Finley said. "It is also our hope to build here a community that will demonstrate that people of all races and all economic means can live together in harmony."

Kenwood Park is being built to provide sorely needed new housing in the inner city for average income families, and to encourage and promote cooperative home ownership. The use of union funds to promote moderate income housing is believed to be the first in the Chicago area, Finley said.

ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky congratulated Finley and the joint board for its leadership in establishing the United Dwellings Foundation.

"We hear a good deal of talk of what must be done to provide decent housing, especially these days. But people cannot live in words; they must live in homes and homes have to be built. And the Amalgamated principle is deeds, not words," Potofsky declared.

Pointing to the 42 years during which the ACWA has sponsored cooperative housing, Potofsky reminded the audience that the Chicago development, like all ACWA projects, would be non-profit and integrated.

Chicago Mayor Richard J. Daley told the audience that "We all agree that a decent home for every family is one of the basic fundamentals and requirements of Chicago and of America today, and this is a great step in that road of providing it."

Patterned after the United Housing Foundation in New York, the United Dwellings Foundation, whose membership still is in the process of formation, will be a federation of housing cooperatives, civic groups, labor unions and other not-for-profit organizations. The Amalgamated was one of the founders of New York's United Housing Foundation.

Finley is president of the United Dwellings Foundation. Vice President is ACWA Sec.-Treas. Frank Rosenblum. Abner J. Mikva, Chicago Joint Board counsel, is secretary-treasurer. Potofsky, who is also president of the United Housing Foundation in New York, and Harold Ostroff, executive vice president and operating head of the New York Foundation, are directors.

CONVENTION

The Packinghouse Workers notified all locals that the convention originally scheduled for New Orleans June 3-7 will be held July 7-11 in Los Angeles at the Hotel Biltmore. More than 400 delegates are expected for the biennial meeting.

Office Union Offers Course In Investment

New York—Members of the Office & Professional Employes across the nation soon will be learning the "do's and don'ts" of wise stock market investment under a program being worked out here.

OPEIU Pres. Howard Coughlin announced that plans for the courses, to be offered free, are being developed in conferences with Reynolds & Co., an investment firm with 50 offices from coast to coast.

The number of cities in which the program will be offered is still to be worked out, a union spokesman said.

Plans for the national program, Coughlin reported, are the outgrowth of a "highly successful" four-session course which Reynolds conducted here for members of OPEIU Local 153.

The firm's officials lectured on fundamentals of investing, trading, types of securities, dividends, price fluctuations and other subjects. Attendance at each session averaged more than 100 persons.

"For us it has been an extra dividend," Local 153 Business Manager Ben J. Cohan declared.

Among those taking the course, he explained, were a number of members who have not turned out for union meetings but now plan to become more active.

Anti-Crime Bill Gets Labor Backing in Part

Labor supports federal anti-crime legislation, but not provisions of a Senate bill which would sanction widespread wiretapping and overturn constitutional safeguards, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller declared.

In a letter to all senators, he urged amendments to the Safe Streets & Crime Control bill currently being debated by the Senate.

He said the AFL-CIO supports the portion of the bill which provides federal grants to help state and local governments improve their police forces.

The federation, he said, also welcomes the bill's restrictions on the mail order sale of handguns as "a step, albeit a small one" towards needed legislation which would stop the indiscriminate sale of firearms "while not curbing the hunter or gun hobbyist."

Biemiller said the AFL-CIO would "welcome the addition of rifles and shotguns to the coverage."

He stressed, however, that the federation "strongly opposes" two sections of the bill reported by the Senate Judiciary Committee.

One section would overturn numerous Supreme Court decisions "to turn the clock back a generation or more as respects the rights of defendants in criminal cases."

Since the court's decisions were based on constitutional grounds, Biemiller noted, the "main effect" of such legislation "would be to create chaos in the criminal courts for a decade or more, until its provisions were one-by-one stricken down by new Supreme Court decisions."

The wiretapping provision of the bill, Biemiller said, would allow eavesdropping by federal, state and local law enforcement officials in the investigation of minor as well as major offenses.

He strongly urged the Senate to restore the language of the original Administration bill which would ban all wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping except where authorized by the President in the interest of national security.

TAKING THE OATH of office after being elected to new terms on the executive council of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept. are Michael Fox, president, third from right, and other leaders of rail shopcraft unions. The oath was administered by John J. Duffy, retired Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers vice president, following the election at the department's convention in Chicago.

Ship Officers Hail Signing of Bill Extending Bankruptcy Safeguards

New Orleans—Pres. Johnson chose the 58th biennial convention of the Masters, Mates & Pilots to announce his signing of a bill sponsored by the union to grant masters of American ships the same lien rights as officers and seamen to collect monies due from companies in bankruptcy.

House Merchant Marine Committee Chairman Edward A. Garmatz (D-Md.), who introduced the bill four years ago, read a telegram from the White House confirming the measure's enactment that brought the delegates and guests to their feet in an ovation.

Three days later, National Transportation Safety Board Member John H. Reed, former governor of Maine, used his guest appearance to announce the backing of the Dept. of Transportation for a bill—also sponsored by Garmatz—to require Coast Guard licensing of towboat operators.

Leaders of the 88 year-old MM&P hailed both developments as major advances for the union's 11,000 members and for industry safety.

The masters' lien law corrects an historical inequity against shipmasters who a century ago were more directly involved in the money management of shipping operations than they are today under current corporate practices.

The towboat licensing bill would require Coast Guard licensing of towboat operators. Existing towboat licensing requirements cover steam-propelled tugs. Most of the nation's towboats are diesel-propelled, however. The MM&P, the nation's oldest representative of ship's officers in the rivers, harbors and deepsea merchant marine, sponsored the original towboat inspection and licensing bill in the 1950s.

Garmatz said that his committee's hearings into a long-range program for the revitalization of the American flag merchant marine "represents a full-scale, concerted congressional attack" on the industry's decline. "The only solution is immediate and aggressive congressional action" he asserted.

Delegates approved a special commendation to the supervisory staff of the Public Health Service hospital here on behalf of the master, deck officers and other injured seamen of the American freighter African Star, which was involved in a collision with an uninspected towboat on the Mississippi River Mar. 16 in which 20 lives were lost.

The award was made in a public ceremony to Doctors William A. Cherry and Harold T. Conrad, the facility's director and deputy director, respectively, "for the professional medical skills and intensive care and treatment provided the seamen" by the hospital staff "whose swift and dedicated performance saved the lives of many of our shipmates, and whose inspiring devotion testifies to the deeds of the U.S. Public Health Service."

Other convention speakers included Executive Vice Pres. John Bowers of the Longshoremen and Sec.-Treas. Burt E. Lanpher of the Staff Officers' Association, representing ships' pursers.

Senate Committee OKs Johnson's Housing Bill

The Senate Banking Committee responded to Pres. Johnson's "urgent" appeal and approved legislation launching a multi-billion dollar drive to wipe out America's slums.

The President had outlined a 10-year program to overcome the nation's housing deficit and told Congress "there is no time to lose."

As a start, the committee sent to the Senate floor a three-year authorization bill carrying a total price tag of $5.2 billion. The money—if appropriated by Congress in separate legislation—would be used to step up existing programs of public housing, rent subsidies, urban renewal and model cities grants. It would also start new programs, including home ownership for low and moderate income families and loan guarantees for developers of "new towns."

During committee hearings, the AFL-CIO termed the legislation "the most important housing measure to come before Congress in 20 years."

The federation praised the "approach" of the Administration bill, but warned that "far more housing" must be built to overcome the present backlog and meet the future needs of an expanding population.

In its first year, the Senate bill would triple the number of low and moderate income housing units now being built with federal help—to 300,000 a year. The President's goal is 6 million new and rehabilitated units over the next 10 years. If reached, it would be a twelvefold increase over the 500,000 units built during the past 10 years.

Federal loans, guarantees and interest subsidies would also be provided to enable private groups to enter the low and moderate income housing market.

A home ownership plan would subsidize the interest cost for families above the bare poverty level but with incomes too low to enable them to obtain decent housing without federal help.

The omnibus bill also includes riot and flood insurance legislation. It would transfer to private investors full ownership of the Federal National Mortgage Association, which supports the mortgage market by buying government-backed home mortgages from private lenders. And it would establish a National Housing Corp. aimed at attracting private investment into low-income and moderate-income housing projects.

In a year of "budget restraint," the housing bill provides one of the few expansions in federal spending sought by the Administration. But the President told Congress that "the hour is late" and this may be "the last clear chance" to reverse the decay of the nation's cities.

Meany Tells Railroaders:

Labor's Goals Tied To National Needs

Chicago—Organized labor's prime goals are the same as the nation's—peace and freedom in Asia and the world and the elimination of poverty, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany stressed in a speech to the 14th convention of the federation's Railway Employes Dept.

Meany's address highlighted a crowded agenda for the 250 delegates, including several other key speakers, election of officers and numerous resolutions, largely pertaining to the department's projected wage movement.

Meany praised the shopcraft unions that make up the department for their "militant efforts" to win gains for their members in "a very difficult situation." The stand of the shopcrafts, he noted, led to impressive wage increases and differentials in pay for skilled workers.

Saying that good railroads were of extreme importance to the economy of the nation, Meany said he was "ashamed of the way the railroad industry had been allowed to go downhill in the past 15 or 20 years." The American people, he said, "have a right to expect the railroads to keep up to date."

The AFL-CIO President told of traveling on the well-kept, modern and high-speed trains of foreign lands and said "America needs to revive its passenger service.

Railroad unions, the industry and the government all have a stake in a passenger system adequate to meet the needs of the nation in a national emergency, he said.

Turning to the "difficult times ahead" at home and abroad, Meany called for strong labor support for Pres. Johnson "in the efforts to attain peace and freedom."

Of the "no. 1 problem at home," the economic blight of the cities and poverty among millions who are "prisoners of the ghettos," Meany insisted that the answer is not "black power," nor "burn baby burn" nor looting and arson.

"We have a comprehensive and long-range job to rebuild cities—and government, private enterprise, private and public agencies and the labor movement must cooperate," he declared.

"There must also be a major effort to educate and train people in the ghettos at the bottom of the economic ladder so they will develop the skills that modern industry needs and thus acquire and hold the jobs they should have."

He noted that organized labor had been engaged in the struggle to wipe out poverty for three-quarters of a century and declared it would continue the battle. "There is no longer any excuse for slums," he said. "America possesses the manpower and technical know-how and all of the other means needed to rid this nation of slums."

Meany strongly emphasized the critical importance of political action this year. "To help elect our friends and to oppose those who are hostile to labor."

Michael Fox was re-elected president of the department and Howard Pickett secretary-treasurer.

Convention resolutions aimed at setting goals for a new wage-rules movement, which the shopcraft unions will be free to launch on Sept. 1, covered among other things:

- A 25 percent increase in basic rates of pay or all shopmen; a 10 percent wage differential for shifts starting after noon and 15 percent for those starting after 5 p.m.; a 50-cents-per-hour differential for skilled mechanics above any pay increase, and a cost-of-living escalator clause.
- The setting of a date to which negotiated wage increases would be retroactive along with a provision for the payment of six percent interest on delayed payments of retroactive increases.
- A five-day, Monday through Friday, workweek, with double time for work on Saturday and triple time on Sunday or holidays.
- Double time for overtime in excess of the basic work day and triple time for all work in excess of 16 hours.
- Improved vacations of up to five weeks after 15 years of service with an additional day for each year after 15.
- Twelve paid holidays per year and dropping of the requirement that an employe must work the day before and the day after the holiday to qualify.
- Sick leave pay ranging from three days after one year of service to 60 days after 20 years, with unused leave carried over from year to year.
- Three days bereavement pay after a death in the immediate family.

Resolutions also called for a strict ban on contracting-out of shopmen's work; a guaranteed annual wage; an adequate apprenticeship program; adequate, sanitary dining areas, locker rooms, washrooms and toilets for employes; paid time off for voting in elections.

Fox reported to the delegates for the executive council and other department officers and pointed out that in the past four years, despite continued resistance by the nation's carriers, "we made good progress in improving the welfare of the employes we represent."

He reviewed the gains of three national wage movements since 1964 and major advances on the legislative front, including the establishment of a supplemental pension system and improved benefits under the Railroad Retirement and Unemployment Insurance Acts.

Meany drew high praise for his role in the national shopcrafts dispute from Edward J. Hickey, Jr., counsel for the department and other railroad unions, who reviewed the long struggle in his speech.

Other speakers included Francis A. O'Neill, Jr., a member of the National Mediation Board; Thomas R. Donahue, assistant secretary of labor; and Harold C. Crotty, president of the Maintenance of Way Employes.

AFL-CIO Tells Congress:

Labor, HEW Needs Demand More Funds

A "rich, affluent America" can afford the programs needed to improve education, enforce the minimum wage and protect the safety and health of workers, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

The federation urged a House Appropriations subcommittee to vote more money—not less—for key programs administered by the Labor Dept. and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller asked Congress to appropriate the full amount it previously authorized for aid to education, even though a lesser amount is requested in the President's budget.

To do less, he warned, would mean either "spreading the funds too thin to be helpful or concentrating the funds on so few pupils that only a fraction of the need could be met."

Biemiller reiterated labor's "grave concern" at the proposals for further cuts in the federal budget, "virtually all of which would make their deepest slashes in the programs we consider of most urgent need."

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Ray Denison, who presented Biemiller's testimony, submitted a detailed 38-page statement on the budget for the two departments and related agencies covered in the same appropriations bill—the National Labor Relations Board, the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, and the National Mediation Board, which administers the Railway Labor Act.

In oral testimony, the AFL-CIO spokesman stressed these key areas:

- The 50 additional wage-hour investigators provided in the budget request are urgently needed and in fact an additional 325 more investigators would be required "to adequately protect the 42 million working Americans" covered by the wage-hour law.
- Only 10 safety inspectors are employed to enforce federal safety standards for 27 million workers in firms covered by the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act. "The fact that 13 additional positions are sought in the budget is encouraging, but, realistically, it is totally inadequate to meet the need."
- The occupational health budget of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare should be increased $4.5 million above the Administration's request. "If Americans are to be safeguarded from illness and death caused by occupational health hazards, we must move ahead with a concerted program to find out more about their cause and effect and how to reduce them."
- The aid to education laws enacted in recent years marked "an impressive beginning" even though they fell short of the support needed "to provide quality education for every child wherever he may live, whatever his family income, and whatever his race or nationality background."

The "most tragic" budget proposal would provide only $1.2 billion—less than half of the $2.5 billion which Congress has authorized—for aid to elementary and secondary education.

Other needed programs, including the Teacher Corps and the Bilingual Education Act, intended to help children from Spanish-speaking homes overcome language barriers, are also underfunded.

Biemiller reiterated labor's willingness "to pay our fair share of the costs" of meeting America's needs at home as well as its commitments abroad.

"America's domestic crisis will not be met by across-the-board budget cuts or wholesale jettisoning of programs that we all know are necessary to improve the quality of American life," he declared.

NLRB Intervention Hit In Union Discipline Case

The AFL-CIO has filed a Supreme Court brief challenging the right of the National Labor Relations Board to intervene in matters of internal union discipline not involving restraint or coercion.

In its friend of the court brief, the federation asked the high court to uphold a Court of Appeals ruling and to turn down an appeal from the NLRB general counsel. At issue is the right of Marine & Shipbuilding Workers Local 22, New York City, to expel from membership a ship's painter for United States Lines who filed unfair labor practice charges against his union in 1964 before exhausting all his remedies under the union constitution.

The NLRB took the position, the AFL-CIO said in its brief, that expelling a union member or fining him, though not normally considered restraint or coercion under the law, may become illegal conduct if its purpose is against public policy. The union carried an appeal to the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Philadelphia, which rejected the board's request for enforcement.

The AFL-CIO brief cited the intent of Congress, the language of the labor law and prior court rulings in support of its claim that expulsions and other union discipline which affect only membership rights, and not job rights, are beyond the NLRB's "regulatory competence."

There was no restraint or coercion shown, and the board failed to prove its charge that the union violated sound public policy when it expelled the member, the brief said. It added:

"Congress made it plain that expulsions, suspensions and other nonviolent union discipline which affect a union member as a member and not as an employe are not the types of conduct" forbidden by the Wagner Act and its amendments, the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin Acts.

The case got into court when Local 22 members voted in 1964 to expel Edwin H. Holder from membership. Holder had accused the local president of causing the U.S. Lines to downgrade him from a leader's job.

When the local executive board dismissed the charges and a membership meeting sustained the verdict, Holder filed unfair practice charges with the NLRB instead of appealing to the international union board, as the constitution required. The NLRB regional director found no grounds for issuing a complaint, and the union members then found Holder guilty of violating the constitution and expelled him.

The union said Holder did not lose his job and is still legally entitled to its services.

PATIENT RECEIVES an intravenous transfusion in Bellevue Hospital, New York City, while lying in a hallway, head on to a pile of dirty laundry. State, County & Municipal Employes District Council 37 found that some patients actually fell from the hospital's broken stretchers. The union's expose of dangerous conditions in 10 city hospitals stirred Mayor John V. Lindsay to pledge a "crash" program of hospital reforms.

Union Campaign Receives Pledge To Improve New York Hospitals

New York—A union crusade to correct abuses in city hospitals has produced dramatic results, including a written pledge of speedy reforms by Mayor John V. Lindsay.

The campaign is being waged by District Council 37 of the State, County & Municipal Employes through its newspaper, the Public Employe Press. The council represents 21,000 workers in the 21 municipal hospitals, and a total of 106,000 in New York City agencies.

The mayor's action came in response to disclosures in the union newspaper of supply shortages and dangerous and unsanitary conditions. The series of articles in the Public Employe Press gave rise to four articles in the New York Times and several in the New York Post and Daily News.

Lindsay got a personal look at the situation in a union-conducted tour of Kings County Hospital in Brooklyn.

In a letter to Victor Gotbaum, executive director of the district council, Lindsay spelled out specific measures to replace faulty equipment and repair the physical plant in the hospitals. "The conditions you and your associates called to my attention are, as I have so often stated, intolerable," the mayor informed Gotbaum.

He promised a crash program for hospital renovation as "the first and immediate attack on the many years of neglect of these facilities."

The mayor also issued an executive order that will, he said, "tend to expedite contracting procedures and speed up the needed repairs."

Under Executive Order No. 58, the Dept. of Hospitals can make expenditures of up to $10,000 without obtaining prior approval of the Budget Bureau. All other city agencies require prior approval for expenditures over $5,000.

As a direct result of his tour of Kings County with DC 37 leaders; Lindsay outlined a number of repairs to be undertaken immediately in the institution.

One project will clear up one of the most shocking conditions exposed by the Public Employe Press. According to the Press, a bedpan washer-sterilizer in a contagious disease ward at Kings County was inoperative for more than nine months. As a result, Nurses' Aides were forced to wash bedpans by hand. The Press suggested a connection between this unsanitary procedure and the fact that Kings County employes have a high rate of on-the-job contraction of tuberculosis.

The bedpan washer was repaired, and, in his letter, the mayor announced that it would be replaced by June 1.

Previously, Hospitals Commissioner Joseph V. Terenzio had prepared a timetable for correcting a long list of abuses uncovered by the Public Employe Press.

The timetable detailed steps that had been taken or were under way to correct numerous shortcomings. The list included at least 43 problems in 10 different city hospitals, some so serious that the Press labeled them "hospital horrors."

For example, at Kings County Hospital, a registered nurse informed representatives of the union, State Sen. Seymour Thaler and a reporter from a New York daily that patients' lives were lost—that day and previously—because a defibrillator was not available.

Bellevue Hospital was making do with broken stretchers from which patients actually tumbled after operations. This was corrected after WINS, a local radio station, exposed the situation in a followup of the union newspaper's charges.

The Public Employe Press found shortages in the hospitals ranging all the way from robes, linens, stretchers and wheel chairs to life-saving suction machines. Decrepit facilities with leaks, crumbling ceilings, and peeling walls also were discovered.

Many of the "horrors" uncovered by District Council 37 have already been set right. The personal intervention of Lindsay is counted upon to correct other abuses.

Associate Dir. Lillian Roberts said that members of Hospital Locals 420 and 1784 will make sure that the city's promises become realities by checking up on all steps taken by the Dept. of Hospitals.

Referring to problems that might arise in the future, she added: "We intend to communicate directly with the mayor when we find that improvements cannot be obtained with management of the hospital itself, or with the commissioner."

STAGNANT WATER collecting on the broken kitchen floor at Kings County Hospital in Brooklyn caused a hospital worker to fall and suffer a slipped disc. It was one of a number of "hospital horrors" uncovered by State, County & Municipal Employes District Council 37 in a survey of city hospitals.

4 Years of College:

6 New Scholarships Given by AFL-CIO

Six graduating high school students have been awarded four-year scholarships under the AFL-CIO Merit Scholarship program, Pres. George Meany announced.

The awards, each worth up to $6,000 for the four years of college, have been made by the AFL-CIO for ten years. Since the program has been in operation a total of 60 outstanding high school students have received the scholarships.

The winners, notified of their selection by Meany, are:

Francis Kelly Cawley, Las Vegas, Nev.; Cheryl J. Fong, San Francisco, Calif.; James C. Hackbarth, Wausau, Wis.; James Clay Harris, Tampa, Fla.; Mary E. Valree, Mobile, Ala.; and Richard Glenn Wismer, Philadelphia, Pa.

"The AFL-CIO Merit Scholarships are a symbol of the leadership which organized labor has provided in widening the opportunity for all young people to obtain higher education," Meany said in announcing the winners.

"We are grateful that AFL-CIO supported student-aid legislation which has been passed during the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations has made college possible for many thousands of young people who could not have attended otherwise. Important as these new federal programs are, the AFL-CIO will not be satisfied until every young person, wherever he lives, whatever his means, has the opportunity to develop to the limit of his capability.

"The impressive records made by past winners of AFL-CIO Merit Scholarships help to reinforce our belief that furthering the opportunities for higher education benefits not only the young people themselves, but the entire nation as well."

The winners are selected each year on the basis of high school records, evaluation by high school teachers and the results of competitive tests given by the non-profit National Merit Scholarship Corporation.

Two winners are chosen in each of three zones into which the country is divided. At least three of the scholarships must be awarded students with one parent who is a member of an AFL-CIO union. Five of this year's winners have parents who are union members.

The awards are good in any accredited college or university and for study in any subject. The actual amount of each scholarship is determined by the National Merit Scholarship Corp. on the basis of college costs and family needs.

Brief sketches of the winners follow:

Cawley will be graduated from Valley High School in Las Vegas and plans to study law. Both of his parents are union members. His father, Francis Cawley, belongs to the Fire Fighters. His mother, Mrs. Dolores Cawley, is a member of the Hotel & Restaurant Workers. He is president of his senior class and has participated in football, wrestling and basketball. He was elected governor of Nevada's Boys' State in 1967 and represented Nevada as a senator at the 1967 Boys' Nation in Washington, D.C.

Miss Fong, after graduating from Lowell High School in San Francisco, plans to major in mathematics at Stanford University. She hopes to become a secondary school teacher. Her father, Lee T. Fong, is a member of two unions —the Carpenters and the Boilermakers. She has played an active part in the California Scholarship Federation, an organization which provides tutoring service for pupils who need help. With her family she participated in the Chinese Family Life Study conducted at the University of California. She plays piano and guitar.

Hackbarth helps to operate his father's dairy farm and plans to major in agriculture at Wisconsin State University after being graduated from Wausau High School. He is associate editor of his school year book, serves as treasurer of his church Walther League, and attended the Badger Boys' State. But, he adds, "I still haven't found that I enjoy the executive type of life nearly as much as I do the out-of-doors. His father, Charles H. Hackbarth, is a member of the Papermakers & Paperworkers.

Harris looks forward to a career as a journalist. After he is graduated from Chamberlain High School in Tampa, he plans to attend the University of Florida where he will major in journalism. He has been editor of school papers in elementary school, junior high school and senior high school. He was a national winner in the Quill and Scroll newswriting contest. He was president of his junior class and is president of the Pan American Club. He was a delegate to the Florida Junior Science and Humanities Symposium and the "Salute to Excellence" weekend of the American Academy of Achievement in Dallas in 1967. His father, James Harris, is a member of the Masters, Mates & Pilots.

Miss Valree hopes to attend Cornell University to major in English in preparation for becoming a secondary school teacher. She has been a student at Most Pure Heart of Mary School in Mobile, but the school officials felt that their offering was too limited to meet her needs and they arranged for her to spend the last half of her senior year at a girls' college in Illinois. She sings and engages in creative writing. Her father, Thomas J. Valree, is employed in Providence Hospital in Mobile.

Wismer, a student at Cardinal Dougherty High School in Philadelphia, plans to attend the University of Chicago where he will prepare for a career in social work. He has already made a beginning toward his goals by his active participation in the Community Service Corps, an anti-poverty program in the Philadelphia parochial high schools. He has also worked during the summer in an anti-poverty program for young children. Wismer has also participated in cross-country running, the student council, and many church activities. His mother, Mrs. Elizabeth Wismer, is a member of the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers.

Senate Unit Votes to Strengthen Fair Employment Enforcement for the equal employment bill to complete the congressional circuit in the three months remaining before adjournment.

The bill was part of the civil rights package Pres. Johnson submitted to Congress and is the one remaining item which the civil rights coalition is pressing for this year.

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission can only set guidelines, investigate complaints and seek voluntary compliance. It has no power to enforce the ban on job discrimination which was written into the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

If conciliation fails, an individual complainant must bring his own suit—starting in the lowest federal court and subject to layers of delaying appeals to higher courts. If the Justice Dept. finds a "pattern of discrimination," however, the government can bring a court case.

The committee-approved amendments would, in effect, give the commission the same type of power long granted to the National Labor Relations Board.

Conciliation would still be emphasized in the commission's operation. On receiving a complaint, it would investigate. If it found no reasonable cause to believe the charge is true, it would dismiss the complaint—although the complainant would be free to seek review in federal district court.

If the investigation turned up reasonable cause to believe the charge is true, the commission then would seek to obtain voluntary compliance. If this failed, it would convene a formal administrative hearing. If it found an unlawful employment practice, it would order remedial action, including, where appropriate, back pay.

As is the case with the NLRB, the order would be subject to review and enforcement in the U.S. Court of Appeals.

A similar bill passed the House in 1966, but died when the Senate failed to act before adjournment of the 89th Congress.

On the House budget-tax controversy, the latest developments appeared to point to a victory for Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), the powerful chairman of the House Ways & Means Committee.

Mills, for over a year, has refused to bring out of his committee a tax increase bill which the Administration is convinced is essential to meet the cost of the Viet Nam war and necessary domestic programs without piling up an unmanageable budget deficit.

The Senate, in an effort to get things rolling, added both a tax increase and a $6 billion budget cut —not all of which would have an immediate impact — to a House-passed bill extending automobile and telephone excise taxes.

Mills insisted on deeper, firmer cuts and House Appropriations Committee Chairman George H. Mahon (D-Tex.) worked with White House aides to develop a formula.

It was an intricate proposal, combining cancellation of some money already appropriated but not actually spent, cuts in the President's budget for this year, and a reduction in spending commitments for the future.

Republicans on the Appropriations Committee came up with their own formula, making somewhat deeper slashes more in line with what Mills earlier had suggested.

There had been no formal action by the tax conferees when the AFL-CIO News went to press, but several participants voiced optimism that the deadlock would be broken.

Still undetermined was the big question of where the cuts would be made in a budget which many considered inadequate to meet the nation's needs for schools, housing, jobs and aid to cities.

While negotiations were under way over the extent of budget cuts, Congress was reminded of unmet needs requiring higher expenditures.

The Rev. Ralph D. Abernathy, successor to the slain Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., as head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, testified before a Senate subcommittee along with an advance guard of the "Poor People's March."

He urged immediate passage of legislation creating 2 million jobs for the hard-core unemployed. Too many of existing training programs, he charged, lead only to "dead-end jobs which pay a boy's wages" or to no jobs at all.

Meany Bids Congress Act On Million New Jobs 'Now'

Conferees Ax Budget $6 Billion

A House-Senate conference committee announced agreement on a meat-ax $6 billion budget cut which Pres. Johnson had said "would injure the national interest" and "would really bring chaos to the government."

The spending cut was tied to the 10 percent surcharge which the President has declared is urgently needed to help meet the cost of the Viet Nam war and ease the strain on the nation's money market.

Reluctantly, the Administration said it would accept a proposed $4 billion cut suggested by the House Appropriations Committee—if this were the only way to get a tax increase bill past a roadblock set up by Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), powerful chairman of the House Ways & Means Committee.

Mills and his Republican allies had demanded bigger spending cuts and Johnson at a news conference angrily lashed at attempts to "blackmail" him by making acceptance of a higher amount the price of a tax rise.

For a while it appeared that the President had won the showdown. The House Ways & Means Committee, on a party-line vote, rejected a Republican proposal to tie a $6 billion cut to the tax rise. It then adopted a Democratic motion to instruct its conferees to support a cut of "at least $4 billion."

Few observers then paid much attention to the phrase, "at least." But it turned out to be the key.

Administration officials were frankly stunned at the action. Treas-

ENTHUSIASTIC ovation greeted Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey when he addressed the Service Employes convention in Washington. Delegates unanimously endorsed Humphrey for the presidency. He is shown here with SEIU Pres. David Sullivan.

'Best Qualified':

Service Employes Endorse Humphrey

By Duane Emme

Delegates to the 14th convention of the Service Employes in Washington endorsed Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey for the presidency as the man "best qualified to lead the nation to peace and progress."

Then they cheered and applauded their candidate as he appeared before them to pledge a campaign based on continuing and expanding the record of "four great Democratic Presidents—Roosevelt, Truman, Kennedy and Johnson."

It was Humphrey's first address to a labor group since announcing his candidacy for the Democratic nomination.

Earlier, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the convention that "in looking the field over as an American first and then as a trade unionist . . . the best qualified man to lead this country in the four years to come—is Hubert Humphrey."

Meany expressed the conviction that when union members "look at the qualifications of those aspiring for this great office, I think that they will find that the candidate we recommend has the best qualifications."

The endorsement resolution—approved by a unanimous voice vote—declared that "this critical time in the history of our nation, requires a leader with imagination

Big Ohio Labor Vote Aids Gilligan Victory

Columbus, Ohio—Organized labor in Ohio was given major credit for the smashing upset victory of former Rep. John J. Gilligan in capturing the Democratic nomination for U.S. Senate from the conservative incumbent, Frank J. Lausche.

Gilligan, currently a Cincinnati city councilman, posted a margin of more than 125,000 votes in toppling Lausche, a fixture on the Ohio political scene for 30 years with a long record of opposition to liberal and labor goals.

The Ohio AFL-CIO had broken precedent to give Gilligan its first primary election endorsement in the state federation's 10-year history. And it followed through with a strong get-out-the-vote drive with the aid of computerized union membership lists.

Gilligan carried all but one of the state's industrial counties in running up 560,980 votes to Lausche's 435,367. He will oppose Atty. Gen. William B. Saxbe, the Republican nominee, in the November election.

Lausche, on learning of his defeat, commented: "The world is changing."

A statement issued by the Ohio AFL-CIO said that the primary, in which it had joined forces with

Backs Bill as Key To Urban Crisis

By David L. Perlman

Legislation to create a million public service jobs for the hard-core unemployed—"now, not next year or the year after"—is an "absolute must," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany testified.

Meany told a House Labor subcommittee that in his years of testifying on bills before Congress, "I can recall no single occasion when I felt so wholeheartedly in support of a piece of legislation."

The bill Meany termed "of paramount importance" to solving the urban crisis was introduced by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.), with some 80 co-sponsors.

It "gets directly to the heart" of the problem, Meany stressed. He summarized it in these words:

"It authorizes $4 billion of federal grants to federal, state and local government agencies and private non-profit organizations, in the first year of operation, for the creation of up to 1 million public service jobs for the unemployed and under-employed . . . socially useful work that would not otherwise be done.

"The bill proposes—with utter simplicity—that America meet two of its pressing national problems—unemployment and a backlog of unmet public service needs." (Excerpts, Page 6.)

Workers hired, he noted, would be paid not less than the federal minimum wage or the prevailing wage, whichever is higher.

They would work in parks, schools, hospitals, playgrounds, libraries and similar institutions.

Meany told the subcommittee that labor is cooperating with private business efforts to provide jobs for the disadvantaged, but "the fact is the private sector just cannot do the job alone. I think it is time Congress faces up to this fact and stops trying to pass the buck to private employers."

The AFL-CIO president was the leadoff witness at the House hearings, at which O'Hara presided. Nearly every subcommittee member was on hand for his testimony and for a free-wheeling discussion

Job Gains Not Shared By Slums

The nation's unemployment picture brightened a bit last month but people living in the poorest urban areas had nothing to cheer about, the Labor Dept. reported.

The fact came to light when the department released a new report on the job situation in metropolitan areas along with its regular April job figures.

The report on poverty neighborhoods in the nation's 100 largest cities will be released periodically from now on as part of the Bureau of Labor Statistics' continuing program, it announced.

In its monthly report, BLS said that the unemployment rate for the nation as a whole dropped one-tenth of 1 percent in April to 3.5 percent, equalling a post-Korean War low reached also in January.

But in the poverty neighborhoods the jobless rate was 7 percent for the first quarter of 1968, more than twice the 3.4 percent unemployment rate for the same period in remaining urban neighborhoods covered by the report and nearly twice the quarterly rate for the nation as a whole—4 percent.

Negro unemployment rates were higher than white rates both in the poorest urban areas—8.7 percent

Communist Terrorism Backfires in Viet Nam

Communism's brutality and terrorist tactics in South Viet Nam have backfired, a leader in the fight for freedom there told newsmen at the National Press Club in Washington.

In fact, South Viet Nam emerged from the recent Communist Tet offensive "as a definitely viable state" with its people "inspired in a new spirit of patriotism and determination," declared Dr. Phan Quang Dan.

Dr. Dan is the leader of the Free Democratic Party of South Viet Nam and is in the United States as guest of the Asian-American Free Labor Institute by invitation from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

BANK WORKERS picket the Montreal City & District Savings Bank to win bargaining recognition after affiliating with the Office & Professional Employes. They won contract benefits that made them the highest paid bank workers in Canada.

Young Workers Seen Launching New Era of Unionism in Banks

A few years ago they said it wouldn't happen in a million years—that white-collar bank workers would not allow themselves to be organized into a bargaining unit.

Even the Office & Professional Employes—which had organized the clerical and technical workers on the floors of New York's Wall Street exchanges—held little hope of winning over bank employes.

Then it happened—and it didn't take a million years.

The first big break came in Quebec when an independent union of 1,200 Canadian employes of the Montreal City & District Savings Bank joined the OPEIU.

A subsequent contract made them the highest paid bank workers in Canada.

Last month employes of the Trust Company of New Jersey in Jersey City voted by a 40-1 margin to give the OPEIU a victory in an NLRB election.

The OPEIU suggests that these developments indicate the start of a new era in the labor movement. And the union acknowledges that a complete switch in its own outlook may be a key factor.

The union, said OPEIU Pres. Howard Coughlin, erroneously concluded that young people "find unionism unattractive, unexciting . . . uninteresting and are more concerned with having a good time."

"Within the past year or two," noted Coughlin, "my own appraisal of this younger generation has undergone a profound change.

"So profound indeed that I now predict not only that bank employes in North America are soon going to be organized, but that this job will be done by enthusiastic young men and women in their late teens and early twenties."

The average age of the union members that led the organizing of the Montreal bank workers was under 21, he pointed out.

These same young workers are now concentrating on organizing other bank employes in Quebec.

Coughlin says that unionism among bank employes in the United States also is beginning to catch fire.

New Attitude

Since the stunning victory in Montreal, the OPEIU has been approached by bank employes in various parts of the country investigating the possibility of organizing.

This reflects an entirely new attitude that has prevailed in banking since post-World War II days, Coughlin suggests.

"Bank workers have only themselves to blame for their present low pay because—in the past—they have lacked the initiative and foresight to organize," he said.

"Besides their already low pay, they now face a double threat to their traditional job security through mergers and automation."

He said "unionism has now become vital for bank employes as a means of economic and social self-preservation."

Powerful bank union movements already exist in Europe, Asia, Africa and Australia, he noted, and all bank workers are organized in Great Britain.

But on both sides of the Atlantic, it has taken a long time for bank workers to realize that there is close identity of interests between white collar and manual workers, the OPEIU president said.

The delay of the union movement in banks is blamed on the illogical class-consciousness by the bank employes who now find it beneficial to establish truly democratic unions, Coughlin said.

5 Works on Vital Issues Given Hillman Awards

New York—Five outstanding treatments of important issues confronting the nation have been cited as the 1968 winners of annual Awards of the Sidney Hillman Foundation.

The awards were presented at a lunch here May 1 by Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers, who also heads the union's Sidney Hillman Foundation. Some 400 persons attended.

Winners of the $500 awards in the foundation's 18th annual presentation were:

Ronald Steel, former Foreign Service officer and widely publicized writer on foreign affairs, for his book, "Pax Americana," published by Viking Press. Steel's thesis is that America has acquired an "accidental empire," whose maintenance may not be in America's or the world's best interests.

Howard A. James, Chicago bureau chief of the Christian Science Monitor, for a 13-part series outlining the need for reform of state court systems. To write the articles, James traveled all over the United States to observe the administration of justice at first hand.

Jay L. McMullen, veteran creator of television documentaries, for his CBS study of life in a Chicago ghetto, "The Tenement." To produce his graphic portrayal of life in the slums, McMullen focused on the hopes, fears, problems and frustrations of nine Negro families who live in a Chicago tenement building.

Prof. Alan F. Westin of Columbia University, a leading expert in the field of civil liberties, for his book, "Privacy and Freedom," published by Atheneum. In his book, Westin studied the growing use and sophistication of eavesdropping devices and presented an "agenda for discussion at the concrete level" of ways to restore and maintain the right of privacy in our society.

Harold and Lynne Mayer received a special award for producing and writing a National Educational Television Program, "The Way It Is." The film, which originated on New York Station WDNT-TV, was the result of weeks of work in a Brooklyn ghetto school. It portrayed the failures of education for the poor and for minority groups.

Potofsky commented that the variety of issues represented in this year's awards for outstanding achievements in the field of mass communications dramatize the foundation's effort to perpetuate the late Sidney Hillman's broad interest in the community. Hillman was first president of the Clothing Workers.

"Hillman had a deep interest in civil liberties, in equal rights, in foreign affairs, in housing and other urban problems," Potofsky observed. "Through these awards and the other programs of the foundation, we have tried to perpetuate Hillman's name by continuing to serve the community."

The contest judges this year were Alan Barth, editorial writer for The Washington Post; Harry Ashmore of the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions at Santa Barbara, Calif., and Prof. Henry S. Commager of Amherst College, Amherst, Mass.

UAW Seeks Amendment:

'Bill of Rights' Asked On Economic Needs

By Eugene A. Kelly

Atlantic City, N. J.—The Auto Workers in convention here directed their leadership, in cooperation with the "broadest possible" coalition of individuals and groups, to launch a campaign for an "economic bill of rights" amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

The convention, with 2,847 delegates and 1,450 alternates setting a new UAW attendance record, said the coalition should press for an amendment "establishing the constitutional right of all Americans to a useful job," a living wage, a guaranteed income for those unable to work, a national health service providing "high quality comprehensive medical care" for all, a "good house in a wholesome community," and an "adequate educational opportunity for every American youth," along with other goals.

Midway in the seven-day convention, the union's 21st, the delegates re-elected Pres. Walter P. Reuther, Sec.-Treas. Emil P. Mazey and Vice Presidents Leonard Woodcock and Pat Greathouse for new two-year terms. All were unopposed.

Also they received a laudatory message from Pres. Johnson regretting that he could not attend the convention, heard Vice Pres. Humphrey ask for their support in his campaign for the presidential nomination, and presented the union's ninth annual Social Justice Award to Pres. John W. Gardner of the Urban Coalition, former secretary of Health, Education and Welfare. T. C. "Tommy" Douglas, leader of Canada's New Democratic Party, was a major convention speaker.

Kennedy Slated

Sen. Robert F. Kennedy was the only other presidential candidate scheduled to appear before convention's end. All others sent regrets.

After the Democratic and Republican party conventions, the union will call a national UAW "community action conference" to review and debate the merits of the candidates for president, as it did in 1960. The delegates by secret ballot will choose the candidate who is to get the official endorsement of the UAW.

Humphrey got an enthusiastic reception including a 15-minute parade led by Minnesota unionists. He asked for the UAW's support to "help drive it home, hard, not just that poverty is wrong but that it can be eliminated by us in our time."

Douglas, a member of Canada's Parliament, called unemployment and deprivation the great problems of our time. He called for a war "against slums, dropouts, and impoverishment in rural areas." Canada, Douglas reported, has the "most rapidly rising cost of living in the world." Wages have not been able to keep up with rising "prices, productivity and profits," he declared.

Besides electing the four top officers, the delegates in regional roll call meetings re-elected four board members at large and 15 incumbent directors. Chosen to replace three retiring directors were Dan Forchione, Cleveland, in place of Patrick J. O'Malley; Walter Murphy, Toledo, for Charles Ballard; and Dennis McDermott, Windsor, Ont., for George Burt. All three retirees are veterans whose replacements are UAW staff members. O'Malley gave the oath of office to the 22-member board and also to incumbent Intl. Trustee Ann Le Febvre, Long Beach, Calif., winner of an election contest.

An opposition group calling itself the "United Caucus," failed in two bids to change convention rules. In a show of hands, the opposition failed to reduce the number of votes needed for a convention rollcall from 825 to 500; and lost an attempt to get a referendum on electing officers by a union-wide secret ballot vote instead of a convention vote.

Reuther reported that strike-won contract gains in the auto, farm equipment and parts industries would increase UAW members' wages by $4.5 to $5 billion by 1970. Also he promised that aerospace workers, in negotiations just getting under way, will "get their equity" with full union support.

Calling for a "truly massive crusade" to wipe out poverty, he said Americans can solve all economic problems "if we have full employment—that is the key."

Mazey reported that the union gained 81,537 members since 1966 and is in healthy financial condition. During the last seven months the union spent $63.9 million from its strike relief fund and has a balance of $61.5 million, thanks to a special emergency assessment, he said.

The delegates approved reappointment of seven public review board members. Msgr. George G. Higgins, chairman, said the board has worked well but the time consumed in exhausting internal remedies for complaining members is "still too long." Because other unions have not adopted similar plans, members tend to go outside the union to redress grievances, he said. He is director of the Social Action Dept. of the U.S. Catholic Conference.

Group Gets New Grant To Aid Job Corps Grads

A national volunteer program to assist young men coming out of the Job Corps has been given a new one-year contract for $450,000, Job Corps Dir. William P. Kelly announced.

The year-old program, Joint Action in Community Service—known as JACS—has organized a network of 5,000 volunteers in 500 communities across the nation and is now helping some 1,000 returning corpsmen each month.

JACS, a private, non-profit corporation, was organized by leaders of Protestant and Catholic social action agencies. It's participants now include representatives of all religious faiths, labor, business and civic groups.

On its 19-member board of directors are Julius Rothman, AFL-CIO coordinator of anti-poverty programs, and Pres. Charles A. Della of the Maryland AFL-CIO.

JACS volunteers aid returning corpsmen in a number of ways—such as helping them find jobs and housing, assisting them in plans for continuing their education and introducing them to persons of their own age in the community.

The program "helps to make sure that the nation's investment in the lives of these youngsters pays off," Kelly said.

'Barefaced Falsehood':

Higgins Hits C of C On Job Safety Lies

Msgr. George G. Higgins, director of social action for the U.S. Catholic Conference, accused the U.S. Chamber of Commerce of publishing "shamefully misleading" information in opposition to legislation now before Congress aimed at reducing occupational accidents and disease.

He also accused the Chamber of engaging in "a barefaced falsehood" in its criticism of Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

Msgr. Higgins' comments appeared in a column prepared for Catholic newspapers across the country and headlined: "Safety Act Attacked by Chamber of Commerce."

The column, issued by Msgr. Higgins twice monthly and titled "The Yardstick—Catholic Tests of a Social Order," was scheduled for publication in some 30 Catholic newspapers during the week of May 6.

In April, Msgr. Higgins helped form a voluntary joint committee composed of medical, religious, social, labor and educational groups in support of the pending Occupational Safety & Health Act of 1966.

His charges against the Chamber of Commerce were based on an article in the April issue of the Chamber's publication, Nation's Business.

'Hysterical Attack'

In that article, Msgr. Higgins wrote, "the Chamber launched what I can only characterize as a demagogic and almost hysterical attack against the (Occupational Safety & Health) bill and against one of its leading proponents, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

"This article is shamefully misleading. Ominously entitled 'Life or Death for Your Business?' it charges, in lurid terms designed to scare the wits out of its readers, that the secretary of labor 'wants the power to shut you down in the name of health and safety.' "

"Then, in a barefaced falsehood, the Chamber article states that 'Labor Sec. Willard Wirtz blandly explained to congressmen that getting people (as safety inspectors) would be no drawback. He said he could staff his safety policing team with the hard-core unemployed.' "

Msgr. Higgins wrote: "One wonders what the Chamber of Commerce hopes to accomplish by such a patently false attack on Sec. Wirtz—a conscientious and dedicated public servant."

He added that in his judgment, "the Chamber does itself, and its membership, a distinct disservice by treating such a serious matter in such a crudely demogogic manner.

"The real need for safety and health standards is to be found in plants employing under 500 workers. These plants, as a rule, offer little or no protection for their workers—and yet they constitute over 90 percent of all working establishments.

"So the problem is a very real one, and is constantly getting worse. It must be faced honestly and honorably. It is deeply regrettable that the U.S. Chamber of Commerce is not able to face the problem in such a manner."

The Occupational Safety & Health bill, which Msgr. Higgins and the joint committee are supporting, would require observance by all establishments engaged in interstate commerce of basic safety and health standards in the work place. Also, it provides for information gathering, training and education through grants to the states by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

"Every working day of the year finds 55 killed, 8,500 disabled and over 27,000 injured on the job," Msgr. Higgins stated at the formation of the Joint Committee on Occupational Safety & Health.

"Such a sacrifice is not necessary. The goods and services our nation provides in greater abundance than any other country need not be stained with the blood of its workers."

STATE WINNERS of "ability counts" high school essay contest sponsored by the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped were sent to Washington with transportation and expenses paid by State AFL-CIO central bodies and were guests of the federation at a luncheon. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and vice chairman of the committee, presents a gift book from the AFL-CIO, entitled Founders of Freedom in America, to the national winner, Barry Meyers of Palm Springs, Calif. Social Security Fund In 'Excellent' Condition

The social security trust funds are in "excellent" financial shape, the trustees reported after completing their annual review.

Social Security Commissioner Robert M. Ball said a study of both short term and long range operations showed the program to be financially and actuarially sound.

The two basic funds finance the old age and survivors insurance program and the disability insurance program. Their income exceeded benefits paid out by almost $4 billion in fiscal year 1967 and assets at the end of the year totalled $25.5 billion.

A 75-year projection of income and payments, based on the tax schedule and earnings base now in the law, shows no fiscal problems.

That's not surprising, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bertrand Seidman commented.

Despite periodic scare stories by political opponents of social security, the program is financed so conservatively that there is usually a big surplus, Seidman observed. He noted that the past surplus financed more than half of the social security benefit increase enacted by Congress last year.

Now, he said, "the excess of the income over the outgo is piling up so fast that the surplus could finance another significant increase in benefits."

The secretaries of the treasury, of labor, and of health, education and welfare serve as trustees of the funds.

In addition to the two social security funds, there are the Hospital Insurance Trust Fund and the Supplementary Medical Insurance Trust Fund—the two parts of the medicare program.

The voluntary insurance premiums are adjusted periodically—each year if necessary—so no long range projection is necessary.

A 25-year estimate made by the trustees of the basic hospital insurance fund anticipates that income over this period will exceed total outgo.

The trustees' reports on the social security funds confirm what previous reports have found—that the reserves on hand and the schedule of payments and benefits written into law assure that there is no danger of the program not being able to meet its obligations.

It means, Seidman noted, that workers who are paying a portion of their earnings into the program can be assured that there will always be enough money in the fund to fully pay the benefits they have earned.

Youth Corps Helps Slash Dropout Rate

Neighborhood Youth Corps in-school programs have slashed dropout rates in four major cities—Cleveland, Minneapolis, Washington, D.C. and Pittsburgh, the Labor Dept. reported.

The programs provide part-time jobs in libraries, schools and other public buildings for poverty-level boys and girls 14 and up. The young people also receive counseling and other supportive services.

These were figures on studies conducted in the four cities, as released by the department's Bureau of Work-Training Programs:

- In Cleveland, the dropout rate among enrollees in an NYC program in 13 inner-city schools was 3.1 percent for the 1966-67 school year, compared to a rate of 14.5 percent for non-NYC students in the same schools.
- In Minneapolis, also in the 1966-67 year, the dropout rate among students in 11 high schools in an NYC program was 4 percent, while the schools' overall dropout rate was 15 percent.
- In Washington, D.C., a sampling of NYC students found that fewer than 2 percent of them dropped out of school during the 1966-67 school year. The overall dropout rate in the same schools was nearly 20 percent.
- In Pittsburgh, where a study was made during the 1965-66 school year, the dropout rate among NYC enrollees in 16 high schools was 4.2 percent, compared with an 8.4 percent dropout rate for non-NYC students.

Bernard Ness Named To NLRB Legal Staff

The National Labor Relations Board named Bernard Ness an assistant general counsel to fill a vacancy caused by the retirement of Assistant Counsel Albert Colbert.

Colbert had been with the NLRB since 1941 as a field examiner and attorney. Ness joined the agency in 1948 and served in Cleveland, O., Buffalo, N. Y., and Washington, D. C., before being assigned to the Winston-Salem, N. C., office as regional attorney in 1962.

CWA Ratifies Bell Pact, Two Units Set New Vote

Communications Workers members were back on the job at 20 Bell system companies after ratifying a new three-year contract by a 5 to 3 margin.

But at two divisions—Michigan Bell and Western Electric installers—new mail ratification votes were being conducted because of irregularities in meetings and procedures. The two units rejected the new contract by narrow margins with many members not voting.

The two-week strike involving more than 200,000 CWA members was ended at a 24-hour marathon bargaining session resulting in a new three-year pact. The agreement calls for a 19.58 percent wage increase over the contract period as well as a wide range of fringe benefits and improvements.

At ratification meetings across the country the contract was approved by a vote of 54,680 to 30,721, with rejections registered at Michigan Bell and Western Electric. The latter represents 23,000 members in the Bell system.

The company agreed to the mail ballot with a deadline of May 19 assuring the members in the two divisions that retroactivity of wage increases and other benefits would be retained despite the extension of time for a new vote.

Meanwhile the strike by members of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers against New Jersey Bell continued and IBEW members at Illinois Bell struck that company. CWA installers were reported honoring the picket lines at the two companies as well as those of independent groups in other parts of the nation that had struck Bell system companies.

The CWA declared the two-week strike ended May 4 after ratification votes showed the 5 to 3 margin favoring the new contract.

James Umber to Retire From Montana Post

Helena, Mont.—The Montana State AFL-CIO announced that Executive Sec. James S. Umber will retire as of Aug. 15 and that State COPE Dir. James Murry has assumed Umber's duties as acting executive secretary. The change was made because of the illness of Umber's wife, Pres. Joe Crosswhite said.

Umber served as president of the Montana AFL from 1952 to 1963, when he became executive secretary. Montana unions consider him the "father" of the present merged labor federation, Crosswhite said.

Building Trades Elect S. Frank Raftery

Pres. S. Frank Raftery, of the Painters has been elected a member of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. executive council.

He succeeds his father, L. M. Raftery, Painters president-emeritus, who resigned from the council after 16 years' service.

Frank Raftery, who becomes tenth vice president of the Building Trades Dept., was elected president of the Painters when his father retired three years ago.

Insurance Agents Win Metropolitan Contract

A contract settlement spurred by a strike vote was reached by the Insurance Workers for 11,000 agents of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. employed in cities across the nation.

IWIU Pres. William A. Gillen said the three-year pact was negotiated in Washington in the early hours of May 3, only two days after the agents had voted about 15-to-1 to strike if necessary to achieve a settlement.

The contract, subject to ratification by Metropolitan locals, provides for a $13-a-week increase in pay, improvements in fringe benefits and a maintenance of membership clause.

Major improvements in benefits include an increase in agents' expense allowances and commission rates, and an agreement by the company to pay the full cost of a combined insurance-pension program.

The maintenance of membership clause, Gillen said, represents a "significant victory" because it "opens the door to a union shop and will help us gain security improvements at other companies, particularly Prudential Insurance Co."

On the money side, "We feel that we have largely achieved our objective in what we called 'operation catch-up' at Metropolitan, where we sought to meet standards already obtained in other contracts."

IWIU was "in a far stronger position" in this year's Metropolitan negotiations than it was when it negotiated a contract two years ago, Gillen said, because the union has more than doubled its membership there during the period.

He gave "much of the credit for the new settlement" to the Metropolitan agents who demonstrated their militancy and a 16-member negotiating committee, headed by IWIU Vice Pres. Robert L. Ponsi.

Labor Dept. Names 2 Manpower Aides

The Labor Dept.'s Manpower Administration has announced two new staff appointments.

Sydney H. Kasper, who has been news service director at the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development, will head the new Office of Information for the Manpower Administration.

Manpower Administrator Stanley H. Ruttenberg also announced that Richard E. Miller has been moved up to assistant administrator for financial and management services.

THE LABOR MOVEMENT is "doing something every week, every month and every year" to help advance social progress in America, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told some 450 delegates to the Service Employes 14th general convention in Washington. Greeting him are SEIU Pres. David Sullivan and other leaders of the union.

'Best Qualified':

Service Employes Endorse Humphrey

and force" who "is imbued with progressive idealism."

It said Humphrey for more than two decades "has been in the forefront of the struggle to secure social justice for all, to promote civil rights, education, housing, health and consumer protection."

His nomination and election, the resolution concluded, can "insure a continuation of the social and economic progress" achieved by the Johnson Administration and "unite the American people behind the defense of freedom and democracy."

Humphrey, thanking the union for its endorsement, said that the single, impelling reason for his candidacy is "that I believe I can mobilize the American people for the great purpose that lies ahead."

That purpose, he said, calls for new measures to eradicate city slums and provide housing, medical care, education opportunities and jobs for the nation's poorest citizens.

"I count it my business this year, in this campaign," Humphrey continued, "to set out what is necessary to assure every American . . . the right to earn a decent living, at a decent wage on a decent job."

He praised labor for its "firm resolve" in standing behind Pres. Johnson in his efforts to block the advance of communism in Southeast Asia, while seeking a peaceful solution of the Viet Nam war.

Unity Needed

"You know from labor's own history," he told the delegates, "the sometimes inhuman cost of advancing humanity's purpose, and the necessity of unity in the time of adversity."

The delegates gave Humphrey a two-minute standing ovation when he entered the convention hall, and his address was interrupted 32 times by applause. When he finished speaking, the audience broke into shouts of "We want Humphrey."

The convention's 450 delegates representing 372,000 workers in the United States and Canada heard SEIU Pres. David Sullivan report on the union's growth and achievements over the past four years and "new challenges" facing it.

The delegates tackled a heavy agenda calling for action on more than a score of major resolutions, constitutional changes, a proposal to raise per capita dues, plus election of officers.

The convention adopted a constitutional amendment changing the union's name from "Building Service Employes International Union" to "Service Employes International Union." The change was previously approved by the union's executive board and by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

Sullivan said the SEIU has added more than $30 million to members' paychecks since its 1964 convention, enrolled 57,000 new members and helped enact federal, state and provincial laws "to help all citizens."

He traced the union's role in securing passage of the Service Contract Act of 1964 requiring employers who provide services under federal contracts to pay wages and benefits equivalent to those prevailing in their areas.

Sullivan also described the union's efforts on behalf of civil rights and the war on poverty. He told of new pension plans negotiated and local activities in building housing projects, sponsoring medical clinics and youth scholarships.

'Plan Together'

"It's appropriate that we enjoy our accomplishments," he said, "and it's appropriate that we plan together to accomplish even more in the next four years."

Meany hit at critics who charge that labor is not on the move, declaring that the record shows just the opposite.

Wages and fringe benefits won for union members "are the highest and best in history," he said. He noted that the AFL-CIO has increased its membership in the last three years by 14 percent to 14.9 million members.

"We have a stake in America," Meany declared. He said that labor has demonstrated this belief by supporting civil rights legislation, adequate minimum wages, education improvements, more housing and other progressive measures.

"Status quo—oh, no—we are doing something every week, every month, every year and the record shows it," Meany said. "That's why we are recognized as the people's lobby in Washington."

"All of the things that mean something to all of the people of America have the stamp of the trade union movement upon them," he said.

At the same time, Meany and other convention speakers emphasized that labor's progress—and that of the nation—is tied to an all-out effort in 1968 to elect a progressive President and Congress.

Federal Reserve Banker Swaps Knowledge With Labor Leaders

Minneapolis—Hugh Galusha is a banker. He is president of one of the nation's 12 regional Federal Reserve Banks. Yet, he has a familiarity with the outlook of organized labor that's highly uncommon for a man of his position.

Galusha, as head of the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis, has for almost two years held luncheon sessions every couple of months with union leaders in the Twin Cities.

It's a fair trade. What the labor leaders learn about economics, and about how federal monetary policy ties in with jobs and collective bargaining, is at least matched by what banker Galusha learns about labor's view of consumer credit and family budgets, rising prices and lagging wages, and unemployment.

Galusha recently became a voting member of the Federal Reserve's Open Market Committee. The committee makes decisions within the Federal Reserve System on daily market operations which in turn determine the supply of credit and, thereby, whether interest rates move up or down.

Expressed in every-day terms, these become decisions on what it will cost to buy or build a house, to buy a car, or put up a new factory. Thus, they're decisions on how many jobs there will be, and on prices and production as well.

Galusha explained that while the Fed has a pretty good economic intelligence network of its own, it may take two months for some statistics to reach his desk. However, by talking with these union leaders he can often spot trends before they are reflected in the tables.

But beyond such things as economic data, Galusha says he has found the lunches to be "dramatic for my education."

Joining in this two-way teaching process have been more than a dozen men and one woman active in labor in the Twin Cities.

David K. Roe, president of the Minnesota AFL-CIO said that in the beginning "most of us thought it was a funny joke" to be having skull sessions with a man so remote to the labor movement.

"But Galusha has helped us learn some of the basic economic facts of life. . . . He sits down and spells out the shape of things, and tells us about the monetary situation of the bank."

Roe, a building tradesman by background, said "a man involved in construction negotiations gets some idea about what is happening to interest rates, and how these changes will affect the supply of jobs in the building industry."

In explaining how he first came to suggest these exchanges with union people, Galusha points out that by law and tradition "we at the bank are a cloistered lot. It's easy to become disengaged from the world beyond the bank.

"Naturally, we deal every day with bankers. And I try to keep in touch with those who are constantly using the member banks serving our six-state region—ranchers, industrial leaders and so on.

"But union people, too, have the same right to be in touch with us, and we have the same need to be in touch with them. Indeed, I think, the same obligation to seek first hand understanding concerning the views and needs of working people."

Galusha is a youngish, thoughtful and articulate lawyer-accountant. He is a native of Montana where people don't generally put on airs. He takes the view that if you want to know what's going on, you talk to people who are where the action is.

Burton Genis, manager of the Minnesota Joint Board of the Clothing Workers is enthusiastic about Galusha because "he can put complicated questions about money and banking into simple terms all of us can understand."

Galusha likes to bear down on the fact that the bank gains as much as the union people do from these exchanges.

The banker thinks the luncheons haven't changed attitudes much—"these are pretty well-informed guys"—but he thinks they may have given hitherto dull statistical indices "new relevance to a labor leader's day-to-day activities."

What there has been, says Galusha, "is a shift in the kinds of conversations we've been having on the aspirations of working people."

"Such hopes," he said, "are the things that affect the economy."

Hearst Strikers Encouraged by Farm Workers

Los Angeles — AFL-CIO Farm Workers, whose strike against California grape growers is in its third year, bared the secrets of their stamina to 1,000 striking and locked out Hearst newspaper workers at a labor rally here.

The key to victory, said Dolores Huerta, vice chairman and chief negotiator for the Farm Workers Organizing Committee, is the fact that "we are not going to go away—the union is our only hope."

She urged the Hearst employes, now in the fifth month of a struggle with management of the Los Angeles Herald Examiner, the nation's largest evening newspaper, to intensify boycott programs against the powerful Hearst newspaper and magazine empire.

Boycotts were successful in gaining contracts and union recognition for the Farm Workers among all major California wine producers. Similar strategy is being used against table grape growers.

The Hearst strikers collected $426 at the meeting for the Farm Workers after Mrs. Huerta spoke.

Efforts to mediate the Herald Examiner dispute have failed to date. The latest failure came with resignation of a special three-man panel, which accused Hearst management of "flatly refusing" to cooperate in peace making attempts.

Chamber's Anti-Labor Proposals Aimed at Crippling Unions, Board

A management lawyer, speaking at a U.S. Chamber of Commerce forum, spelled out some of the anti-labor legislation that employer groups will try to get through Congress.

T. R. Iserman said major changes are necessary because the National Labor Relations Board "has sought to dragoon employes into unions" and has bowed "to the dictates of the great labor barons."

The chamber's anti-labor legislative proposals, he claimed, "have passed the scrutiny of at least 300 of our country's most astute students of labor relations law."

Iserman called for legislation outlawing "coalition bargaining" by prohibiting representatives of other unions from taking part in bargaining talks at the invitation of the union directly involved, or even being present as observers.

He asked that the decision between separate or joint bargaining be entirely up to the employer.

Other amendments the management spokesmen urged would prohibit recognition picketing and product boycotts, authorize anti-strike injunctions despite the Norris-LaGuardia Act, and take away most of the authority of the National Labor Relations Board, including card check recognition and determination of bargaining units.

In fact, under the business group's proposal, there wouldn't be much for the NLRB to do.

The list of proposed amendments would reverse the NLRB's policy that a union—as well as an employer—should have an opportunity to present its case to the workers before an election. Employers would no longer have to furnish information pertinent to bargaining to a union on request, change of ownership would void an existing agreement, and the NLRB would be barred from issuing what the management spokesman termed "punitive orders."

In fact, Iserman suggested, if the NLRB continues to go "its merry way," Congress should consider shifting "some or all" of the labor board's powers to federal district courts or some new agency that would be more "amenable to the interests of the public."

Kennedy Tops Field:

No Trend Sighted In Indiana Voting

Sen. Robert F. Kennedy emerged on top in the three-way Democratic presidential primary in Indiana but failed to score the decisive victory his backers had aimed for.

Indiana was the first of a series of target primaries for the New York senator under a campaign strategy that seeks to carry him into the Democratic national convention on a wave of solid primary victories.

Kennedy's 42 percent of the total vote in Indiana, most observers agreed, was not enough to start this wave rolling.

With nearly all of the ballots counted, Kennedy had 320,485 votes to 234,312 for Gov. Roger D. Branigin, running as a favorite son, and 209,165 for Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy of Minnesota.

Kennedy demonstrated vote-getting abilities among all segments of the electorate, running particularly strong in Negro precincts. But the combined vote for Branigin, with about 31 percent of the total, and McCarthy, with 27 percent, added up to an opposition vote of nearly 60 percent against the New York senator.

McCarthy's showing exceeded the pre-vote forecasts and gave him at least enough to keep his bid for the nomination alive. He and Kennedy will oppose each other in the Nebraska primary, May 14. Pres. Johnson, whose name was entered in the Nebraska primary before he withdrew from the race, will also appear on the ballot.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, there was still a possibility that Branigin might end up with control of at least some of Indiana's 63 votes at the Democratic convention.

Former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon, the only candidate on the Republican ballot in Indiana, received about 500,000 votes, far ahead of the 408,000 total the state gave him in the 1960 primary.

While national attention was focused on the Indiana presidential results, Democrats in neighboring Ohio produced a more immediately significant story as they overwhelmingly rejected a new term for conservative Sen. Frank J. Lausche to give the nomination to former Rep. John J. Gilligan of Cincinnati. (Story, Page 1.)

Other primary elections around the country produced these results:

- In Texas, Houston attorney Don Yarborough headed a 10-man field seeking the nomination for governor. He had strong support from Sen. Ralph Yarborough (no relation) and from organized labor in the state, but will be the underdog in the June 1 runoff primary against conservative Lt. Gov. Preston Smith, who ran second by 39,000 votes. Eugene B. Locke, who was endorsed by Gov. John Connally, ran fifth in the race, but Connally won designation as a favorite son candidate for president to lead the state's convention delegation.
- In North Carolina, Lt. Gov. Robert W. Scott fell just short of a majority in the Democratic gubernatorial primary, but was relieved of the need for a runoff vote when the second-place candidate, J. Melville Broughton, Jr., withdrew. A Negro dentist, Dr. Reginald Hawkins, received more than 125,000 votes, or 18.3 percent of the total, to run third. Scott is the son of the liberal governor and senator of the 1940s and 1950s, Kerr Scott. In the November election, he will face Rep. James C. Gardner, a conservative who easily won the GOP nomination.
- In Florida, former Gov. LeRoy Collins held a small lead in his bid for the Democratic nomination for the U.S. Senate seat being vacated by Sen. George A. Smathers. But with all but a handful of precincts counted, the need appeared certain for a runoff primary against State Atty. Gen. Earl Faircloth. The Republican nomination went to Rep. Edward J. Gurney with a solid victory over former St. Petersburg Mayor Herman W. Goldner. The only incumbent congressman with opposition, Rep. Sam M. Gibbons (D), won renomination over State Atty. Paul Antinori, Jr.
- In the District of Columbia, a slate pledging the District's 23 Democratic convention votes to Kennedy defeated two competing slates pledged to Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey. The candidates' names were not on the ballot, but Kennedy made several appearances in the district; Humphrey did not campaign. The local Republican organization had agreed in advance to allot six of its convention votes to Nixon and three to New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller.
- In Alabama, a runoff primary will be held June 4 to select the Democratic nominee to succeed Sen. Lister Hill, who is retiring. Both candidates, former Lt. Gov. James B. Allen and Rep. Armistead Selden, are supporters of former Gov. George C. Wallace. Both are also members of a slate of presidential electors pledged to Wallace which was chosen on the regular Democratic ticket by margins of about 5 to 1.

AKRON-AREA union members turned out at the airport to give a warm welcome to Vice Pres. Humphrey in his first Ohio trip as a presidential candidate. And he holds a baby to prove he's really in the race. The catchy signs of the Communications Workers were closest to Humphrey but there were posters aplenty from other unions out of camera range. At right, the Vice President chats with Leo Dugan, executive secretary of the Akron Labor Council, and Francis A. Maile, Rubber Workers political education director.

Big Ohio Labor Vote Aids Gilligan Victory

the State Democratic party organization in backing Gilligan, had turned "the impossible dream of six months ago into reality."

"The people of Ohio really won this election," the statement said. "Now, in November citizens of Ohio will have a real choice between a real Democrat and a real Republican."

Warren Smith, secretary-treasurer of the state labor federation, had high praise for local unions and city central labor bodies throughout the state for their grassroots efforts to encourage union members to vote.

"For the first time in a decade," Smith said, "the working people of Ohio went to the polls fully informed on the real issues involved in this contest. This is mainly due to our new computer program which went into effect just four months ago."

He called Gilligan a "formidable candidate" and said that Ohio labor is proud of its role in supporting him.

The State AFL-CIO's computer operation involved a breakdown of more than 700,000 names and addresses of union members and their organization by county, ward, precinct, street and telephone number. This was followed by a concentrated telephone campaign to get-out-the-vote manned by volunteers over the 10-day period preceding the primary.

Gilligan was one of a group of liberal freshmen elected to Congress in 1964 as Pres. Johnson scored a landslide victory. Representing a heavily Republican district, he lost out two years later to Robert Taft, Jr. Except for his term in Congress, Gilligan has been a Cincinnati councilman since 1953 and is currently the lone Democrat on the council. From 1948 to 1953, he taught English literature at Xavier University, where he received his master's degree.

During his two years in Congress, Gilligan compiled a perfect score by COPE's reckoning of "right" and "wrong" votes on major issues. Lausche's COPE rating, in contrast, was about 30 percent.

At the Ohio COPE convention that endorsed Gilligan in February, State AFL-CIO Pres. Frank W. King said that whereas Gilligan "stands for something . . . for progress and for the people," Lausche has a long record of "being against things. He is not people-oriented."

Gilligan had appeared before the convention to discuss his record and his position, but Lausche rejected an invitation to do so.

The Ohio primary also chose delegates to cast the state's 115 votes at the Democratic national convention and 58 at the Republican convention. Both groups are uncommitted. The Democratic delegates are pledged to Sen. Stephen M. Young as a favorite son. Young recently withdrew his personal endorsement of Sen. Robert F. Kennedy for the party's presidential nomination.

In congressional primaries, the Democratic nomination for the 21st District (Cleveland) went to Louis Stokes, brother of Cleveland's first Negro mayor, who led a field of 20. Seven-term Democrat Charles A. Vanik won nomination in a new district and will face Rep. Frances P. Bolton in November.

Peace Corps Cites Need for Skilled Crafts

The Peace Corps has issued an appeal for volunteer skilled workers needed for a summer program to teach basic crafts in eight underdeveloped nations.

The Peace Corps will begin training the volunteers for the overseas projects this summer. Most volunteers will be stationed in trade, vocational or industrials arts schools, the announcement said.

Malaysia is asking for radio-TV repairmen who will be trained to teach electricity, electromagnetism, broadcasting, radar principles and other related subjects.

Jamaica needs horticulturists, plumbers, pipefitters, tailors, shoe repairmen and arts and crafts instructors to train underprivileged youngsters in youth camps.

Volunteers also are needed in the Ivory Coast, Venezuela, Kenya, Micronesia and other countries. Information for these and year-around programs may be obtained by writing Ed Pautienus, Room 715, Peace Corps, Washington, D. C. 20525.

Vice President Backed By Steelworkers' Board

The executive board of the Steelworkers, meeting in Washington, voted unanimous endorsement of Vice Pres. Humphrey for president and pledged "the full support of the union to his candidacy."

The board, declaring that Humphrey's record "is there for all to see," sketched his accomplishments as mayor of Minneapolis, senator and vice president in such fields as medicare, civil rights, the Peace Corps, aid to education, and the anti-poverty program.

The board's resolution called him "a man who is more eminently qualified by experience, proven performance, character and temperament to assume the presidency of this nation than any other candidate."

Humphrey's "visionary proposals of 20 years ago," the board said, "have, largely by reason of his efforts, become the social achievements of today."

Rail Union Merger Documents Drawn

Cleveland—A special committee representing four railroad operating unions contemplating merger has delivered unification documents to the presidents of the unions involved, it was announced here.

The announcement came jointly from Presidents Charles Luna, Trainmen; Neil P. Speirs, Switchmen; H. E. Gilbert, Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, and C. F. Lane, Conductors & Brakemen.

CWA Wins Pact With Help of IUE

Smithfield, N. C.—The Communications Workers won bargaining rights at the Sylvania Products plant here —with a long-distance assist from a sister union.

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers sent two active women members from an IUE-organized Sylvania plant at Batavia, N. Y., to help the CWA in its organizing campaign. They spoke at two mass meetings of Smithfield workers on the day before the NLRB election. The AFL-CIO organizing staff also assisted.

In the hard-fought election, Smithfield workers voted 417-389 for union representation.

'Congress Must Act'

AMERICA'S LABOR FORCE is growing rapidly—about 1.5 million a year in the next 10 years. And the spread of automation is reducing labor requirements in some industries, increasing the educational—and skill—requirements of many jobs and moving industry location from cities to the suburbs and countryside.

The American economy must expand rapidly, merely to prevent the present level of unemployment from rising—to provide jobs for new entrants into the labor force and for those displaced by automation. Unless immediate action is taken to provide a million public service jobs now, large-scale pockets of unemployed and under-employed disadvantaged people will persist, as a spreading danger to the fabric of American society, even if the economy continues to expand normally.

Federal action to create 1 million public service jobs must be the keystone of any realistic national effort to employ the long-term unemployed and seriously under-employed. The government must be the employer of last resort and the time for such action is now!

Two studies, in the past several years, report a public service employment potential of between some 4 million and over 5 million jobs—4.3 million according to a study by Greenleigh Associates and 5.3 million reported by a study for the Automation Commission.

This need in urban and rural public services and private, nonprofit institutions can rapidly be translated into 1 million jobs within a year, if the funds are made available.

Dr. John W. Gardner, chairman of the Urban Coalition, recently reported:

"To find out how many socially useful jobs could be made available immediately, the Urban Coalition asked Dr. Harold Sheppard of the Upjohn Institute to survey a sample of major cities. Based upon a preliminary analysis of this survey, Dr. Sheppard has concluded that at least 141,000 persons could be employed almost overnight in the 130 cities with population over 100,000. These would be jobs in regular city departments where supervisors are already available and work tasks are clearly defined.

"If this sample were expanded to small cities, to county and state governments, and to jobs with private, nonprofit organizations, it is likely that enough jobs could be found to put 500,000 persons to work within six months. By further planning, the number might be expanded to a million or more within a year.

"A public service employment program would not only enable unemployed to earn their own way, it would benefit the general public by the many necessary and useful tasks which would be performed."

I agree completely with Dr. Gardner.

We in the AFL-CIO have been warning about unemployment and the social ills it breeds, for the last dozen years. Eight years ago, it was the major burden of our testimony to the platform committees of both parties.

We've said it repeatedly in every conceivable forum and we've been greeted with indifference by Congress.

Now Congress can no longer delay. Now Congress can no longer pretend unemployment will disappear if no one notices it. Now Congress is hearing the voices of the people all over this land.

Now Congress must act.

The Time Is . . .

19 Million Over 65:

More Action Needed to Boost Meager Income of U.S. Aged

AGED AND AGING Americans—most of them already faced by the daily reality or the ominous prospect of inadequate retirement income—can expect a steadily worsening situation unless a genuinely comprehensive plan for federal action is fashioned.

With that warning, a 20-member Senate Special Committee on Aging called for establishment of an institute, or "think tank," on retirement income as one step in a searching re-examination of federal programs and policies related to income and other emerging or chronic problems affecting older Americans.

Another step—advocated by Committee Chairman Harrison A. Williams (D-N.J.) and recommended by the committee—would be the calling of a White House Conference on Aging in 1970.

The committee's report listed nine federal Executive Branch units with jurisdiction over programs related to retirement income and said that the listing was only partial. The committee's conclusion:

"Despite the increasing complexity and magnitude of the forces that affect retirement income, and despite increasing dependence upon public and private pension systems, and even with the introduction of new concepts for a guaranteed minimum income, the federal government has as yet no mechanism for sustained comprehensive attention to the issues and problems involved."

To "provide the overview so vitally needed," the committee recommends that: "the Executive Branch consider the ultimate establishment of an Institute on Retirement Income closely patterned after an institute established by Pres. Johnson in 1967 to deal with urban problems. Such an institute would be geared for problem-solving as well as sustained study."

The committee recommendation was based upon extensive testimony indicating that retirement income problems of the future will be pervasive among individuals usually thought of as far removed from the public welfare category. Today's report gave excerpts from authoritative witnesses who foresaw formidable difficulties in balancing retirement income sources with present and future long-range living costs. One economist said:

"The lengthening retirement span requires a re-examination of the income maintenance arrangements for old age, not only because the levels of income now being provided at retirement are extremely low, but also because the retirement stage of life is now sufficiently long to permit a substantial worsening of that income after retirement."

Another study cited in the committee report concluded that in 1980 about half the couples and more than four-fifths of individual retirees will receive $3,000 or less in annual pension income, both public and private. Median income of persons past 65 in the United States today is less than half of that of younger people.

In a foreword to the report, Sen. Williams said:

"One-fifth of the population of the United States is nearing or has passed the traditional retirement age, 65 . . . A close reading of this report . . . leads to an inescapable conclusion: the time has come for a systematic re-examination of many public policies and programs that relate in one way or another to the well-being of older Americans, present and future." That re-examination is necessary, in Sen. Williams' view, because:

- The great legislative breakthroughs of the '60s—medicare, the Older Americans Act of 1967, new advances in housing, and other historic advances—necessarily channeled time and attention away from other issues that should now receive careful scrutiny.
- Programs established by recent legislation should be valuated while still in their formative years.
- Elderly Americans, now thought of primarily as a "problem group" are rich in talent, energies, and wisdom—resources that should be freed and developed for public good or private satisfaction.

Similar conclusions are reached in the committee's call for a White House Conference on Aging which could "serve as the means for developing comprehensive projections of long-range need that may be expected as the population of older Americans continues to increase."

The report says that the number of Americans of age 65 or over will climb from today's 19 million to 20 million by 1970, 21.2 million 5 years after and 25 million by 1985. The committee points out, however, that "vast social and economic changes" can be expected not only because of the increase in numbers, but also because tomorrow's population of older Americans will be far different in needs and expectations than today's.

Senate Hearing Assailed:

NLRB Not Perfect, But It's Still the Best Umpire Around

The following is excerpted from a statement by Bernard Kleiman, general counsel of the Steelworkers, before the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee holding hearings on the operations of the National Labor Relations Board.

THIS BODY, a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee designated to treat with "separation of powers," is not the proper forum in which to debate labor legislation.

This is underscored by the fact that the Senate has a committee known as the Labor and Public Welfare Committee which is authorized and fully competent to consider such measures. Indeed, if this body were to undertake that function, the Labor and Public Welfare Committee could properly level against this subcommittee the charge that it is "exceeding its authority" or violating the spirit of "separation of powers."

I am further constrained by the belief that no congressional committee should, under the guise of legislative or constitutional purism, be converted by disgruntled parties to an arena in which they can vindicate their issues by throwing rotten tomatoes at the umpire.

We all lose cases from time to time. The United Steelworkers of America certainly has lost its share of them before the NLRB in recent years. As with all litigants, our losses distress us, and our self-esteem would undoubtedly benefit if we could take your time to "prove" why we were right and the board was wrong. But we would, in any event, still have lost the decision.

Finally, of course, while it might be great sport to argue one side of our old cases without having to face our opponent and his presentation of the countervailing viewpoint, any "decision" which would issue as a result thereof would hardly be invested with the customary attributes of due process.

Accordingly, I shall attempt to resist the temptation to argue here why the law or its interpretations should be changed. I shall make an effort not to attack those who have ruled against us or to defend those who have sustained our position. Nor shall I try to respond to those who are using these hearings as a vehicle for changing the whole fabric and administration of labor law.

The principle reason for all of the vituperation and cries of anguished alarm that attended hearings of this nature is the fact that labor-management confrontations involve sizeable groups of people.

They are charged with the emotionalism, and frequently the hysteria, that surrounds any public event or any test of strength between significant forces. The effect is not unlike that which attends a high school football game or the World Series or a major contest between opposing political factions.

What is lost in all of this drama is the fact that only a very small proportion of all labor-management relationships become causes celebres. And, of these, only a minute number reach the NLRB. Accordingly, from a numerical standpoint the significance of any inquiry such as this is exceedingly minor.

If a charge is to be made about the board and its disposition of the powers assigned it, that charge is not for exceeding delegated powers, but for failing to exercise the powers granted. I have noted that the board's involvement is primarily with unorganized or newly organized employers who have determined to violate the act as a matter of cold business judgment.

It is in these areas, where the board should have the most impact, that it has proven least effective. And it is ineffective precisely because it has failed to employ the full breadth of remedial powers granted to it by Congress to effectuate the policies of the act.

The act has been amended twice since its original passage. Although Section 1 has been augmented by the addition of a paragraph condemning certain practices by labor unions, the essential guiding policies of the act expressed above have not been changed.

CONGRESS GAVE the board the tools with which to effectuate these policies. Section 10(a) provides that the board is empowered to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice affecting commerce. Section 10(c) provides that, if the board finds that an unfair labor practice has been committed, the board ". . . shall issue . . . an order requiring such person to cease and desist from such unfair labor practice, and to take such affirmative action including reinstatement of employes with or without back pay, as will effectuate the policies of the subchapter. . . ."

This section commands the board to remedy unfair labor practices by affirmative measures which go beyond mere cease and desist orders. The only statutory limitation in the board's remedial obligation is that the remedy effectuates the policies of the act.

The Supreme Court has not imposed additional restrictions but has given the board extremely broad discretion in fashioning remedies. Even armed with these clear indications of ultimate judicial approval, the board has not drawn upon enlightenment gained from experience to right the wrongs committed under the act. The board has long floundered in an age of remedial non-enlightenment from which it is only now taking the first tentative steps to emerge.

A Vicious Circle:

Property Tax Hits Poor Hard To Get Revenue to Aid Poor

PROPERTY TAX hits the poor in the central city far harder than the wealthy in the suburbs, says a research report released by the National Commission on Urban Problems chaired by former Sen. Paul H. Douglas.

The study calls the property tax an "inferior tax instrument" which tends to discourage low-cost housing and rehabilitation of slums, helps to diminish job opportunities in the city and deters orderly urban development.

The report was prepared by Prof. Dick Netzer of New York University, a widely-known expert on the subject. The Douglas Commission expects to issue a series of similar reports on zoning, housing codes and other city problems before it makes its final report and recommendations, probably late this summer.

The Netzer study points out that the property tax, on a national average, is equivalent to a 24 percent sales tax on housing. Consumer taxes on other essentials—except liquor, tobacco and gasoline—are never higher than five percent or, if you include all indirect taxes, 10 percent at most.

On the average, this "housing tax" is slightly higher for renters than for home owners. Renters, however, cannot deduct it from their income tax. And it taxes the biggest bite out of the family budget of poor people.

A family receiving less than $2000 a year, for instance, pays 8.5 percent of this income on property tax which is included in the rent. A family with an income of $10,000 or more pays only 1.6 percent of the income, or five to six times less, for the "housing tax."

High property taxes also inhibit rehabilitation of old houses because in most cities improvements are penalized by higher assessments.

All this, says Netzer, conspires to retard central city rebuilding. Yet, despite increased federal and state assistance for highways, public welfare, higher education and health services, the property tax remains the largest single source of revenue with which cities finance the ever increasing cost of public services.

Much of the increase is due, of course, to the increasing attention paid to the poor with the health and welfare services, better education for children in low-income families and other programs related to the ghetto. Thus, says Netzer, "to a considerable extent, central cities find themselves in the position of taxing the poor to provide services to the poor, which is surely nonsense."

LADDERS THAT BREAK. Excavations that collapse. The bale of cotton that falls and crushes you. The thousand and one physical accidents that can happen to a worker have been written about many times before. But there is far more to the industrial safety field than these. There are other hazards.

These hazards can be summed up in the intriguing question propounded by the Public Health Service in a study asking: "Does Your Job Make You Sick?"

At first this might seem like one of those hypothetical questions about whether your boss is a nice fellow or a stinker; whether the people you work with are pleasant or otherwise and whether your job is stimulating or boring. Whether—in brief—you look forward to your job with pleasure or loathing.

Actually, the question concerns such vital matters as what your job is doing to your liver or your bone marrow.

Without being unnecessarily alarmist, the fact remains that there are plenty of what might seem like safe jobs that hold health perils.

The Public Health Service cites dry cleaners, furniture polishers, oil processors, painters, welders, printers, photographic chemical makers, bronzers, cobblers, degreasers. All these trades generally use benzene and when workers in these jobs inhale its vapors without proper precautions, they may suffer anemia or damaged central nervous system which can cause drowsiness, headaches, dizziness and even death.

Take such seemingly "safe" jobs as storage battery maker, ceramic workers, dental amalgam maker, engraver, lithographer or solderer. Cadmium may be used in these jobs and cadmium dust or fumes can cause fatal damage to the liver, kidneys or bone marrow.

PESTICIDES ARE nothing to be careless about either. If you are a farmer or work for a farmer you are subject to dangerous health hazards in their careless use.

There are other farm dangers; the fumes from a newly-filled silo or even the diseases or parasites of live stock which can result in serious occupational illness.

The Public Health Department calls occupational disease "the silent enemy," that may strike a swift and deadly blow. It cites:

- A welder who was fatally poisoned by the fumes of cadmium contained in silver solder.
- The hospitalization of six workers subject to dangerous concentrations of mercury.
- The death of a worker who entered a degreasing tank and was overcome by its fumes.
- A farmer who sickened and died after exposure to nitrogen dioxide fumes from a recently filled silo.

Nor are the hazards confined to individual workers. Some 3.5 million American workers exposed to asbestos are subject to lung disease. Of 6,000 men who have been uranimum miners, an estimated 600 to 1,000 will die during the next 20 years as a result of radiation exposure. Thousands of miners are daily exposed to "black lungs" while workers in any of the "duty" trades like stone cutters must be on guard of other forms of lung disease.

People, of course, have to work for a living and millions of them must work in areas that actually can "make them sick." But there is no reason why the nation can't do everything in its power to protect them against needless hazards. The very scientific progress that has enabled us to use chemicals on so wide a scale can help us combat their unwanted and deadly effect on workers.

Congress is now considering a National Occupational Health and Safety Bill which is meeting the opposition of short-sighted industrialists who are willing to trifle with the health and lives of their workers in the name of economy. The answer must lie in an enlightened Congress.

AFL-CIO COMMUNITY SERVICES Activities Dir. Leo Perlis (left) receives a statute from Boyd Hinds, associate national director of the Boys' Clubs of America, citing him for his "personal interest, generous support and dedicated service which enable thousands of needy boys to enjoy countless benefits through Boys' Clubs."

How to Buy:

Interest Rates Jump Upward For Home Mortgage Loans

By Sidney Margolius

CONSUMERS HAVE GONE on a credit-buying binge even as the interest rates on borrowings have jumped to the highest levels in almost 40 years.

Mortgage-seekers and installment buyers are especially hard hit by the jumping rates. Mortgages now average 6.5 percent for the country. Extra charges for points and closing fees bring the effective rate close to 6.75 percent.

In some states that have legal ceilings of 6 percent, reluctance of lenders to give mortgages has forced home-buyers to go to as many as 15 banks and savings associations to get a loan.

In such states lenders are demanding that the ceilings be raised. In one state, Virginia, the maximum already has been raised to 8 percent, and the going rate already has climbed close to 7 percent.

Even the government-sponsored FHA and VA rates now cost more than their present record-high 6.5 and 6 percent, respectively. A bill has passed Congress to let these agencies set higher rates. (Since this column was written, interest rates on government-backed loans were raised to 6.75 percent).

Not only are mortgages rising, but interest rates paid by businessmen and federal and local governments are reaching for record levels. One financial reporter says such rates are the highest since the Civil War. Main reason is heavy borrowing by the government because of the Viet Nam war.

You are affected by the high rates even if you already have a home. You pay more in prices, property taxes and rent because of the higher rates paid on their borrowings by businessmen, school districts and other government agencies.

Consumers themselves are helping to push up interest rates by heavy installment buying this year. Such borrowings are running about 9 percent over last year, the Associated Credit Bureaus of America report.

This is about the worst possible year to buy on credit. Debts have reached critical proportions for many families and could lead to severe personal problems if income declines. Total household debt, in the nation, including mortgages, has reached 72 percent of disposable income compared with 55 percent just 10 years ago, and less than 25 percent right after World War II, the credit bureaus report.

Already an increasing number of families are falling behind in mortgage payments or losing their homes altogether. Mortgage delinquencies rose sharply this winter, the Mortgage Bankers Association reports.

Let alone interest rates, your family will have to cope this summer with the highest living costs yet. Prices have gone up for 25 months in a row, and now average 3.7 percent higher than a year ago, and 6.6 percent more than two years ago. Your 1947-49 dollar now is worth just 69 cents in buying power.

This year's price rise alone is wiping out about one-third of the recent increase in social security benefits. Older people are feeling the pinch. One elderly woman writes that "every time social security is raised and even before, grocery stores keep raising the prices penny after penny." She wishes that the government would regulate food prices through a department for consumers.

Let alone any regulation, prices are going up more. On top of the consumer price rise, the wholesale price index in one recent month took its highest jump in almost two years.

RISING FOOD PRICES will be your most immediate problem this summer. The Agriculture Dept. has increased the support price of milk at a time when milk prices normally would decline as we approach the spring flush season. Meat prices also are due to go up.

The other three tough cost problems, only some of which you can do anything about by yourself, are soaring medical, home-ownership and transportation expenses. Medical-care costs have jumped over 6 percent this year, for a total rise in the past decade of 42 percent, more than twice as much as the rest of the cost of living.

Car owners also are having to pay more for gas, tires and other equipment this spring. The only helpful event is that prices of used cars, especially older models, have dropped slightly compared to a year ago.
